whereupon after his returne to Rome from the campe, they that remained behinde, called for him againe, not so much by way of gratification and to do him a pleasure, but because they hoped by his meanes more speedily and with greater facilitie to win Carthage: now when he was entred to the very walles, and yet the Carthaginians fought from the castle, Polybius gave counsel to scatter in the sea betwene (which was not very deepe betwene his campe and the said castle) certaine coldrops of yron, or els planks beset with naile points, to overcast and spread the shallow shelves with sticking upon them, for feare lest that the enemies passing that arme or firth of the sea, might come to assaile their rampars; but he said: It was a meere mockery, considering that they had already gained the walles, and were within the citie of their enemies, to make meanes not to fight with them. Finding the citie full of statues and painted tables which were brought out of Sicilie, he made proclamation, that the Sicilians from all their cities should come for to owne and cary away whatsoever had bene theirs; but of all the pillage he would not allow any one, either slave or newly enfranchised of his owne traine, to seize upon, nor so much as buy ought, notwithstanding that there was driving and carrying away otherwise on all hands. The greatest and most familiar friend that he had, Lalius, sued to be consull of Rome; him he bestowed and let forward his sute in all that hee could: by which occasion hee demanded of one Pompeius, who was thought to make labour for the same dignitie, whether it were true that hee was a competitor or no? now it was supposed that this Pompeius was a misfitts sonne that used to play on the flute; who made answer againe, that he stood not for the consullship; and that which was more, hee promised to assitt Lalius, and to gett all the voices that hee could for him: thus while they beleevied his words, and expected his helping hand, they were deceived in the end; for they were given to understand for certaine, that this Pompeius was in the common hall labouring hard for himselfe, going about unto every citizen one after another, requesting their voices in his owne behalfe; whereat, when all others tooke stomacke and were offended, Scipio laughed apace, and said: We are even well enough served for our great follie, thus to stay and wait all this while upon a fluter and piper, as if we had bene to pray and invoke not men, but the gods. Appius Claudius was in election and concurrence against him for the office of consullship, saying in a braverie: That he used to salute all the Romans by name and by surname upon his owne knowledge of them, without the helpe of a prompter, whereas Scipio scarce knew one of them all: Thou fittest trueth (quoth Scipio) for I have alwaies bene careful not to know many, but rather not to be unknown of any. He gave counsell unto the Romane citizens, at what time as they warred against the Celtiberians, for to send both him and his competitor together into the campe, in qualitie either of lieutenants or of colonels over a thousand foot, to the end that they might have the testimonie of other captaines and expert warriours indeed, whether of them twaine performed his service and devot better. Being created consull, he deprived a young gallant of his horse, for that being given excessively to feast and make good chere, whiles the citie of Carthage was besieged, he had caused a certaine matchpaine to be made by pastry-work in forme of a citie, and called it Carthage, and when he had so done, set it upon the boord to be spoiled and sacked (forsooth) by his companions; and when this youth would needs know of him why he was thus disgraced and degraded, as to lose his horse of service, which was allowed him from the State: Because (quoth he) you will needs rise and pill Carthage before me. During the time that he was consull, he seeing one day C. Licinius as he passed by: Now surely I knew this man (quoth he) for a perjured person, but for that there is none to accuse him, I will not be both his judge and a witness also to give evidence against him. Being sent by the Senate a third commissioner with other Triumvirs, according as Cicero said:

to visit also and looke into the States of cities, nations, and kings: When he was arrived at Alexandria, and disembarked, as he came first to land, he went hooded as it were with his robe cast over his head; but the Alexandrians running from all parts of the citie to see him, requested him to discover his head, that his face might be the better scene; and he had no sooner uncovered his visage, but they all cried out with great acclamations, applauding and clapping their hands in signe of joy. And when the king himselfe of Alexandria streined and strived with great paine, so grosse (so idle, and delicate he was otherwife) to keepe pace with him and the other commissioners, as they walked, Scipio rounded Panetius softly in the eare and said: The Alexandrians have reaped already the fruite, and enjoyed the benefit of my voyage, for that by our meanes they have scene their king to walke and go afoot. There accompanied him in this voyage a friend of his and a Philosopher named Panetius, and five servitors besides to wait upon him, and when one of these five hapned to die in this journey, he would not buy another in a foraine country for to supply his place, but sent for one to Rome, to serve in his turne. It seemed to the people of Rome that the Numantines were invincible and inexpugnable, for that they had vanquished and defeated so many captaines and leaders of the Romans: whereupon they chose this Scipio Consull the second time for to manage this warre; now when many a lustie young gallant made meanes and prepared to follow him in this service, the Senat entreated them, alleging colourably, that Italy thereby should be left destitute of men for the defence of the country, what need soever should be: so they would not suffer him to take that money out of the treasure which was prest and ready for him, but assigned and ordered certaine monies from the Publicanes and fermers of the cities customes and revenues to furnish him, whose daies of payment were not yet come: As for money (quoth Scipio) I stand not in such need thereof, that I should stay therefore, for out of mine owne and my friends purses I shall have sufficient to defray my charges, but I complaine rather that I may not be allowed to levie & leade forth my souldiers such as I would, and be willing to serve, considering that it is a dangerous warre which we are to wage; for if it be in regard of our enemies valour, that our people have so often bene beaten and spoiled by them, then we shall finde it a hot peece of service and a hard, to encounter such; but if it be long of our owne mens cowardize, no lesse difficult will it be, because we are to fight with the slender helpe of such. When he was newly arrived at the campe, he found there great disorder, much loosenesse, superstition, and wastfull superfluity in all things; so he banished presently all diviners, prophets, and tellers of fortune; he rid out of the way all sacrificing priests, all bauds likewise that kept brothel-houses he chafed forth: and he gave straight charge that every man should send away all manner of vessels and utensils, save onely a pot or kettle to seeth his meat in, a spit to roast, and a drinking juggle of earth; & as for silver plate, he allowed no man more in all than weighed two pounds: he put downe all baines and stoupes, but if any were disposed to be annointed, he gave order that every man should take paine to rubbe himselfe; for he said that beasts who had no hands of their owne, needed another for to rub and currie them: he ordained that his souldiers should take their dinner standing, and ate their meat not hot and without fire, but at supper, they might sit downe who that list, and feed upon bread or single grewell and plaine pottage, together with one simple dish of flesh either boiled or rost: as for himselfe he wore a cassocke or souldiers coat all blacke, buttoned close or buckled before, saying; That he mourned for the shame of his armie. He met with certaine garrons and labouring beasts belonging to one Aemilius, a colouel of a thousand men, carying drinking cups and other plate enriched with precious stones, and wrought curiously by the hands of Thericles; whereupon he said unto him: Thou hast made thy selfe unfit to serve me and thy countrey for these thirtie daies, being such an one as thou art, and surely being given to these superfluities, thou art disabled for doing thy selfe good all the daies of thy life. Another there was, who shewed him what a trim shield or target he had, finely made and richly adorned; Here is a faire & goodly shield indeed (quoth he) my young man, but I tell thee, a Romane souldier ought to trust his right hand better than his left. There was one who carying upon his shoulder a bunch of pales, or burden of stakes for to pitch in the rampar, complained that he was over-laden: Thou art but well enough served (quoth he,) in that thou reposest more confidence in these stakes than in thy sword. Seeing his enemies the Numantines how they grew rash, desperate, and foolishly bent, he would not in that fit charge upon them and give battell, but held off still, saying: That with tract of time he would buy the point to have put all the Mamertines to the sword, for that they banded against Sylla; but Sthenis one of the inhabitants, an oratour, and a man that could doe much with the people, and lead them with his persuasive orations, said unto him: That it were not well, that for one mans fault he should cause so many innocents to die; for I (quoth he) am the onely man culpable, and the cause of all this mischief, having by my persuasions induced my friends, & with threats forced mine enemies to take part with Marius and follow his slander: Pompeius wondering at this resolute remonstrance of his, said: That he was content to pardon the Mamertines, who suffered themselves to be ledde and perswaded by such a personage, as held the safetie of his owne countrey more deare than his owne life; and so he forgave the whole city and Sthenis himselfe. After this, being passed over sea into Africa against Domitius, and having woonne the field, in a great battell, when his souldiers saluted him by the name of Emperour or Sovereigne captain 10 generally, he said unto them: That he would not accept of that honourable title, so long as the rampar about his enemies campe stood; he had no sooner said the word, but they ranne all at once to this service, notwithstanding it was a great shewre of raine, plucked downe the palliada, mounted over the rampar, entered the campe and lacked it. At his returne home, Sylla made exceeding much of him otherwise, and did him great honour, but among many other, he was the first man that stiled him with the surname of Magnus: howbeit, when he minded to enter triumphant into Rome, Sylla would have hindered him, alledging for his reason: That he was not as yet admitted and sworn a Senator: whereat Pompeius turning to those that were present: It seemeth (quoth he) that Sylla is ignorant how there be more men that worships him 20 rising than setting: which words when Sylla heard, he cried out with a loud voice: Let him triumph a Gods name, for I see well he will have it: and yet for all that, Servilius a man of the senators degree, withstood his triumph, & tooke great indignation against him; yet, & many of his own souldiers set themselves against him and dashed it quite, if they might not have certaine gifts and rewards, which they pretended were due unto them: but Pompeius said with a cleere & audible voice: That he would sooner leave triumph and all, than to be so base minded as to flatter and make court unto his souldiers: at which words Servilius said unto him: By this now I see well 30 Pompeius that thou art truly named Magnus, a Great, & worthy indeed to triumph. There was a custome at Rome, that the knights or gentlemen, after they had served in the warres the complete time set downe and limited by the lawes, should present their horses in the market place before the two reformers of maners, called Censours, and there openly recount and relate unto them in what warres or battels they had fought, and the captaines under whom they had borne armes, to the end that according to their demerits they might receive condigne praise or blame. It so fell out that Pompeius being consull, himselfe led his owne horse of service by the bridle, and presented him before Gellius and Lentulus, censours for the time being; and when they according to the order and manner in that behalfe, demanded of him whether he had served in the warres so many yeeres as the law required: Even all (quoth he) fully, and that under my selfe, the soveraigne commander at all times. Being in Spain, he light upon certaine papers and writings of Sertorius, wherein were many letters missive sent from the principall Senators of Rome, and namely such as solicited and called Sertorius to Rome, for to raise some innovations, and make a change in the State: these letters he flung all into the fire, giving them occasion and opportunitie by this meanes, who intended mischief and were ill bent, to change their minds, repent and amend. Phraates king of the Parthians sent unto him certaine ambassadors to request him that he would not passe over the river Euphrates, but to make it the middle frontier & bound betwene them both: Nay rather (quoth Pompeius) let justice be the indifferent limit betwene the Parthians and the Romans. L. Lucullus, alter he was returned from his warres and conquests, gave himselfe over excessively to all pleasures, and to live most sumptuously, reprooving Pompeius for this: That hee desired alwaies from time to time more and more, great charges and employments even above his age, and unfitting those yeeres of his: unto whom Pompeius made this answer: That it was a thing more unbecoming olde yeeres, for a man to abandon himselfe to delights and pleasures, than to attend the weightie affaires of the common weale. upon a time when he was sicke, the Physicians prescribed that he should eat of a blacke-bird; great laying there was in many places for that bird, but none could be found, for that it was not their season nor the time of the yeere; but one there was, who said that if he would send to Lucullus, he might have of them, for he kept them in mure all the yeere long: And what needs that (quoth he) can not Pompeius recover and live, if Lucullus were not a waster and a delicate given to belly-cheere? and so leaving the Physicians prescript diet, hee composed and framed himselfe himselfe to eat that which was ordinary and might be found in every place. In regard of a great famine and scaritie of corne and victuals at Rome, he was ordeined in outward shew of words, the grand purveyor or generall superintendent and over-seeer for victuals, but in effect and authority, lord indeed both of sea and land: by which occasion he made voiaiges into Affricke, Sardinia and Sicilie, where, after he had provided a mightie deale of corne, he intended presently to have returned with all speed to Rome; but there arose a terrible tempest, inso much as the pilots and mariners themselves made no haste to goe to sea and set saile; but he in his owne person embarked first, and when he was on ship-board, he commanded to weigh anchor, saying with a loud voice: Saile we needs must, there is no remedie, but to live there is not such necessitie. When the quarrell betwene him and Cesar was broken out and fully discovered, there was one 10 Marc'ellinus, (a man that before-time had bene advanced by him, & yet afterwards turned to the adverse part and faction of Cesar) who in a frequent assembly of the Senate, charged and challenged him to his face for many things, and spake spitefull words against him: Pompeius could not holde, but answered him thus: But heist not thou Marc'ellinus, in this open place to miscall and raile upon me, who have made thee eloquent, whereas before thou couldst not speake at all? who have fed thee full, even untill thou be ready to cast up thy stomacke, where before thou wert hungry and ready to pine for famine? Unto Cato, who chide and reprooved him sharply for that he would never beleieve his words, when he fore-tolde him many times, that the puissance and increase of Cesar's State, unto whom he lent his hand, would one day greatly prejudice 20 and hurt the weale-publique, he answered: Your counsell indeed was wiser, but mine more loving and friendly. In speaking of himselfe freely, he said: That all offices of State he both entered sooner upon than he looked himselfe; and also forwent them before it was expected that he would. After the battell of Pharsalia when he fled into Aegypt, and was to passe out of his gally into a little barke or fisher boat, which the king had sent unto him for to bring him to land, he turning unto his wife and sonne, said no more but this verse out of Euripides:

Who once in court of Tyrant serve, become

His sives anon, though free they thither come.

Being passed over in this barke, after he had received one blow with a sword, he gave onely a sigh and groane, and without saying one word, he covered his owne face with his garment, and 30 yielded himselfe to be killed.

CICERO the great oratour was mocked of some for that surname of his which alludeth unto a Cich-pease; in so much as his friends gave him counsell to change his name: but hee contrariwise said, that he would make the name of the Ciceroes more noble and renowned, than the Caroes, the Caruli, or the Scauri. He offered unto the gods a goodly faire vessell of silver, in which he wist to be engraven his two fore-names, Marcus and Tullius in letters; but for the third, to wit, Cicero his surname, hee commaunded to bee embossed or chased the forme of a Cich-pease. He said that those oratours who used to straine their voices, and crie aloud in the pulpit, were privie to their owne weakenesse and insufficiency otherwise, and had recourse to this one helpe, like as creples and lame-folke to their horses for to mount upon. 40 Perres had a sonne disdained for the abuse of his bodie in the floure of his youth; and yet he said Perres stucke not to flaunder Cicero and raile upon him, even to these broad and foule tearmes, as to call him a filthy wanton and a buggeror; whereto Cicero answered thus: Thou dost not know, that it were more seemly to rebuke thy children for this within doores in some secret part of thy house close shut. Marc'ellus one day in debating and contesting with him said: Thou hast brought more to their death by thy testimonies and depositions, than thou hast saved with all thy good pleading: I confesse as much (quoth Cicero againe) for I have more truth and fidelitie in me by farre, than eloquence. The same Metellus demanded of him who was his father, reproching him (as it were) thereby that he was a new upstart, and a gentleman of the first head: unto whom readily thy mother hath made this question more hard on thy part to be answered: now was Metellus his mother thought to be an unchast woman and naught of her bodie; and Metellus himselfe was counted a vaine braine-sicke and slipperie fellow, given over to his wanton lusts and desires. This Metellus had caused to be set upon the sepulchre of one Diodorus, who had bene his master sometime to teach him Rhetoricke, the portraiture of a crow in stone: whereupon Cicero tooke occasion to come upon him in this wise: A just recompence in deed and fit for him, because he hath taught this man to stie and not to speake. **Valerius* was a lewd man, and his adversarie: now a rumour ran abroad that he was dead; but afterwards when he found it to be a false brute: A mischief take him for me 50 (quoth (quoth Cicero) that made this lie first. There was one supposed to be an Africane borne, who said unto him: That he heard him not when he spake: I marvel at that (quoth Cicero) considering thine eares be bored as they are and have holes in them. C. Popilius would have bene taken and reputed for a great lawyer, although he had no law in the world in him; and was besides a man of very grosse capacity: this man was served with a writ to appear in the court for to beare witnesse of a truth, touching a certaine fact in question; but he answered: That he knew nothing at all: True (quoth Cicero;) for peradventure you meane of the law, and thinke that you are asked the question of it. Hortensius the orator, who pleaded the cause of Verres, had received of him for a fee or a gentle reward, a jewel with the portraiture of Sphinx in silver: it fell out to, that Cicero chanced to give out a certaine darke and ambiguous speech: As for mee (quoth Hortensius) I can not tell what to make of your words, for I am not one that useth to solve riddles and enigmaticall speeches: Why man (quoth Cicero) and yet you have Sphinx in your house. He met upon a time with Vocconius and his three daughters, the foulest that ever looked out of a pair of eies: at which object he spake softly to his friends about him:

In sight of Phoebus, and when he would it not.*

Faustus the sonne of Sylla was in the end so farre endebed, that he exposed his good to be sold in open sale, and caused billes to be set up on posts in every quarefour to notifie the same: Yea many (quoth Cicero) I like these billes and <sup>s</sup> proscriptiōs better than those that his father published before him. When Cesar and Pompey were entred into open warre one against another: I know full well (quoth Cicero) whom to flie, but I wot not unto whom to flie. He found great fault with Pompey in that he left the citie of Rome, and that he chose rather in this case to imitate the policy of Themistocles than of Pericles, saying: That the present state of the world resembled rather the time of Pericles, than of Themistocles. Hee drew at first to Pompey side, and being with him, repented thereof. When Pompey asked him where he had left Piso his son-in-law; he answered readily: Even with your good father-in-law; meaning Cesar. There was one who departed out of Cesar's campe unto Pompey, and said: That he had made such haste, that hee left his horse behinde him: Thou canst skill (I perceive) better to save thy horses life than thine owne. Unto another, who brought word that the friends of Cesar looked foure and unpleasant: Thou saiest (quoth he) as much as if they thought not well of his proceedings. After the battell of Pharsalia was lost, and that Pompey was already fled, there was one Nomus who came unto him, and willed him not to despair, but be of good cheere, for that they had yet seven eagles left, [which were the standards of the legions:] Seven eagles (quoth he;) that were somewhat indeed, if we had to warre against jayes & jackdaws. After that Cesar, upon his victorie, being lord of all, had caused the statues of Pompey which were cast done, to be set up againe with honor: Cicero said of Cesar: In setting up these statues of Pompey, he hath pitched his owne more surely. He so highly esteemed the gift of eloquence and grace of well speaking, yea, and he tooke to great paines with ardent affection, for to performe the thing, that having to plead a cause onely before the Centumvirs or hundred judges, and the day set downe being neere at hand for the hearing and triall thereof; when one of his servants Eros, brought him word that the cause was put off to the next day, <sup>h</sup> he was so well contented and pleased therewith, that incontinently he gave him his freedome for that newes.

Caius Caesar, at what time as he being yet a young man, fled and avoided the furie of Sylla, fell into the hands of certaine pirates or rovers, who at the first demanded of him no great summe of money for his ranfome, whereat hee mocked and laughed at them, as not knowing what maner of person they had gotten; and so of himselfe promised to pay them twice as much as they asked; and being by them guarded and attended upon very diligently, all the while that he sent for to gather the said summe of money which he was to deliver them, he willed them to keepe silence and make no noise, that he might sleepe and take his repose: during which time that he was in their custodie, he exercised himselfe in writing a swell verse as prose, and read the same to them when they were composed; and if hee saw that they would not praise and commend those poems and orations sufficiently to his contentment, he would call them senselesse fots and barbarous, yea, and after a laughing maner, threaten to hang them: and to say a truth, within a while after, he did as much for them: for when his ranfome was come, and he delivered once out of their hands, he levied together a power of men and ships from out of the coasts of Africa, set upon the said rovers, spoiled them and crucified them. Being returned to Rome, and having enterprised a sute for the soveraign Sacerdotts dignitie against Catulus, who was then then a principall man at Rome; whereas his mother accompanied him as farre as to the utmost gates of his house, when he went into Mars field where the election was held, he took his leave of her and said: Mother you shall have this day your sonne to be chiefe Pontifice and high priest, or else banished from the citie of Rome. He put away his wife Pompeia, upon an ill name that went of her, as if she had bene naught with Clodius: whereupon when Clodius afterwards was called into question judicially for the fact, and Cesar likewise convented into the court, peremptorily for to beare witnesse of the truth, being examined upon his oath, he sware that he never knew any ill at all by his wife: and when he was urged and replied upon againe, wherefore he had put her away? he answered: That the wife of Cesar ought not onely to be innocent and cleere of crime, but also of all suspition of crime. In reading the noble acts of Alexander the great, the teares trickled downe his cheeks; and when his friends desired to know the reason why he wept: At my age (quoth he) Alexander had vanquished & subdued Darius, and I have yet done nothing. As he passed along through a little poore towne situate within the Alpes; his familiar friends about him, merrily asked one another whether there were any factions and contentions in that burrough, about superiortie, and namely, who should be the chiefe? whereupon he staid suddenly; and after he had studied and mused a while within himselfe: I had rather (quoth he) be the first here, than the second in Rome. As for haucie & adventurous enterprises, he was wont to say: They should be executed & not consulted upon: and verily when he passed over the river Rubicon, which divideth the province of Gaul from Italy, for to leade his power against Pompey: Let the Die (quoth he) be thrown for all: as if he would say: * This cast for it, there is but one chance to lose all. When Pompey was fled from Rome to the sea side, and Metellus the superintendent of the publike treasure, would have hindred him for taking fourth any money from thence, keeping the treasure house fast shut, he threatened to kill him; whereat Metellus seeming to be amazed at his adacious words: Tush, tush, (quoth he) good young man, I would thou shouldst know that it is harder for me to speake the word, than to doe the deed. And for that his soldiours staid long ere they were transported over unto him from Brundisium, to Dyrhachium, he embarked himselfe alone into a small vessell, without the knowledge of any man who he was purposing to passe the seas alone without his company; but it hapned so, that he was like to have bene cast away in a gulf, and drowned with the waves of the sea: whereupon he made himselfe knowne unto the pilot, and spake unto him aloud: Assurance thy selfe and rest confident in fortune, for wor well thou hast Cesar a ship board: howbeit for that time he was impeached that he could not crosse the seas, as well in regard of the tempest which grew more violent, as also of his souldiers who ran unto him from all sides, and complained unto him for griefe of heart, saying: That he offered them great wrong to attend upon other forces, as if he distrusted them. Not long after this he fought a great battell, wherein Pompey had the upper hand for a time, but for that he followed not the train of his good fortune, he retired into his campe; which when Cesar saw, he said: The victorie was once this day our enemies, but their head and captaine knew not so much. Upon the plaines of Pharsalia, the very day of the battell, Pompey having arranged his army in array, commanded his soldiours to stand their ground, and not to advance forward, but to expect their enemies, and receive the charge; wherein Cesar afterwards said: He did amisse and grossely failed, for that thereby he let slack as it were the vigor & vehemencie of his soldiours which is ministred unto the violence of the first onfet, & abated that heat also of courage which the said charge would have brought with it. When he had defeated at his very first encounter, Pharnaces king of Pontus, he wrote thus unto his friends: I came, I saw, I vanquished. After that Scipio and those under his conduct were discomfited and put to flight in Africa; when he heard that Cato had killed himselfe, he said: I envie thy death O Cato, for that thou hast envied me the honour of saving thy life. Some there were who had Antonie and Dolabella in jealousy and suspition, and when they came unto him and said: That he was to looke unto himselfe, and stand upon his good guard; he made them this answer: That he had no distrust nor feare of them, who ledde an idle life, be well coloured and in so good liking as they: But I feare (quoth he) these pale and leane fellows pointing unto Brutus and Cassius. One day as he sat at the table when speech was moved and the question asked, what kind of death was best? Even that (quoth he) which is sudden and least looked for.

Cesar, him I meane who first was surnamed Augustus, being as yet in his youth, required and claimed of Antonie as much money as amounted to two thousand and five hundred * Myriades, which he had transported out of Julius Caesar's house after he was murthered, and got ten into his owne hands; for that he intended to pay the Romans that which the said Cæsar had bequeathed unto them by his last will and testament: for he had left by legacie unto every citizen of Rome 75. * drams of silver; but Antonie detained the said summe of money to himselfe, and answered young Cæsar, that if he were wife he should desist from demanding any such monies of him: which when the other heard, he proclaimed open port sale of all the goods that came to him by his patrimonie, & in deed sold the same; and with the money raised thereof, he satisfied the foresaid legacies unto the Romanes: in which doing he wan all the hearts of the citizens of Rome to himselfe, & brought their evill wil and hatred upon Antonie. Afterwards Metellus king of Thracia left the part of Anronius, and turned to his side; but he overthor himselfe so much at the table, being in his cups, and namely, in that he could talke of nothing else, but of this great good service, and casting in his teeth this worthy alliance and confederacie of his, so as he became odious therefore; in somuch as one time at supper Cæsar taking the cup, dranke to one of the other kings who sat at the boord, saying with a loud voice: Treason I love well, but traitors I hate. The Alexandrians after their cite was woonne, looked for no better than to suffer all the extremities and calamities that might follow upon the forcing of a city by assault: but this Cæsar mounting up into the publike place to make a speech unto the citizens, having neere by unto him a familiar friend of his; to wit Arus, an Alexandrian borne; pronounced openly a generall pardon, saying that he forgave the cite: first, in regard of the greatness and beautie thereof; secondly in respect of king Alexander the great their first founder: and thirdly for Arus his sake, who was his loving friend, understanding that one of his Procurators named Eros, who did negotiate for him in Aegypt, had bought a quail of the game, which in fight would beat all other quails, and was never conquered himselfe, but continued still invincible; which quail notwithstanding, the said slave had caused to be roasted and so eaten it: he sent for him and examined him thereupon whether it was true or no? and when he confessed Yea, he commanded him presently to be crucified and nailed to the mast of his ship. He placed Arus in Stellie for his agent and procuratour, in stead of one Theodorus: and when one presented unto him a little booke or bill wherein were written these words, Theodorus of Tharsis * the bauld is a theefe, how thinke you is he not? when he had read this bill, he did nothing else but subscribe underneath: I thinke no lesse. He received yeerely upon his birth day from Mecenas (one of his familiar friends who conversed daily with him) a cup for a present. Athenodorus the Philosopher being of great yeeres, craved licence with his good favour to retire unto his owne house from the court, by reason of his old age; and leave he gave him, but at his farewell, Athenodorus said unto him: Sir, when you perceive your selfe to be mooved with choler, neither say do nor ought before you have repeated to your selfe all the 24. letters in the Alphabet: Cæsar hearing this advertisement, tooke him by the hand: I have need still (quoth he) of your company and presence, and so retained him for one yeere longer, saying withall this verse,

*The hire of silence now I see
Is out of perill and jeopardie.*

Having heard that King Alexander the Great at the age of two and thirtie yeeres, having performed most part of his conquests, was in doubt with himselfe and perplexed what to do and how to be employed afterwards: I wonder (quoth he) that Alexander thought it not a more difficult matter to governe and preserve a great empire after it is once gotten, than to winne and conquer it at first. When he had enacted the law Julia as touching adulterie, wherein is set downe determinately the manner of proesse against those that be attaint of that crime, and how such are to be punished who be convicted thereof: it hapned that through impatience and heat of choler, he fell upon a young gentleman, who was accused to have committed adulterie with his daughter Julia, in so much as he buffeted him well and thorowly with his owne fists: the young man thereupon cried unto him: Your selfe have made a law, Cæsar, which ordaineth the order and forme of proceeding against adulteries: whereat he was so dismasted & abashed, yea and so repented himselfe of this misfeatiage, that he would not that day eat any supper. When he sent his nephew or daughters sonne Caius into Armenia, he praised unto the gods to accompanie him with that good will of all men which Pompey had, with the valiantnesse of Alexander the Great, and with his owne good fortune. He said, that he left unto the Romans for to succeed him in the empire, one who never in his life had consulted twise of one thing, meaning Tyberius. Minding to appease certaine young Romane gentlemen of honour and authoritie, who made a great noise and stirre in his presence; when he saw that for all his first admonitions he could do no good, he said unto them: Young gentlemen give care unto me an old man, whom when I was young as you are, ancient men would give care unto. The people of Athens had offended and done him some displeasure, unto whom hee wrote in this wise: You are not ignorant (I suppose) that I am displeased with you, for otherwise I would not have wintered in this little isle Aegina: and more than thus, he neither did nor said afterwards unto them. When one of Enrycles his accusers had at large with all libertie and licentiousnesse of speech uttered against him (without any respect) what he would, he let him run on still, untill he came to these words: And if these matters (Cæsar) seeme not unto you notorious and heinous, command him to rehearse unto me the seventh booke of Thucydides: Cæsar offended now at his audacious impudencie, commanded him to be had away and led to prison; but being advertised that he was the onely man left of the race and line of captaine Brasidas hee sent for him, and after he had given him some few good admonitions, he let him goe. Pto had build him a most stately and magnificent house, even from the foundation to the roofof thereof, which when Cæsar saw he said: It rejoiceth my heart exceedingly to see thee build thus, as if Rome should continue world without end.

Lutarch had in the collection precedent among the Apophthegmes of renowned Greeks, mingled certaine notable sayings of King Agelilaus and other Lacedæmonians: but now he exhibiterh unto us a treatise by himselfe of the said Lacedæmonians, who deserve no doubt to be registred apart by themselves, as being a people who (of all other nations destitute of the true knowledge of God) least abused their tongue, in which regard also he maketh a more ample description of their Apophthegmes, shewing sufficiently by so many pleasant speeches and lively reencounters, that it was no marvell, if so small a State (as Sparta was) flourished so long, being governed and peopled by men of such dexterity, and so well qualified in the parts both of bodie and minde, and yet who knew better to do than to say. Moreover, this Catalogue here is distinguished into foure principall portions: whereof the first representeth the most wise speeches of Kings, Generall captaines, Lords and men of name in Lacedæmon: the second containeth the Apophthegmes of such Lacedæmonians, whose names are unknowne: the third describeth chiefly the customes & ordinances which serve for the maintenance of their estate: and the fourth compriseth certaine sayings of some of their women, wherein may be seene so much the more the valour & magnanimitie of that nation. As touching the profit that a man may draw out of these Apophthegmes it is verie great in everie respect: neither is there any person of what age or condition soever, but he may learne herein verie much, and namely, how to speake little, to say well, and to carie himselfe vertuously, as the reading thereof will make prooffe. We have noted also and observed somewhat in the margin, not particularising upon everie point; but onely to give a taste and appetite unto the Reader for to moderate better thereof, and to apply unto his owne use, both it and all thereto which he may there comprehend and understand.

LACONICKE APOPH- thegmes, or the notable sayings of Lacedæmonians.

AGESILAUS a king of the Lacedæmonians, by nature given to heare and desirous to learne; when one of his familiar friends said unto him: I wonder sir since you take so great pleasure otherwise to heare men speake wel and eloquently, that you do not entertaine the famous sophister or rhetorician Philophanes for to teach you? made him this answer: It is because I desire* to be their scholar, whose sonne also I am, that is, among whom I am borne. And to another who demanded of him, how a prince could raigne in safetie, not having about him his guards for the suretie of his person; Marie (quoth he) if he rule his subjects as a good father governeth his children.

AGESILAUS the Great, being at a certaine feast, was by lot chosen the master of the said feast; and to him it appertained to let downe a certaine law, both in what manner and how much everie one ought to drinke; now when the butler or skinker asked him how much he should pour out for everie one, he answered: If thou be well provided and have good store of wine, fill out as much as everie man list to call for; but if thou have no great plentie of it, let everie guest have alike. There was a malefactor, who being in prison endured constantly before him all manner of torments; which when he saw: What a cruel wretch is this and wicked in the highest degree, who doth employ this patience and resolute fortitude in the maintenance of so shamefull and mischievous parts, as he hath committed! One highly praised in his presence a certaine master of Rhetoricke, for that he could by his eloquent tooing amplifie small matters, making them seeme great, whereupon he said: take him not to be a good flonaker, who putteth on a big shoe upon a slide foot. When one in reasoning & debating a matter upon a time challenged him, and said: Sir, you gave your consent once unto it; and eefoones iterating the same words, charged him with his grant and promise: True indeed (quoth he) if the cause were just, I approved it in good earnest & gave my promise; but if not, I did but barely say the word & no more: but as the other replied againe and said: Yea, but kings ought to accomplish & performe whatsoever they seeme once to grant, & it be but with the nod of the head: Nay (said he againe) they are no more bound thereto, than those that come unto them are tied for to speake and demand all things just and reasonable, yea, and to observe the opportunity and that which fitteth and forteth well with kings. When he heard any men either to praise or dispraise others, he said: That it beloveth to know the nature, disposition and behaviour no lesse of those who so spake, than of the parties of whom they did speake. Being whiles he was very yoong, at a certaine publicke and festivall solemnitie, wherein yoong boies daunced (as the maner was) all naked, the warden or overseer of the said shew and daunce, appointed him a place for to beholde that sight, which was not verie honourable; wherewith notwithstanding he stood well contented, albeit he was knowne to be heire apparent to the crowne, and already declared king; and withall said: It is very well; for I will shew, that it is not the place which crediteth the person, but the person that giveth credit and honour to the place. A certaine Physician had ordered for him in one sicknesse that he had, a course of phyllicke to cure his maladie, which was nothing easie and simple, but very exquisite, curious and withall painfull: By Cassor and Pollux (quoth he) if my destinie be not to live, I shal not recover though I take all the drogues and medicines in the world. Standing one day at the altar of Minerva surnamed Chaleceas, where he sacrificed an oxe, there chanced a louse to bite him; and he was nothing dismayed and abashed to take the said louse, but before them all who were present, killed her, and swore by the gods, saying: That it would do him good at the heart, so to serve them all so, who should treacherously lay wait to assaile him, yea, though it were at the very altar. Another time, when he saw a little boy drawing a mouse which he had caught, out of a window, and that the said mouse turned upon the boy and bit him by the hand, inasmuch as thoe made him leave his holde, and so escaped; hee shewed the sight unto those that were present about him, and said: Loc, if so little a beast and fillicie creature as this, hath the heart to be revenged upon those that doe it injurie, what thinke you is meet and reason that men should doe? Being desirous to make warre upon the king of Persia, for the deliverance and freedome of

of those Greeks who did inhabit Asia, he went to consult with the oracle of Jupiter within the forest Dodona, as touching this deffaigne of his: and when the oracle had made answer according to his minde, namely: That if it pleased him, he should enterprise that expedition; he communicated the same to the controllers of State called Ephori; who willed him also to goe forward, and aske the counsell likewise of Apollo in the citie of Delphos; and being there, he entered into the chapell from whence the oracles were delivered, and said thus: O Apollo, art thou also of the same minde that thy father is? and when he answered, Yea; whereupon hee was chosen for the generall to conduct this warre, and set forth in his voiage accordingly. Tissaphernes, lieutenant under the king of Persia in Asia, being astonied at his arrivall, made a composition and accord with him at the very first; in which treatie, he capitulated and promised to leave unto his behoofe, all the townes and cities of the Greeks which are in Asia, free and at libertie to be governed according to their owne lawes: meane while hee dispatched messengers in post to the king his master, who sent unto him a strong and puissant armie; upon the confidence of which forces he gave defiance, and denounced warre, unless he departed with all speed out of Asia: Agessilus being well enough pleased with this treacherous breach of the agreement, made semblant as though he would go first into Caria; and when Tissaphernes gathered his forces in those parts to make head against him, all on a sudden he invaded Phrygia, where he won many cities, and raised rich booties from thence, saying unto his friends: That to breake faith and promise unjustly made unto a friend, was impietie; but to abuse and deceive an enemy, was not onely just, but also pleasant and profitable. Finding himselfe weake in cavallery, he returned to the citie of Ephesus, where he intimated thus much unto the rich men, who were willing to be exempt from going in person unto the warres, that they should every one set forth one horse and a man: by which means within few daies, he levied a great number both of horse and also of men able for service, in stead of those that were rich and cowards; wherein he said: That he did imitate Agamemnon, who dispensed with a rich man who was but a dastard and durst not go to the warre, for one faire and goodly mare. When hee sold those prisoners for slaves, whom he had taken in the warres, the officers for this sale, by his appointment, made money of their clothes and other furniture apart, but of their bodies, all naked by themselves; now many chapmen there were, who willingly bought their apparell, but few or none had any minde to the persons themselves, for that their bodies were soft and white, as having bene delicately nourished and choisly kept within house and under covert, and so seemed for no use at all, and good for nothing: Agessilus standing by: Beholde my masters (quoth hee) this is that for which you fight, shewing their spoiles; but these be they against whom you fight, pointing to the men. Having given Tissaphernes an overthrow in batell within the country of Lydia, and slaine a great number of his men, he overran and harried all the kings provinces: and when hee sent unto him presents of gold and silver, praying him to come unto some agreement of peace, Agessilus made this answer: As touching the treatie of peace, it was in the citie of Lacedæmons power to doe what they would; but otherwise, for his owne part he tooke greater pleasure to enrich his soldiers than to be made rich himselfe: as for the Greeks, they repuned it an honour not to receive gifts from their enemies, but to be masters of their spoiles. Megabates the yoong sonne of Spiridates, who was of village most faire and beautifull, came toward him as it were to embrace and kisse him, for that he thought (as he was right amiable) to be exceedingly beloved of him; but Agessilus turned his face away, inasmuch as the youth desired and would no more offer himselfe unto him; whereupon Agessilus demanded the reason thereof, and seemed to call for him; unto whom his friends made answer: That himselfe was the onely cause, being afraid to kisse to faire a boy; but if he would not seeme to feare, the youth would returne and repaire unto him in place right willingly: upon this he stood musing to himselfe a good while, and said never a word; but then at length hee brake forth into this speech: Let him even alone, neither is there any need now that you should say any thing or perswade him; for mine owne part I count it a greater matter to be the conquerour, and have the better hand of such, than to win by force the strongest holde or the most puissant and populous citie of mine enemies; for I take it better for a man to preserve and save his owne libertie to himselfe, than to take it from others. Moreover, he was in all other things a most precise observer in every point, of whatsoever the lawes commanded, but in the affaires and businesse of his friends, he said: That straightly to keepe the rigour of justice, was a very cloake and colourable pretence, under which they covered themselves who were not willing to doe for their friends: to which purpose there is a little letter of his found written unto Idriem a prince of Caria, for the enlarging and deliverance of a friend of his, in these words: If

Nicias have not transgressed, deliver him; if he have, deliver him for the love of me; but howsoever, yet deliver him: and verily thus affected stood Agessius in the greatest part of his friends occasions; howbeit, there fell out some cases, when he respected more the publicke utility, & used his opportunity therefore, according as he shewed good prooffe. upon a time, at the dislodging of his campe in great haste & hurry, inso much as he was forced to leave a boy who he loved full well behind him; for that he lay sick: for when the partie called instantly upon him by name, & besought him not to forsake him now at his departure, Agessius turning backe, said: Oh how hard is it to be pitifull & wise both at once. Furthermore, as touching his diet & the cherishing of his bodie, he would not be served with more nor better than those of his traine and company. He never did eat untill he was satisfied, nor tooke his drinke untill he was drunke, and as for his sleepe, it never had the command and maister over him, but he tooke it onely as his occasions and affaires would permit: for cold and heat he was so fitted and disposed, that in all seasons of the yeere he used to weare but one and the same sort of garments: his pavilion was alwaies pitched in the mids of his soldiers, neither had he a bed to lye in, better than any other of the meanest: for he was wont to say: That he who had the charge and conduct of others, ought to surmount those private persons, who were under his leading not in daintinesse and delicacie, but in suiferance of paine and travell, and in fortitude of heart and courage. When one asked the question in his presence: What it was wherein the lawes of Lycurgus had made the citie of Sparta better? he answered: That this benefit it found by them; to make no reckoning at all of pleasures. And to another who marvelled to see so great simplicitie and plainnesse, as well in feeding as apparell both of him, and also of other Lacedæmonians, he said: The fruit (my good friend) which we reape by this straight manner of life, is libertie and freedome. There was one who exhorted him to ease and remit a little this straight and austere manner of living: For that (quoth he) it would not be used, but in regard of the incertitude of fortune; and because there may fall out such an occasion, and time as might force a man so to do: Yea but I (said Agessius) do willingly accustom my selfe hereto, that in no mutation and change of fortune, I should not seeke for change of my life. And in verie truth, when he grew to be aged, he did not for all his yeeres give over and leave his hardnes of life: and therefore when one asked him: Why (considering the extreame cold winter and his old age besides) he went without an upper coat or gabardine? he made this answer: Because young men might learne to do as much, having for an example before their eyes, the eldest in their country, and such also as were their governors. We reade of him, that when he passed with his armie over the Thasians countrey, they sent unto him for his refection meale of all sorts, geefe and other fowles, comfitures, and pastrie works, fine cakes, marchpanes, and sugar-meats, with all manner of exquisite viands, and drinks most delicate and costly: but of all this provision, he received none but the meale aforesaid; commanding those that brought the same, to carrie them all away with them, as things whereof he stood in no need, and which he knew not what to do with: In the end after they had bene verie urgent, and importuned him so much as possibly they could to take that curtesie at their hands, he willed them to deale all of it among the Ilots, which were in deed the slaves that followed the campe: whereupon when they demanded the cause thereof, he said unto them: That it was not meet for those who professed valour and prowesse to receive such dainties; Neither can that (quoth he) which serveth in stead of a bait to allure & draw men to a servile nature, agree wel with those who are of a bold and free courage. Over and besides, these Thasians having received many favours and benefits at his hands, in regard whereof they tooke themselves much bound and beholden unto him, dedicated temples to his honour, and decreed divine worship unto him, no lesse than unto a verie god, and hereupon sent an embassage to declare unto him this their resolution: when he had read their letters and understood what honour they minded to do unto him, he asked this one question of the embassadors; whether their State and countrey was able to desirre men? and when they answered, Yea: Then (quoth he) begin to make your selves gods first, and when you have done so, I will beleeve that you also can make me a god. When the Greeke Colonies in Asia, had at their parliaments ordained in all their chiefe and principall cities to erect their statues; he wrote backe unto them in this manner: I will not that you make for me any statue or image whatsoever, neither painted nor cast in mould, nor wrought in clay, ne yet cut and engraven any way. Seeing whiles he was in Asia, the house of a friend or hoste of his, covered over with an embowed rowe of planks, beames and sparres foure-square; he asked him whether the trees in those parts grew so square? and when he answered, No, but they grew round: How then (quoth he) if they had grown naturally foure cornered, would you have made them round? He was asked the question upon a time, how farre forth the marches and confines of Lacedæmon did extend: then he (taking a javelin which he held in his hand: Even as farre (quoth he) as this is able to goe. One demanded of him, why the citie of Sparta was not walled about? See you not (quoth he) the wallies of the Lacedæmonians; and therewith shewed him the citizens armed. Another asked him the like question, and he made him this answer: That cities ought not to be fortified with stones, with wood and timber, but with the prowesse and valiance of the inhabitants. He used ordinarily to admonish his friends, not to seeke for to be rich in money, but in valour and vertue. And whensoever he would have a worke to be finished, or service to be performed speedily by his soldiers; his maner was, to begin himselfe first to lay hand unto it in the face of all. He stood upon this and would glorie in it; that he travelled as much as any man in his company: but he vaunted of this; that he could rule and command himselfe more than in being a king. Unto one who wondering to see a Lacedæmonian maimed and lame, go to war, said unto the partie: Thou shouldst yet at leastwise have called for an horse to serve upon: Knowest not thou (quoth he) that in warre we have no need of those that will flie away, but of such as will make good and keepe their ground? It was demanded of him, how he wonne so great honour and reputation; In despising death (quoth he.) And being likewise asked why the Spartanes used the found of flutes when they fought? To the end (said he) that when in battell they march according to the measures, it may be known who be valiant and who be cowards. One there was who reputed the King of Persia happie, for that he attained verie young to so high and puissant a State: Why so (quoth he) for Priamus at his age was not unhappie nor unfortunate. Having conquered the greater part of Asia, he purposed with himselfe to make warre upon the king himselfe, as well for to breake his long repose, as also to hinder him otherwise and stop his course, who minded with money to bribe and corrupt the governors of the Greeke cities and the oratours that lead the people: but amid this desaigne and deliberation of his he was called home by the Ephori, by reason of a dangerous warre raised by the Greeke States, against the citie of Sparta, and that by meanes of great summes of money which the king of Persia had sent thither; by occasion whereof, forced he was to depart out of Asia, saying: That a good prince ought to suffer himselfe to be commanded by the lawes; and he left behinde him much sorrow and a longing desire after him among the Greeke inhabitants in Asia after his departure: and for that on the Persian pieces of coine, there was stamped or imprinted the image of an archer; he said when he brake up his campe, that the king of Persia had chased him out of Asia with thirtie thousand archers: for so many golden Dariques had bene carried by one Timoerates unto Thebes and Athens, which were divided among the oratours and governors of those two cities, by meanes whereof they were solicited and stirred to begin warre upon the Spartanes: so hee wrote a letter missive unto the Ephori, the tenor whereof was this: Agessius unto the Ephori, greeting. We have subdued the greatest part of Asia, and driven the Barbarians from thence; also in Ionie we have made many armours; but since you commaund me to repaiee home by a day appointed: Know yee that I will follow hard after this letter, or peradventure prevent it; for the authority of command which I have, I hold not for my selfe, but for my native countrey and coe'derates: and then in truth doth a magistrate rule according to right & justice, when he obiecth the lawes of his countrey & the Ephori, or such like as be in place of government within the city. Having crossed the straights of Hellepont, he entred into the countrey of Thrace, where he requested of no prince nor State of the Barbarians, passage; but sent unto every one of them, demanding whether he should passe as through the land of friends or enemies: And verily all others received him friendly, and accompanied him honorably as he journeyed through their countreies: onely those whom they call Troadians, (unto them as the report goeth, Xerxes himselfe gave presents, to have leave for to passe,) demanded of him for licence of quiet passage, a hundred talents of silver and as many women: but Agessius after a scoffing manner asked those who brought this message: And why doe not they themselves comewith you for to receive the money and women: so he led his armie forward; but in the way he encountered them well appointed, gave them battell, overthrew them, and put many of them to the sword, which done, he marched farther. And of the Macedonian king he demanded the same question as before; who made him this answer: That he would consult thereupon: Let him consult (quoth he) what he will, meane while we will march on: the king wondering at his hardinesse, stood in great feare of him, and sent him word to passe in peaceable and friendly maner. The Thessalians at the same time were confederate with his enemies: whereupon he forraied and spoiled their countreies as he went, and sent to the citie of Larissa two friends of his, Xenocles and Sythas,

to found them & see if they could practise effectually for to draw them, to the league and amity of the Lacedæmonians, but those of Larissa arrested those agents, and kept them in prison; whereupon all the rest taking great indignation, were of this minde, that Agesslaus could doe no lesse, but presently encampe himselfe and beleaguer the citie Larissa round about: but hee saide that for to conquer all Thessalie, he would not lesse one of those twaine: so upon composition and agreement, he recovered and got them againe. Being given to understand that there was a battell fought neere to Corinth, in which very few Lacedæmonians were slaine, but of Athenians, Argives, Corinthians and their allies, a great number: he was not once seeme to have taken any joy or contentment at the newes of the victorie; but sighed deeply from the bottom of his heart, saying: Alas for unhappie Greece, who hath herselfe destroyed so many men of her owne, as had beene sufficient in one battell to have defeated all the Barbarians at once. But when the Pharsalians came to set upon the taile of his armie in his march, and to doe them mischief and damage; with a force of five hundred horse, he charged and overthrew them; for which luckie hand, he caused a Trophie to be erected under the mountaines called Narthax; and this victorie of all others pleased him most, for that with so small a troupe and corner of his owne horsemen which himselfe put out and addrest against them, hee had given those the overthrow, who at all times vaunted themselves to be the best men at armes in the world. Thither came Diphridas, one of the Ephori unto him, being sent expresse from Sparta, with a commandement unto him, that incontinently he should with force and armes invade the countrey of Boeotia; and he although he meant and purposed of himselfe some time after to enter with a more puissant power; yet would he not disobey those great lords of the State, but sent for two regiments of ten thousand a peece, drawn out of those who served about Corinth, and with them made a rode into Boeotia, and gave battell before Coronae, unto the Thebans, Athenians, Argives, and Corinthians, where he wan the field: which, as witnesseth Xenophon, was the greatest and most bloudie battell that had beene fought in his time: but true it is, that hee himselfe was in many places of his body sore wounded, and then being returned home, notwithstanding so many victories and happie fortunes, hee never altered any jot in his owne person, either for diet or otherwise for the manner of his life. Seeing some of his citizens to vaunt and boast of themselves, as if they were more than other men, in regard that they nourished and kept horses of the game to runne in the race for the prize; he perswaded his sister named Cynisfa, to mount into her chariot, and to goe unto that solemnitie of the Olympick games, there to runne a course with her horses for the best prize; by which, his purpose was to let the Greekes know, that all this running of theirs was no matter of valour, but a thing of cost and expence, to shew their wealth only. He had about him Xenophon the philosopher, whom he loved and highly esteemed; him he requested to send for his sonnes to be brought up in Lacedæmon, and there to learne the most excellent and singular discipline in the world, namely, the knowledge how to obey and to rule well. Being otherwise demaunded, wherefore he esteemed the Lacedæmonians more happy then other nations: It is (quoth he) because they profess and exercise above all men in the world, the skill of obeying and governing. After the death of Lysander, finding within the city of Sparta great factions and much siding, which the saide Lysander incontinently after he was returned out of Asia had raised and stirred up against him, he purposed and went about to detect his lewdnesse, and make it appeere unto the inhabitants of Sparta, what a dangerous medler he had beene whiles he lived: and to this purpose having read an oration found after his decease among his papers, which Creon verily the Halicarnassian had composed; but Lysander meant to pronounce before the people in a general assembly of the citie, tending to the alteration of the State, and bringing in of many novelties, he was fully minded to have divulged it abroad: but when one of the auncient Senatours had read the said oration, and doubted the sequell thereof, considering it was so well penned, and grounded upon such effectually and perswasive reasons, hee gave Agesslaus counsell not to digge up Lysander againe, and take him as it were out of his grave, but to let the oration lie buried with him: whose advice he followed, and so rested quiet and made no more ado: and as for those who underhand crossed him and were his adversaries, he did not coure them opened, but practised and made meanes to send some of them forth as captaines into certaine forraign expeditions, and unto others to commit certaine publicke offices: in which charges they carried themselves so, as they were discovered for covetous & wicked persons, and afterwards when they were called into question judicially, hee shewed himselfe contrary to mens expectation to helpe them out of trouble, and succour them so, as that he gat their love and good wils, inasmuch as in the end there was not one of them his adversarie. One there was who requested him to write in his favour to his hostis and friends which he had in Asia, letters of recommendation; that they would defend and maintaine him in his rightfull cause: My friends (quoth he) use to doe that which is equitie and just, although I should write never a word unto them. Another shewed him the wals of a city how woondertull strong they were and magnificently built, asking of him whether he thought them not stately and faire: Faire (quoth he) yes no doubt, for women to lodge and dwell in, but not for men. A Megarian there was who magnified and highly extolled before him the city Megara: Yoong man (quoth he) and my good friend, your brave words require some great puissance. Such things as other men had in great admiration, hee would not seeme so much as to take knowledge of. Upon a time one Callipides an excellent plaier in Tragedies, who was in great name and reputation among the Greekes, inasmuch as all sorts of men made no small account of him, when he chanced to meet him upon the way, saluted him first, and afterwards presumptuously thrust himselfe forward to walke among others, with him, in hope that the king would begin to shew some lightsome countenance, and grace him; but in the end, seeing that it would not be, he was so bolde as to advance himselfe, and say unto him: Sir king, know you not me? and have you not heard who I am? Agesslaus looking wistly upon his face: Art not thou (quoth he) Callipides Deicelichus? (for so the Lacedæmonians use to call a jester or plaier.) He was invited one day to come and heare a man who could counterfeite most lively and naturally the voice of the nightingale; but he refused to go, saying: I have heard the nightingales themselves to sing many a time. Meneerates the Physician had a luckie hand in divers desperate cures; whereupon some there were who farnamed him Jupiter, and he himselfe would over arrogantly take that name upon him, inasmuch as he presumed in one letter of his, which he sent unto him, to set this superscription: Meneerates Jupiter, unto king Agesslaus witheth long life: but Agesslaus wrote back unto him in this wise: Agesslaus to Meneerates witheth good health. When Pharnabazus and Conon the high-admirals of the armada under the Persian king, were so farre forth lords of the sea, that they pillied and spoiled all the coasts of Laconia; and besides, the walles of Athens were rebuilt with the money that Pharnabazus furnished the Athenians withall; the lords of the counsell of Lacedæmon were of advice, that the best policie was, to conclude peace with the king of Persia; and to this effect sent Antalcidas one of their citizens to Tiribazus, with commission treacherously to betray and deliver into the barbarous kings hands, the Greekes inhabiting Asia; for whose libertie Agesslaus before had made warres: by which occasion Agesslaus was thought to have had his hand in this shameful and infamous practise: for Antalcidas, who was his mortall enemy, wrought by all meanes possible to effect peace, because he saw that warre continually augmented the credit of Agesslaus, and made him most mightie and honourable; yet nevertheless he answered unto one that reproched him with the Lacedæmonians, saying: That they were Medified, or turned Medians: Nay rather (quoth he) the Medians are Laconified and become Laconians. The question was propounded unto him upon a time, whether of these two vertues in his judgement was the better, Fortitude or Justice? and he answered: That where Justice reigned, Fortitude bare no sway, and was nothing worth; for if we were all righteous and honest men, there would be no need at all of Fortitude. The people of Greece dwelling in Asia, had a custome to call the king of Persia, The great king: And wherefore (quoth he) is he greater than I, unless he be more temperat and righteous? semblably he said: That the inhabitants of Asia were good slaves, but naughty freemen. Being asked how a man might win himselfe the greatest name and reputation among men, he answered thus: If he say well, and yet do better. This was a speech of his: That a good captaine ought to shew unto his enemies, valour and hardinesse; but unto those that be under his charge, love and benevolence. Another demaunded of him, what children should learne in their youth? That (quoth he) which they are to doe and practise when they be men grown. He was judge in a cause, where the plaintife had pleaded well, but the defendant so very badly; who estoones and at every sentence did nothing but repeat these words: O Agesslaus, a king ought to protect and helpe the lawes: unto whom Agesslaus answered in this wise: If one had so undetermined thy house, or robbed thee of thy raiment, wouldst thou thinke and looke that a carpenter or mason were bound to repaire thy house, and the weaver or tailour for to supply thy want of clothes? The king of Persia had writ unto him a letter missive after a general peace concluded; which letter was brought by a gentleman of Persia, who came with Callias the Lacedæmonian, and the contents thereof was to this effect: That the king of Persia desired to enter into some more especiall amitie and fraternitie with him; but he would not accept thereof, saying unto the messenger: Thou shalt deliver this answer from me unto the king thy masters; that hee needed notto write any such particular letters unto mee, concerning private friendship; for if hee friend the Lacedæmonians in generall, and shew himselfe to love the Greeks, and desire their good, I also reciprocally will be his friend to the utmost of my power; but if I may find that he practiseth treacherie, and attempteth ought prejudiciall to the state of Greece, well may he write epistle upon epistle, and I receive from him one letter after another, but let him trust to this: I will never be his friend. Hee loved very tenderly his owne children when they were little ones, inasmuch as he would play with them up and downe the house, yea, and put a long cane betwene his legs, and ride upon it like an hobby horse with them for company; and if it chanced that any of his friends spied him so doing, he would pray them to say nothing unto any man thereof, untill they had babes and children of their owne. But during the continuall warres that he had with the Thebans, hee was in one battell to be grievously wounded; which when Amaleidas saw, he said unto him: Certes you have received of the Thebans the due salarie and reward that you deserved, for teaching them as you have done, even against their willes how to fight, which they neither could nor ever would have learned to doe: for in truth it is reported, that the Thebans then became more martiall and warlike than ever before-time, as being inured and exercised in armes by the continuall roads and invasions that the Lacedæmonians made; which was the reason, that ancient Lycurgus in those lawes of his which he called Rhetæ, exprefly forbod his people to make warre often upon one and the same nation, for feare lest in so doing their enemies should learne to be good fouldiers. When hee heard, that the allies and confederates of Lacedæmon were offended and tooke this continuall warfare ill, complaining that they were never in maner out of armes, but caried their hamfells continually upon their backs; and besides, being many more in number, they followed yet the Lacedæmonians, who were but an handfull to all them: hee being minded to convince them in this, and to shew how many they were, commanded all his said confederates to assemble together, and to sit them downe pell-mell one with another; the Lacedæmonians likewise to take their place over-against them apart by themselves; which done, he caused an herald to cry aloud in the hearing of all: That all the potters should rise first; and when those were risen, that the brasse-founders and smithes should stand up; then the carpenters; after them the malons; and so all other artificers & handi-cratts men, one after another; by which meanes all the confederates wel-nere were risen up, and none in maner left sitting; but all this while not a Lacedæmonian stirred off his seat, for that forbidden they were all, to learne or exercise any mechanicall craft: then Agessilaus tooke up a laughter, and said: Lo, my masters and friends, how many more fouldiers are we able to send into the warres, than you can make? In that bloodie battell fought at Leuctres, many Lacedæmonians there were that ran out of the field & fled, who by the lawes and ordinances of the country were all their life time noted with infamy; howbeit, the Ephori seeing that the citie by this meanes would be dispeopled of citizens and lie desert, in that verie time when as it had more need than ever before of fouldiers, were desirous to devise a policie how to deliver them of this ignominie, and yet notwithstanding preferre the lawes in their entire and full force: therefore to bring this about, they elected Agessilaus for their law-giver, to enact new lawes; who being come before the open audience of the city, spake unto them in this manner: Yee men of Lacedæmon I am not willing in any wise to be the author and inventor of new lawes: and as for those which you have already, I minde not to put any thing thereto, to take fro, or otherwise to alter and change them, and therefore mee thinkes it is meete and reasonable, that from to morrow forward, those which you have, should stand in their full vigor, strength and vertue accustomed. Moreover, as few as there remained in the citie; (when Epaminondas was about to assaile it with a great fleet and a violent tempest (as it were) of Thebans and their confederates, puffed up with pride for the late victorie achieved in the plaine of Leuctres) with those few (I say) hee put him and his forces backe, and caused them to returne without effect: but in the battell of Mantineæ, he admonished and advised the Lacedæmonians to take no regard at all of other Thebans, but to bend their whole forces against Epaminondas onely, saying: That wise and prudent men alone, and none but they, were valiant and the sole cause of victorie; and therefore if they could vanquish him, they might easily subdue all the rest, as being blockish fooles and men in deed of no valour; and so in truth it proved: for when as the victorie now enclined wholly unto Epaminondas, and the Lacedæmonians were at the verie point to be disbanded, discomfited and put to flight: as the said Epaminondas turned for to call his owne men together to follow the rout, a Lacedæmonian chanced to give give him a mortall wound, wherewith hee fell to the ground, and the Lacedæmonians who were with Agessilaus called themselves, made head againe, and put the victorie into doubtfull ballance: for now the Thebans abated much their courage, and the Lacedæmonians tooke the better hearts. Moreover, when the citie of Sparta was neere driven and at a low ebbe for money to wage warre, as being constrained to entertaine mercenarie fouldiers for pay, who were meete strangers; Agessilaus went into Aegypt, being sent for by the King of Aegypt to serve as his pensioner; but for that hee was meanely and simply apparelled, the inhabitants of the country despised him, for they looked to have seene the King of Sparta richly arraigned and set out gallantly, and all gorgeously to be seene in his person like unto the Persian King; so foolish a conceit they had of kings: but Agessilaus shewed them within a while, that the magnificence and majestie of Kings was to be acquired by wit, wisdom, and valour: for perceiving that those who were to fight with him and to make head against the enemy, were frighted with the imminent perill, by reason of the great number of enemies, who were two hundred thousand fighting men, and the small companie of their owne side; hee devised with himselfe before the battell began, by some stratageme to encourage his owne men, and to embolden their hearts; which policie of his he would not communicate unto any person; and this it was: Hee caused upon the inside of his left hand to be written this word, Victorie, backward; which done hee tooke at the priests or sooth-saiers hand who was at sacrifice, the liver of the beast which was killed, and put it into the said left hand thus written within, and so held it a good while, making semblance as if hee mused deeply of some doubt, and seeming to stand in suspence & to be in great perplexity, untill the characters of the foresaid letters had a sufficient time to give a print, and leave their make in the superficies of the liver; then thewed hee it unto those who were to fight on his side, and gave them to understand that by those characters the gods promised victory: who supposing verily that there was in it a certaine signe & preface of good fortune, ventured boldly upon the hazard of a battell. And when the enemies had invested and beleaguered his campe round about; such a mightie number there were of them, and besides had begun to cast a trench on everie side thereof, King Nectanebus (for whose aid hee was thither come) solicited and intreated him to make a sally and charge upon them before the said trench was fully finished, and both ends brought together, he answered: That hee would never impeach the desceigne and purpose of the enemies, who went (no doubt) to give him meanes to be equall unto them and to fight so many to so many: so hee staid until there wanted but a verie little of both ends meeting; and then in that space betwene, hee raunged his battell; by which device they encountered and fought with even fronts, and on equall hand for number: so hee put the enemies to flight, and with those few fouldiers which hee had, hee made a great carnage of them; but of the spoile and booty which hee won, hee raised a good round masse of money, and sent it all to Sparta. Being now ready to embarke for to depart out of Aegypt, & upon the point of returne home, hee died: and at his death exprefly charged those who were about him, that they should make no image or statue whatsoever representing the similitude of his personage: For that (quoth he) if I have done any vertuous act in my life time, that will be a monument sufficient to eternize my memorie; if not, all the images, statues, and pictures in the world will not serve the turne, since they be the workes onely of mechanicall artificers which are of no woorth and estimation.

AGESIPOLIS the sonne of Cleombrotus, when one related in his presence that Philip K. of Macedon had in few daies demolished and rased the citie Olimbus: Par die (quoth he) Philip will not be able in many more daies to build the like to it. Another said unto him by way of reproch, that himselfe (king as he was, and other citizens men grown of middle age) were delivered as hostages, and neither their children nor wives: Good reason (quoth he) and so it ought to be according to justice, that we our selves and no others, should beare the blame and paine of our faults. And when hee was minded to fend for certaine dog-whelps from home; one said unto him; that there might not be suffered any of them to goe out of the country: No more was it permitted heeretofore (quoth hee) for men to be lead forth, but now it is allowed well enough.

AGESIPOLIS the sonne of Pausanias (when as the Athenians said to him: That they were content to report themselves to the judgement of the Megarians as touching certaine variations and differences between them, and complaints which they made one against another) spake thus unto them: Why my masters of Athen, this were a great shame indeed, that they who are the chiefe and the verie leaders of all other Greeks, should lesse skill what is just than the Megarians.

AGIS the sonne of Archidamus, at what time as the Ephori spake thus unto him: Take with you the yong & able men of this citie, & go into the countrey of such an one, for he wil conduct you his owne selfe, as farre as to the verie castle of his city: And what reason is it (quoth he) my masters, you that be Ephori, to commit the lives of so many lustie gallants into his hands, who is a traitour to his native countrey? One demanded of him what science was principally exercised in the citie of Sparta: Marie (quoth he) the knowledge how to obey and how to rule. He was wont to say, that the Lacedæmonians never asked, how many their enemies were? but where they were. Being forbidden to fight with his enemies at the battell of Mantineæ, because they were far more in number: He must of necessity (quoth he) fight with many that would have the command & rule of many. unto another who asked what number there might be in all of the Lacedæmonians? As many (quoth he) as are enough to chafe and drive away wicked perions. In passing a long the wals of Corinth when he saw them so high, so wel built, and so large in extent: What manner of women (quoth he) be they that inhabit within? To a great master of Rhetorick who praising his owne skill & profession, chaunced to conclude with these words: When all is done, there is nothing so puissant as the speech of man: Why then be like (quoth he) so long as you hold your peace you are of no worth. The Argives having bin once already beaten & defeated, returned nevertheless into the field & shewed themselves in a bravado more gallantly than before, and prest for a new battell: and when therupon he saw his auxiliaries and confederates to be somewhat troubled and frighted: Be of good cheere (quoth he) my masters and friends, for if we, who have given them the foile be affraid, what thinke you are they themselves. A certain embassador from the citie Abdera, came to Sparta, who made a long speech as touching his message, and after he had done and held his tongue a little, he demanded at last a dispatch, and said unto him: Sir, what answer would you that I should carry backe to our citizens: You shall say unto them (quoth Agis) that I have suffered you to speake all that you would, and as long as you list: and that I lent you mine eare all the while without giving you one word againe. Some there were who commended the Eliens for most iust men and precise in observing the solemnities of the Olympick games: And is that to great a matter and such a wonder (quoth he) if in five yeeres space they exercise justice one day? Some buzzed into his eares that those of the other roiall house envied him: Then (quoth he) doe they suffer a double paine; for first and foremost their owne evils will vex and trouble themselves; then in the second place, the good things in me and my friends will torment them. Some one there was of advice, that he should give way and passage to his enemies when they were put to flight: Yea, but marke this (quoth he) if we set not upon them who runne away for cowardise, how shall we fight against them that staie and make good their ground by valour? One there was who propounded a meanes for the maintenance of the Greekes libertie; which (no doubt) was a generous and magnanimous course, howbeit very hard to execute; unto who he answered thus: My good friend, your words require great store of money, and much strength. When another said that king Philip would watch them well enough that they should not set foote within other parts of Greece: My friend (quoth he) it shall content us to remaine and continue in our owne countrey. There was another embassador from the city Perinthus, came to Lacedæmon, who having likewise made a long oration, in the end demanded of Agis what answer he should deliver backe to the Perinthians: Marry what other but this (quoth he) that thou couldest hardly finde the way to make an end of speaking, and I held my peace all the while. He went upon a time sole embassador to king Philip, who said unto him: You are an embassador alone indeed: True (quoth he) and good enough to one alone as you are. An auncient citizen of Sparta said unto him one day, being himselfe aged also, and far sleet in yeeres: Since that the old lawes and customes went every day to ruine and were neglected, seeing also that others farre woofe were brought in and stood in their place, all in the end would be naught and runne to confusion; unto whom he answered merilie thus: Then is it at it should be, and the world goes well enough if it be so as you say; for I remember when I was a little boy, I heard my father say, that every thing then was turned upside downe, and that in his remembrance all went kim kam; and he also would report of his father that he had seene as much in his daies; no marvell therefore if things grow woofe and woofe; more wonder it were if they should one while be better, and another while continue still in the same plight. Being asked on a time how a man might continue free all his life time; he answered: By despising death.

AGIS the yonger, when Demades the oratour said unto him: That the Lacedæmonians swords were so short that these jugglers and those that plaid legerdmain, could swallow them downe downe all once, made him this answer: As short as they be the Lacedæmonians can reach their enemies with them wel enough. A certaine leud fellow and a troublesome, never limed asking him, who was the best man in all Sparta: Mary (quoth Agis) even he who is unlikest thy selfe.

AGIS, the last king of the Lacedæmonians, being forelaid and surprisid by treachery, so that he was condemned by the Ephori to die; as he was ledde without forme of law and justice to the place of execution for to be strangled with a rope, perceiving one of his servants and ministers to shed teares; said thus unto him; Weepe not for my death; for in dying thus unjustly and against the order of law, I am in better case than those that put me to death; and having said these words, he willingly put his necke within the halter.

ACROTATUS, when as his owne father and mother requested his helping hand for to effect a thing contrary to reason and justice, staied their sute for a time: but seeing that they importuned him still and were very instant with him; in the end said unto them: So long as I was under your hands, I had no knowledge nor fence at all of justice; but after that you had betaken me to the common weale, to my countrey, and to the lawes thereof, and by that meanes informed and instructed me in what you could in righteousnesse and honestie, I will endeavour and straine my selfe to follow the said instruction and not you; and for that I know full well that you would have me doe that which is good, and considering that those things be best (both for a private person, and much more for him who is in authoritie and a chiefe magistrate) which are iust; sure I will doe what you would have me, and refuse that which you say unto me.

ALCAMES the sonne of Telesus, when one would needs know of him, by what meanes a man might preserve a kingdome best, made this answer: Even by making no account at all of lucre and gaine. Another demanded of him wherefore he would never accept nor receive the gifts of the Messenians? Forsooth (quoth he) because if I had taken the, I should never have had peace with the lawes. And when a third person said: That he marvelled much how he could live to strait and neere to himselfe, considering he had wherewith and enough: It is (quoth he) a commendable thing, when a man having sufficient and plentie can nevertheless live within the compasse of reason, and not according to the large reach of his appetite.

ALEXANDRIDAS the sonne of Leon, seeing one to torment himselfe, and taking on desperately because he was banished out of his native countrey: My friend (quoth he) never fare so for the matter nor vex thy heart so much, for being constrained to remoove so farre from thy countrey, but rather for being<sup>1</sup> so remote from justice. unto another who in delivering good matter unto the Ephori, and to very great purpose, but in more words a great deale than need was: My friend (quoth he) thou speakest indeed that which becommeth, but otherwise than is becomming. One asked him why the Lacedæmonians committed the charge of all their lands unto the Ilotes their slaves, & did not husband and tend them their owne selves: Because (quoth he) we conquered and purchased them, for that we would looke to our selves, and not tend them. unto another who held that it was nothing but desire of credit and reputation that undid men, and whofoever could be delivered from the care thereof were happie; he replied thus againe: If it be true that you say, we must confesse and graunt that wicked men, who do wrong unto others are happy; for how can a church-robber or these who spoileth other men of their goods be desirous of honour and glorie? When another demanded of him, how it came to passe that the Lacedæmonians were so hardy and resolute in all occurrences and dangers of warre, he rendred this reason: Because (quoth he) we studie and endeavour to have a reverend regard of our lives, and not to enterraine the feare of our lives, as others doe. It was demanded of him, wherefore the Seniors or Elders sat many daies in deciding and judging criminall causes? and why albeit the accused party were by them acquit, yet he continued nevertheless in the state of a guiltie and accused person? As for the Seniors (quoth he) they be long in deciding capital matters, where men are brought in question for their life; because those judges who have committed an error in condemning a man to die, can never rectifie and amend that sentence: and as to the partie absolved and enlarged, he must remaine alwaies liable and subject to the law, because they might ever after enquire and judge better of his fact according to the law.

ANAXANDER the sonne of Emyrcates, being asked the question why he and such other did not gather money and lay it up in the publicke treasury, made this answer: For feare lest wee being keepers thereof, should be corrupted and perverted thereby.

ANAXILAS, unto one who marvelled why the Ephori rose not up and made obeisance to the kings, considering that by the kings they were ordeined and put into that place? gave this reason:

reason : Even because they are created Ephori, that is to say, overseers and controllers of them.

ANDROCLIDAS the Laconian, being maimed and lame of a legge, would nevertheless be enrolled in the number of those who were to serve in the warres; and when some withstood him because he was impotent of that legge: Why my masters (quoth hee) they be not the men of good footmanhip, who can run away, but such as stand their ground that must fight with enemies.

ANTALCIDAS making meanes to be admitted into the confraternitie of the Samothracian religion, when the priest his confessor, in houseling and thriving him, demanded which was the greatest sinne that ever hee had committed in all his life? If (quoth he) I have committed any sinne all my life time, the gods know the same well enough themselves. When a certaine Athenian mis-called the Lacedaemonians, terming them ignorant and unlearned for: In deed (quoth he) we onely of all the Grecians, are the men who have not learned of you to do ill. And when another Athenian bragged, and said: We have chafed you many a time from the river Cepisus: But we (quoth he) never yet drave you from the river Eurolas. unto another, who was delicious to know how one might please men best, he shapd this answer: In case he speake alwaies that which pleaseth, and doe that which profiteth them. A certaine great master and professor of Rhetoricke, would needs one day rehearse and pronounce before him an oration composd in the praise of Hercules: And who ever (quoth he) dispraised him? And unto Agessilas, being fore wounded in a battell by the Thebans: Nay (quoth he) you are well enough served and receive a due Minervall for your schoollage at the Thebans hands, whom you have taught even against their willes that which they knew not, nor were willing to learne, to wit, for to fight: for in trueth, by meanes of the continuall incurfions and expeditions that Agessilas made against them, they became valiant warriors. Himselfe was wont to say: That the wallies of Sparta, were their yong men; and their confines, the heads of their pikes. Unto another, who demanded why the Lacedaemonians fought with such short curtellaxes: To the end (quoth he) that we might cope and clofe more neerely to our enemies.

ANTIOCHUS being one of the Ephori, heard say that king Philip had bestowed upon the Messenians certaine lands for their territorie: But hath Philip (quoth he) given them withall, forces to be able for to defend the same?

ARIGUS, when some there were that highly commended certaine dames, not their owne wives, but wedded to other men: By the gods (quoth he) of good, honest, and faire women, there ought no vaine speeches to bee made, for that indeede they are not known of any other but their husbands who live ordinarily with them. As he passed once thorow the citie Selinus in Sicilie, he chanced to reade this epitaph engraven upon a sepulchre or tombe:

These men before Selinus gates were slaine in bloudie fight, Aswhilom they fought for to quench the lawlesse tyrants might.

And well deserved you (quoth he) to die, for seeking to extinguish tyranny when it burneth out of a light fire; for cleane contrariwise, you should have kept it from burning altogether.

ARISTON hearing one praise and discourse of a sentence that king Cleomenes was wont to use, at what time as the question was asked: What was the office of a good king? Mary even to do good unto his friends & hurt unto his enemies: But how much better (answered Ariston) my good friend, were it to benefit friends indeed, and of enemies to make good friends: but of this notable sentence, no doubt, Socrates was the authour, and upon him it is rightly fathered. Also when one demanded of him how many in number the Lacedaemonians were: As many (quoth he) as be sufficient to chafe away their enemies. A certaine Athenian pronounced a funerall oration which he had penned in the praise of their owne citizens, who had bene defeated and were slaine by the Lacedaemonians in a battell: If your countrey men (quoth he) were so valiant as you say, what thinke you then of ours, who vanquished them? When one praised Chirilans upon a time, for that hee shewed himselfe courteous indifferently to all men: And how can he deserve (quoth Ariston) to be commended, who is kind and friendly to wicked persons? Another reproved Hecataeus a professor in Rhetoricke, who being invited to eat with them at their feasts which they call Sysitia, spake never a word all dinner time; unto whom he made this answer: It seemeth that you are ignorant, that he who knoweth how to speake wel, can skill likewise of the time when it is good to speake and when to keepe silence.

ARCHIDAMUS the sonne of Zeuxidamus, when one asked him who they were that governed governed the citie Sparta? answered: The lawes first, and then the magistrates who ruled according to those lawes. When he heard one praising exceedingly a plaier on the harpe, and for his skill in musick having him in singular admiration: My friend (quoth he) what honourable reward shall they have at your hands, who be men of prowesse and valour, when you commend so highly an harper? Another recommended unto him a musician and said: Oh, what an excellent chaunter is there? This is (quoth he) even as much as a good cooke or maker of portage among us: meaning that there was no difference at all betwene giving pleasure by sound of voice or instruments, and the dressing of viands or seasoning sewes. One promised to give him wine that was very sweet and pleasant: And to what purpose? (quoth he) considering that it serveth but for to draw on more wine, and to make folke drinke the rather; and besides, to cause men to be lesse valiant and unfit for any good things. Lying at siege before the city of Corinth, he marked how there were hares started even close under the wallies thereof; upon which sight he said thus to those that served with him: Our enemies are easie to be surprisid and caught, when they are so lazie and idle, as to suffer hares to lie and harbour hard under their citie wallies, even within the trench and towne-ditch. He had bene chosen an umpire betwene two parties who were at variance, for to make them friends; and he led them both into the temple of Diana surnamed Chalceas, where he willed them both to promise and sweare, laying their hands upon the altar of that goddesse, that they would both twaine observe from point to point whatsoever he should award; which they undertooke to doe, and bound it with an oath accordingly: I judge then (quoth he) that neither of you both shall depart out of this temple, before you have made an attonement, and pacified all quarrels betwene you. Dionysus the tyrant of Sicily, had sent unto his daughters certaine rich robes to wear; but he refused them, and said: I greatly feare, that when they have this raiment upon them, they will seeme more foule and illfavoured than now they do. Seeing his owne sonne in a battell, fighting desperately against the Athenians: Either (quoth he) augment thy strength, or abate thy courage.

ARCHIDAMUS the sonne of Agessilas, when king Philip after the battell which he had won against the Greeks, nere unto Cheronea, wrote unto him a rough and sharpe letter; returned unto him backe againe this answer in writing: If you take measure now of your owne shadow, you shall finde it no bigger than it was before the victorie. Being demanded the question upon a time, how farre the territory of the Lacedaemonians did extend? he answered: Even as farre as they can reach with their javelins. Periander the physician was a sufficient man in his art, and esteemed with the best and most excellent, howbeit he wrote in verse, but with a bad grace; unto whom he said one day thus: I marvel much Periander whether you had rather be named an ill poet or a good physician? In the warre which the Lacedaemonians made against King Philip, some gave him counsell to be wel advised where he fought, and to battell as far as he could from his owne countrey; unto whom he replied: gaine: This is not the thing (quoth hee) that wee ought to regard, but rather to consider and thinke upon this, how we may quit our selves so well in fight, that we be winners in the end. And to those who praised him for that he had woonne a field of the Arcadians, he made this answer: It had bene better that we had overcome them rather in wisdom and prudence than in might and force. About the time that hee entred by force and armes into the countrey of Arcadia, being advertised that the Eleans sent aide and succor unto the Arcadians, he wrote unto them in this sort: Archidamus to the Eleans, greeting: A blessed thing it is to be quiet & at repose. When the confederate & allied nations in the Peloponnesiacke warre, demanded how much money would serve for the defraying of the charges to the said warre belonging? and requested him to taxe each one how much they should contribute: War (quoth he) knoweth no sum, & is not waged at any certaine rate. Seeing a shot which was levelled from an engine of batterie newly brought out of Sicily: O Hercules (quoth he) now is mans prowesse gone for ever. And for that the Greeks would not give credit and be perswaded by him, to performe those conditions of peace which had bene made with Antigonum and Cyrtarum, two Macedonians, for to live in their ancient libertie; alleging that the Lacedaemonians would be lords more rigorous and insupportable than the Macedonians: The sheepe (quoth he) hath alwaies one and the same voice; but man changeth it oftentimes in divers sorts, untill he have brought about and finished his desseignes.

ASTICRATIDAS, when one said, after that King Agis had lost the field to Antigonum, about the citie Megale: O poore Lacedaemonians, what will you doe now? will you become slaves to the Macedonians? answered thus: And why for Can Antigonum forbid and let us, but we will die in fight for Sparta?

BIAS being surpris'd by an ambush, which was laid for him by Iphierates capitaine of the Athenians, when his souldiers said: Now capitaine what is to be done? What else (quoth hee) but to aduise you to fave your selves, and to resolve my selfe for to die in fight.

BRASIDAS found among dried figs a moule that bit him by the hand, so as he was glad to let her goe, whereupon he said unto those that were present: Lo, how there is not the least creature that may be, but it is able to make shift and fave it life, in case it have but the heart to defend it selfe against those who assaile it? In a certaine skirmish he was wounded with a javellin thorow his buckler, and when he had drawn the head out of his bodie, with the verie same weapon he slew his enemy who had hurt him; and to those who asked him, how he came so wounded? he answered thus: Because my buckler deceived me. When he put himselfe into his journey to the warres, he wrote thus unto the Ephori: All that is requisite for this warre as touching the warre, do I will to my power or die for it. After he had lost his life in the quarrell of delivering the Greeks out of servitude who inhabit in Thracia, the embassadors which were sent from those parts to give thanks unto the Lacedaemonians, went to visit his mother Argileonis; of whom she demanded first, whether her sonne Brasidas died manfully or no? And when the Thracian embassadors highly praised him, inasmuch as they said, that he had not left his fellow behinde him: Oh (quoth shee) you are much deceived my friends; Brasidas was in deed a valiant and hardie man, but there be in Sparta many more farre better than he.

DAMONIDAS hapned to be placed last in the dance by him who was the master chorister; whereat hee was no otherwise displeased, but said thus unto him: Well done, for thou hast found the meanes to make this place honourable, which heerebefore was but base and infamous.

DAMIS, when letters had beene written unto him as touching Alexander the Great, namely how Alexander by their suffrages was declared a god; wrote backe in this wise: We grant that Alexander should be called a god since he will needs have it so.

DAMONIDAS, when King Philip was entred with a maine armie unto Peloponnesus, whereupon one said unto him: The Lacedaemonians are in daunger to suffer many calamities, unless they can make meanes to agree and compound with him: Thou womanish-man (quoth hee) how can hee bring us to suffer any miseries, considering that we make no reckoning at all of death?

DERCILLIDAS was sent embassador unto King Pyrhus, what time as he had his armie encamped upon the verie confines of Sparta; and Pyrhus enjoined the Lacedaemonians to receive againe their King Cleonimus whom they had banished, or else he would make them to understand, that they were no more valiant than other men; upon whom Dercyllidas thus replied: If you be a god we feare you not, because we have no way offended you; but if you be a man, know you that you are no whit better than we.

DEMARATUS talked and communed one day with Orontes, who gave him blunt speeches and hard words; and when one who heard their talke, said afterwards: Orontes is verie bold with you, and utteth you but homely o Demaratus: Nay (quoth he) he hath nothing faulted to me; for those who glorie and flatter in all their speech, be they who doe most harme, and not such as speake upon ill will and malice. One seemed to demand of him, wherefore at Sparta those were noted with infamie, who in a discomfiture threw away their bucklers, and not they who cast from them their morrions, cuiraces or breast-plates: Because (quoth he) these armors and head-pieces, serve onely for those who wear them; but their sheilds & bucklers, have their use also for the common strength of the whole battalion. When he heard a certaine musician sing: Beleeve me (quoth hee) the fellow plaies the foole verie well. He was upon a time in a great companie & assembly, where he continued a long while and spake never a word; by occasion whereof one said unto him: Is it for folly and want of matter to talke of, that you are so silent? How can it be folly (quoth he) for a foole can never hold his peace? One asked of him what was the cause why he was banished out of Sparta, being king thereof? Because (quoth hee) the lawes there be mistresses and command all. A certaine Persian by continuall gifts had inveigled and gotten from him in the end a yong boy whom hee loved, and afterwards in manner of a skorne said unto him: I have so well hunted, that at last I have caught your love: Not so (quoth hee) I sweare by the gods, but rather you have bought it. A certaine gentleman of Persia there was, who had rebelled against the king of Persia; but Demaratus by reasons and remonstrances wrought with him, that he perswaded him to yeeld and returne againe to his allegiance; the king incontinently minded to put this Persian to death; but Demaratus diverted him, and and said: Sir, this were an utter shame for you, if when you could not punish him for rebellion being your enemy you should proceed to his execution now, when he is become againe your servitor and friend. There was a certaine jester and parasite who used to play his part at the kings table, and gave unto Demaratus estoones: biting quips, and taunts by way of reproch for his exile; but hee answered him and said: Good fellow, I am not disposed to fight with thee now at this time, being put as I am out of my biace and the range of my life, and having lost my standing.

* EMEREPES the Ephorus, cut two strings of the nine with an hatchet, in Phrynis his harpe, * or Ephorus saying withall: Then marre not musick.

EPAENETUS was wont to say: That liars were the cause of all the offences and crimes in world.

EUBOIDAS hearing some to praise another mans wife, reprooved them for it, & said: That strangers who were not of the house, ought not in any respect to speake of the behaviour and manners of any dame.

EUDAMIDAS the sonne of Archidamus and brother to Agis, having espied Xenocrates, a man well stricken in yeeres, studying philosophie hard, with other yong schollers in the Academie, demanded what old man that might be: one standing by, answered, that he was a wise man and a great clarke, one of those who sought after vertue: If he be still seeking of it (quoth hee) when will he use and practise it? Having heard a Philosopher dispute and discourse upon this paradox: That there was no good capitaine in warre, but the great clarke and learned Sage onely: This is (quoth he) a strange proposition and a woonderfull, but the best is, he that maineth it, is in no wise to be credited, for his cares were never yet acquainted so much as with the found of a trumpet. He came one day into the open schoole or auditorie to heare Xenocrates discourse at large upon some question; but it fell out so, that he had new done when hee entred into the place; then one of his companie began to say: Surely, so soone as we were present, he became silent: He did well (quoth Eudamidas) if he had made an end of that which he had to say: but when the other replied: It were not amisse yet that we heard him, and that he would set to it againe: If we (quoth Eudamidas) should goe to visit a man in his house who had supped already before we came, were it well done of us to pray him to goe to a new supper for the love of us? It was once demanded of him why he alone would seeme to approve rest, quietnesse and peace, considering that all his fellow-citizens with one consent were of opinion to take armes and make warre upon the Macedonians? It is (quoth he) because I neither need nor am desirous to convince them of their error and lying. Another for to animate him to this warre, alleaged the prowesses and worthy exploits atchieved by them at other times against the Persians: Methinks (quoth he) you know not what you say, namely, that because we have overcome a thousand sheepe, we should therefore set upon fiftie woolves. He was upon a time in place to heare a musician sing, who did his part very well; and one asked him, how he liked the man, and what he thought of him? Mary (quoth he) I take him to be a great amuser of men in a small matter. When another highly extolled the citie of Athens in his presence: And who can justly and duly (quoth he) praise that citie which no man ever loved, for being made better in it? When Alexander the great had caused open proclamation to be made in the great assembly at the Olympick games: That all banished persons might returne unto their owne countries, except the Thebans: Behold (quoth Eudamidas) heere is a wofull proclamation for you that be Thebans; howbeit honorable withall, for it is a signe that Alexander feareth none but you onely in all Greece. A certaine citizen of Argos said one day in his hearing: That the Lacedaemonians after they be gone once out of their owne country and from the obedience of their lawes, proove woofe for their travelling abroad in the world: But it is contrary with you that be Argives and other Greekes (quoth he) for being come once into our citie Sparta you are not the woofe, but proove the better by that meanes. It was demanded of him what the reason might be, wherefore they used to sacrifice unto the Muses before they did hazard a battell: To the end (quoth he) that our valiant acts might be well and woorthilie written.

EURYCRATIDAS the sonne of Anaxandrides, when one asked him why the Ephori sat every day to decide and judge of contracts betweene men: For that (quoth hee) we should learne to keepe our faith and truth even among our enemies.

ZENIDAMUS likewise answered unto one who demanded of him why the statutes and ordinances of prowesse and martiall fortitude, were not reduced into a booke, and given in writing ting unto young men for to reade? Because (quoth he) we would have them to be acquainted with deeds and not with writings. A certaine Aetolian said; That warre was better than peace, unto those who were desirous to shew themselves valorous men: And not warre onely (quoth he) for by the gods, in that respect better is death than life.

HERONDAS chanced to be at Athens, what time as one of the citizens was apprehended, arraigned, and condemned for his idleness, judicially and by forme of law; which when he understood, and heard a brute and noise about him, he requested one to shew him the partie that was condemned for a gentlemen's life.

THEARIDAS whetted his sword upon a time, and when one asked him if it were sharpe, he answered: Yea, sharper than a slanderous calumination.

THEMISTEAS being a prophet or soothsaier, foretold unto king Leonidas the discomforture that should happen within the passe or freights of Thermopylae, with the losse both of himselfe and also of his whole armie: whereupon being sent away by Leonidas unto Lacedaemon, under a colour and pretence to enforme them of these future accidents; but in truth, to the end that he should not miscarie and die there with the rest; he would not so doe, neither could he forbear but say unto Leonidas: I was sent hither for a warrior to fight, and not as an ordinary courier and messenger to carrie newes betwene.

THEOPOMPUS when one demanded of him how a king might preserve his kingdome and roiall estate in safetie? said thus: By giving his friends libertie to speake the truth, and with all his power by keeping his subjects from oppression, unto a stranger who told him that in his owne countrey & among his citizens he was commonly furnished Philaleon, that is to say, a lover of the Laconians: It were better (quoth he) that you were called * Philopolites than Philaleon. Another embassadour there came from Elis, who said: That he was sent from his fellow-citizens, because he onely of all that citie loved and followed the Laconike manner of life; of him Theopompus demanded: And whether is thine or the other citizens life the better? he answered Mine: Why then (quoth he) how is it possible that a citie should continue safe, in which there being so great a number of inhabitants, there is but one good man? There was one said before him, that the citie of Sparta maintained the state thereof entier, for that the kings there knew how to governe well: Nay (quoth he) not so much therefore, as because the citizens there can skill how to obey well. The inhabitants of the citie Pyle, decreed for him in their generall counsell exceeding great honors; unto whom he wrote backe againe: That moderate honors time is wont to augment, but immoderate to diminish and weare away.

THERYCION returning from the citie Delphos, found king Philip encamped within the streight of Peloponnesus, where he had gained the narrow passage called Isthmos, upon which the city of Corinth is seated; whereupon he said: Peloponnesus hath but bad porters and warders of you, Corinthians.

THECTAMENES, being by the Ephori condemned to death, went from the judgement place smiling away; and when one that was present asked him, if he despised the lawes and judiciall proceedings of Sparta? No iwis (quoth he) but I reioice heereat, that they have condemned me in that fine which I am able to pay and discharge fully, without borrowing of any friend, or taking up money at interest.

HIPPODAMUS, as Agis was with Archidamus in the campe, being sent with Agis by the king unto Sparta, for to provide for the affaires of weale publike and looke unto the State; refused to goe, saying: I cannot die a more honorable death, than in fighting valiantly for the defence of Sparta: now was he fourecore yeeres old and upward and tooke armes, where hee raunged himselfe on the right hand of the king, and there fighting by his side right manfully, was slaine.

HIPPOCRATIDAS, when a certaine prince or great lord of Caria had written unto him, that he had in his hands a Lacedaemonian, who having beene privie unto a conspiracie and treason intended against his person, revealed not the same; demanding withall, his counsell what he should doe with him; wrote backe againe in this wise: If you have heerebefore done him any great pleasure and good turne, put him to death hardly and make him away; if not, expell him out of your countrey, considering he is a base fellow incapable altogether of vertue. He chanced to encounter upon the way a young boy, after whom followed one who loved him; and the boy blushed for shame; whereupon he said unto him: Thou oughtest to goe in their company my boy with whom thou being seene, needest not to change colour for the matter.

CALLICRATIDAS

CALLICRATIDAS being admirall of a fleet, when the friends of Lyfander requested him to pleasure them in killing some of their enemies; and in consideration thereof he should receive of them fifty talents; notwithstanding he stood then in very great need of money for to buy victuals for the mariners, yet would not he grant their request; and when Cleander, one of his counsell, said unto him: I would (I trow, if I were in your place) take the offer: So would I also (quoth he) if I were in yours. Being come to Sardis unto Cyrus the youonger, who at that time was an allie and confederate of the Lacedaemonians, to see if hee could speed himselfe of him with money for to enterteine mariners and maintaine the armada; the first day he gave him to understand that he was thither come to speake with him; but answere was made: That the king was at the table drinking: Well (quoth he) I will give attendance untill he have made an end of his beaver: after he had waited a long time, and saw that it was impossible for to have audience that day, he departed out of the court for that time, being thought very rude and uncivill in so doing: the morow after, when likewise he was given to understand that he was drinking againe, and that he would not come abroad that day; he made no more adoe, but returned to Ephesus, from whence he came, saying withall: That he ought not so farre forth to take paines for to be provided of money, as to doe any thing unbecoming Sparta: and besides, he sell a cursing those who were the first that endured such indignitie, as to subject themselves unto the insolencie of Barbarians, and who taught them to abuse their riches, and thereby to shew themselves so proud and disdainfull, as to insult over others; yea, and he sware a great oath in the presence of those who were in his company, that so soone as he was returned to Sparta, he would labor with all his might and maine, to reconcile the Greeke nations one unto another; to the end that they might be more dread and terrible to the Barbarians, when as they stood in no need of their forren forces to wage warre one upon another. It was demanded of him, what kinde of men the Ionians were? Good slaves they are (quoth he) but bad free-men. When Cyrus in the end had sent money for to pay his souldiers wages, and besides some gifts and presents particularly to himselfe; he received onely the foresaid pay, but as for the gifts, he sent them backe againe, saying: That he had no need of any private or particular amitie with Cyrus, so long as the common friendship which he had with all the Lacedaemonians pertained also unto him. A little before he gave the battell at sea, nere unto Arginusse, his pilot said unto him: That it was best for him to faile away, so for that the gallies of the Athenians were farre more in number than theirs: And what of all that (quoth he) is it not a shamefull infamie, & hurtfull besides to Sparta, for to flie? simply, best it is to tary by it, and either to win, or die for it. Being at the point to encounter and joine medley, and having sacrificed unto the gods, the soothsaier shewed unto him that the entrails of the beast signified and promised assured victory unto the armie, but death unto the captaine; whereat he was nothing daunted nor affrighted, but said: The state of Sparta lieth not in one man, for when I am dead, my countrey will be never the lesse; but if I should reule now, and yeeld unto the enemies, she will be much impaired, and lose her reputation. Thus having substituted Cleander in his place, if ought should happen otherwise than well, he gave the charge, and strooke a navall battell, wherein fighting valiantly he ended his life.

CLEOMBROTUS the sonne of Pausanias, when a certaine friend a stranger, debated and reasoned with his father about vertue, he said unto him: In this point at least-wis is my father before you, for that he hath already begotten a sonne, and you none.

CLEOMENES the sonne of Anaxandrides, was wont to say: That Homer was the Poet of the Lacedaemonians, because he taught how to make warre; but Heiodus the Poet of the Ilots, for that he wrote of agriculture and husbandry. He had made truce for seven daies with the Argives; and the third night after it beganne, perceiving that the Argives upon the assurance and confidence of the said truce were foundly allecpe, he charged upon them, slew some, and tooke others prisoners; and when he was reproched therefore, and namely, that he had broken his oath, he answered: That he never sware to observe truce in the night season, but in day-time onely; and besides, what annoiance soever a man did unto his enemies (in what sort it made no matter) he was to thinke that both before God and man it was a point above justice, and in no wise subject and liable unto it: howbeit, for this perjury of his and breaking of covenant, he was disappointed and frustrate of his hope and desseigne, which was to surprize the citie of Argos, for that indeed the very women tooke those armes which in memoriall of ancient victories were hung and set up fast in their temples, with which they repelled them from the walles: after this, he fell into a furious rage, and his wits were bestraught; inso much as he tooke a knife, and slit his bodie from the very ancles up to the principall and noble vital parts, and so laughing and scoffing, he assembled together is notable to furnish us, for it would but answer one portion or canton of their multitude: but if you stand upon valor & prowesse of men, certes this number is sufficient. Another there was who said as much to him: But yet I bring (quoth he) money enough, considering we are heere to leave our lives. Xerxes wrote unto him to this effect: You need not unlesse you list be so perverse and obdurate as to fight against the gods, but by siding and combining with me, make your selfe a monarch over all Greece; unto whom he wrote back in this wise: If you knew wherein consisted the soveraigne good of mans life, you would not covet that which is another mans; for mine owne part, I had rather loose my life for the safetie of Greece, than be the commaunder of all those of mine owne nation. Another time Xerxes wrote thus: Send me thy armour; unto whom he wrote backe: Come your selfe and fetch it. At the verie point when he was to charge upon his enemies, the marshals of the armie came unto him, and protested that they must needs hold off and stay until the other allies & confederates were come together: Why (quoth he) thinke you not that as many as be minded to fight are come already? or know you not that they onely who dread and reverence their kings, be they that fight against enemies? this said, he commaunded his souldiers to take their dinners, for sup we shall (said he) in the other world. Being demanded why the best and bravest men preferre an honorable death before a shamefull life? Because (quoth he) they esteeme the one proper to nature onely; but to die well they thinke it peculiar to themselves. A great desire he had to have those young men of his troupe and regiment, who were not yet married, and knowing well that if he delt with them directly and openly, they would not abide it; he gave unto them one after another two brevets or letters to carrie unto the Ephori, and so sent them away: he meant also to save three of those who were married; but they having an inkling thereof, would receive no brevets or missives at all: for one said, I have followed you hither to fight, and not to be a carrier of newes; the second also: By staying heere I shall quit my selfe the better man; and the third: I will not be behind the rest, but the formost in fight.

Lochagus the father of Polyanides and Syron, when newes was brought unto him that one of his children was dead: I knew long since (quoth he) that he must needs die.

Lycurgus the law-giver, minding to reduce his citizens from their old maner of life, unto a more sober and temperate course, and to make them more vertuous and honest (for before time they had beene dissolute and over delicate in their maners and behaviour) nourished those whelpes which came from the same dogge and bitch, and the one he kept alwaies within house, & used it to licken in every dish & to be greedy after meat; the other he would leade forth abroad into the fields and acquaint it with hunting: afterwards he brought them both into an open and frequent assembly of the people, and set before them in the mids, certaine bones, fesse & traps; he put out also at the same time an hare before them; now both the one and the other tooke incontinently to that whereto they had beene acquainted, and ranne apace, the one to the melle of tops, and the other after the hare and caught it: heereupon Lycurgus tooke occasion to inferre this speech: You see heere my masters and citizens (quoth he) how these two dogs having one sire and one dam to them both, are become farre different the one from the other, by reason of their divers educations and bringing up; whereby it is evident how much more powerful nouriture and exercise is to the breeding of vertuous maners, than kinde and nature: howbeit some there be who say, that these two dogs or whelpes which he brought out, were not of one and the same dogge and bitch; but the one came from those cures that used to keepe the house, and the other from those hounds that were kept to hunting; and afterwards that he acquainted the whelp that was of the worse kinde onely to the chafe, and that which came of the better race, to slappe, licken, and doe nothing else but raven; whereupon either of them made their choise and ranne to that quickly whereto they were accustomed; and thereby he made it appear evidently, how education, traying, and bringing up is available both for good and bad conditions, for thus he spake unto them: By this example you may know my friends that nobilitie of bloud, how highly soever it is esteemed with the common sort, is to no purpose, no though we so bee descended from the race of Hercules, if we doe not practise those deeds whereby hee became the most renowned and glorious knight in the world, learning and exercising all our life time those things which are honest and vertuous. Having made a devision of the whole territorie, and distributed to every citizen an equall portion; it is reported that a good while after, being returned frō a long voiage which he had into the said territorie about harvest time; when the corne was newly reaped and cut down, seeing the shocks & sheaves, cocks and fitches running even and orderly, and the same like one to another; he rejoiced in his heart, and smiling said said to those about him: That the whole territorie of Laconia looked like unto the inheritance and patrimonie of many brethren who had lately parted and divided their portions together equally. When he had brought in the cutting off and abolition of debts, he went in hand with the devision of all utensils also and moveable goods within house into even shares; to the end that there might be no imparity nor inequality at all among his citizens; but perceiving that if he went directly and plainly to work, they would hardly beare and brooke that any thing should be abridged and taken from them: he discredited first and formost all sorts of gold and silver coine, giving commaundement that there should be no money used but made of iron: and taxed a certaine rate and limitation to what summe each mans estate should amount; according to the estimation of the said money by way of exchange; which done, all wronges and unjust dealings were chased cleane out of Lacedemon: for now by this meanes there could no man rob nor steale, there was no bribing nor corruption by gifts, no man might defraud in contracts and bargains, nor embezzell any more, considering that neither they might conceale and hide that which was unjustly gotten, nor any man joied in possessing ought, nor could possibly use and occupie the same without perill, ne yet carie to and fro in safetie and securitie: and withall by the same meanes, he banished out of Lacedemon all superfluities, whereby there were no more any marchants, nor pleading fopshifters, no wifards & fortune tellers, no cogging mount-banks & jugglers, no ingenious devisers of new fables & buildings that haunted Sparta any more; for why, he would not permit any money there which was current in other places, but onely this iron coine was in request, and passed from one to another: as for the price thereof it weighed an Aeginetick pound; but in worth and valour, it went but for foure Chalcins. Moreover, having a purpose to root out delicate and superfluous pleasures, and to cut off cleane all covetous desire of riches, he instituted and brought up those meetings which they call Systira: i. eating at publick meales and making merrie together: and when some demanded of him what he meant to devise the same, and also why he ordeined that his citizens should be divided by little tables when they sat together in armes? To the end (quoth he) that they might be in more readinesse to receive commaundement from their superiors; as also if peradventure there should be some practise among them of change and alteration, the fault might be in some few; and moreover, that there should be equality in their eating & drinking, & neither in their dishes of meat nor cups of drink, nor in their beds nor apparel, no nor so much as in the utensils & implemēt of the house, or in any thing whatsoever, the rich should have any vantage over the poore: by this policy having brought to passe that riches was not set by and desired, considering that such order was taken, that neither men had much occasion to use it, nor any joy & pleasure to shew it, he would thus say unto his familiars: My good friends, what a gay & goodly matter is it, to make it known by effect indeed, that Pluto, that is to say, the god of riches, is in truth blinde, according as he is named to be. Furthermore, carefull he was, and had a speciall regard that his people should not first dine at home in their owne houses, and after that, goe to their publicke halles and meetings aforesaid, being full of other viands and drinks; for others would reproch and speake badly of a man who did not eat among them with a good appetite, as being a glutton, or one who for daintinesse and delicacy disdained this common and vulgar maner of diet; but if any such happened to be seene and knowne, he was sure to be condemned in a good round fine. Hereupon it was, that a long time after, king Agis (after his returne from an expedition or voiage in warre, wherein he had subdued the Athenians) willing one day to suppe privately by himselfe with his wife at home, sent into the kitchen for his part or allowance of meat; but the marshals of the armie would send him none; and the morrow after, when the matter came to the knowledge of the Ephori, he had a fine set on his head for it: but by reason of these new ordinances, divers of the richer sort tooke misse, and in great indignation rose up against him, abused him with hard termes, threw stones and would have brained him; but he seeing himselfe thus furiously pursued, made shift by good footmanship, and escaped out of the common market place, & put himselfe within the sanctuarie of Minervaes temple, called Chalcos; before the other could overtake him, only Alexander was so neere unto him, that when he cast his eye behinde to see who followed after, caught him a rap with his baston, and strake one of his eyes out of his head: but Alexander afterwards, by the common sentence of the whole citie, was put into his hands for to do exemplarie justice upon him, according as he thought good: howbeit, hee wrought him no mischief nor displeasure at all; and that which more is, hee never so much as complained of any wrong or abuse that he had offered and done unto him; but having him to be a domestical guest and to live with him, he did this good of him: That hee blazed in every place where he came, his commendable parts, and namely, the orderly dier and maner of life, that he had learned by conversing with him; and in one word, shewed himselfe highly to affect that discipline in which Lycurgus had trained him: afterwards, for a memoriall of this accident which befell unto him, he caused within the temple of Minerva Chalcæcos, a chapel to be built unto Minerva, surnamed Optileta; for that the Dorians inhabiting those parts, do call in their language, Eies, Opteli. It was demanded of him upon a time, why he had not established a ny written positive lawes: Because (quoth he) they that are well brought up and instructed in that discipline as it appertaineth, know well how to judge that which the time requireth. Some asked him why he had ordeined that the roofes of houses should be made with timber rough hewen with the axe, and the doores of sawen planke or boord onely, without worke of any other tooles or instruments at all? unto whom he answered: Because our citizens should be moderate in all things that they bring into their houses, and have no furniture therein that might set other mens teeth on water, or which other men do so much affect. From this custome by report it came, that king Leorychides the first of that name, being at supper in a friends house of his, when he saw the roofe over his head richly seced with embowed arch-woike, demanded of his host whether the trees in that country grew square or no? When he was asked why he forbade to make warre often against the same enemies: For feare (quoth he) that being forced estoones to stand upon their owne guard and put themselves in defence, they should in the end become well experienced in the warres: in which regard Agessilus afterwards was greatly blamed for being the cause by his continuall expeditions and invasions into Bæotia, that the Thebans were equall in armes unto the Lacedæmonians. Another asked also of him, why he enjoined maidens marriageable to exercise their bodies in running, wrestling, pitching the barre, flinging coits, and lancing of darts? For this purpose (quoth he) that the first rooting of their children which they are to breed, taking fast and sure holde in able bodies wel set and strongly knit, might spring and thrive the better within them; and they also themselves being more firme and vigorous, beare children afterward the better, be prepared and exercised (as it were) to endure the paines and travels of child birth easily and stoutly, over and besides, if need required, be able to fight in defence of themselves, their children and country. Some there were who found fault with the custome that he brought in, that the maidens of the city at certeine festivall daies should dance naked in solemne shewes and pomps that were set, demanding the cause thereof? to whom hee rendered this reason: That they performing the same exercises which men do, might be no lesse enabled than they, either in strength and health of body, or in vertue and generosity of minde, and by that means checke and despise the opinion that the vulgar sort had of them. And from hence it came, that Gorgo the wife of Leonidas, as we finde written, when a certeine dame and ladye of a foren country said unto her: There be no other women but you Laconian wives, that have men at command; answered in this wise: For why? we onely are the women that beare men. Moreover, he debarred and kept those men who remained unmarried, from the sight of those shewes where the yong virgins aforesaid danced naked; and that which more is, set upon them the note of infamie, in depriving them expressly of that honour and service which yonger folke are bound to yeeld unto their elders: in which doing, he had a great foresight and providence to move his citizens to marriage and for to beget children; by occasion whereof, there was never any man yet who misliked and complained of that which was said unto Dercillidas, by way of reproch, though otherwise he was a right good and valiant captaine; for when he came upon a time into a place, one of the yonger sort there was, who would not deigne to rise up unto him, nor give him any reverence; and this reason he gave: Because (quoth he) as yet you have not begotten a child to rise up and doe his duty likewise to me. Another asked of him, wherefore he had ordeined that daughters should be married without a dowrie or portion given with them? Because (quoth he) for default of marriage-money none of them might stay long ere they were wedded, nor be hearkened after for their goods; but that every man regarding onely the maners and conditions of a yong damosell, might make choise of her whom he meaneth to espouse, for her vertue onely; which is the reason also that he banished out of Sparta all maner of painting, trimming, and artificiall embellishments to procure a superficiall beauty and complexion. Having also prefixed and set downe a certeine time, within the which as well maidens as yong men might marrie; one would needs know of him why he limited forth such a definite terme? unto whom he answered: Because their children might be strong and lustie, as being begotten and conceived of such persons as be already come to their full growth. Some woondered why hee would not allow that the new married bridegrome should lie with his

espouse; but expressly gave order that the most part of the day hee should converse with his companions, yea, and all the nights long, but whensoever hee went to keepe company with his new wedded wife, it should be secretly and with great heed and care that hee be not surprized or found with her? This (quoth he) is done to this end that they may be alwaies more strong and in better plight of body: also that by not enjoying their delights and pleasures to the full; their love might be ever fresh, and their infants betweene them more hardie and stout: furthermore, hee removed out of the citie all precious and sweete perfumes, saying: That they were no better than the verie marring and corruption of the good natural oile; the art also of dying and tincture, which he said was nothing else but the flatterie of the senses: to be brieve, he made the citie Sparta inaccessible (as I may say) for all jewelers and fine workmen, who professe to set out and adorne the body: giving out, that such by their lewd artificiall devices, do deprave and marre the good arts and mysteries in deed. In those daies the honestie and pudicitie of dames was such, and so far off were they from that tractable facilitie and easie access unto their love; which was afterwards, that adulterie among them was held for an unpoffible and incredible thing. And to this purpose may well be remembered the narration of one Geradatus, an ancient Spartane, of whom a stranger asked the question: What punishment adulterers were to suffer in the citie of Sparta? for that, he saw, Lycurgus had set downe no expresse law in that behalfe: Why (quoth he) there is no adulterie among us: but when the other replied againe: Yea, but what and if there were? even the same answer made Geradatus, and none other: For how (quoth he) can there be an adulterer in Sparta, wherein all riches, all superfluous delights and dainties, all outward trickings and embellishings of the bodie are despised and dishonoured? and where shame of doing ill, honestie, reverence and obedience to superiors carrie away all the credit and authoritie? One put himselfe forward, and was in hand with him to set up and establish the popular State of government in Sparta; unto whom hee answered: Begin it thy selfe first within thine owne house. And unto another who demanded of him, why he ordeined the sacrifices in Lacedæmon so simple and of final cost? To the end (quoth he) that we should never cease and give over to worship and honour the gods. Also when hee permitted his citizens to practise those exercises of the bodie onely, wherein they never stretched forth their hands; he was required by one to yeeld a reason thereof: Because (quoth he) none of us should in taking paines be accustomed to be wearie or to faint, and give over at any time. Likewise being asked the reason why he gave order oftentimes to change the campe, and not in one place to lie long encamped? To the end (quoth he) that we might doe the greater damage to our enemies, and hurt more of them. Another was desirous to know of him, why he forbade to give the assault unto any walles? unto whom he answered: For feare that the best men might not be killed, by a woman, a child, or some such like person. Certaine Thebanes craved his advice and opinion touching the sacrifice, divine service, and dolefull moane which was solemly made in the honour of Leucothea; unto whom he answered thus: If you take her for a goddesse, weepe not for her as if she were a woman; if you suppose her to be a woman, sacrifice not unto her as to a goddesse. Unto his citizens who demanded of him, how they might put backe and repulse the invasions of their enemies? Marie (quoth he) if you continue poore, and none of you do covet to have more than another. Again, when they would needs know why he would not have their citie to be walled about: Because (saith he) that citie is never without a wal, which is environed and compassed about with valiant men, and not with bricke or stone. The Spartanes also were verie curious in trimming the haire of their heads, alledging for their warrant a certaine speech of Lycurgus as touching that point, who was wont to say: That side-haire made them who were faire more beautifull, and those that were foule, more hideous and terrible. Likewise he gave commendement, that in their warres, when they had discomfited their enemies and put them to flight, to follow the chase so hardly, untill they were fully assured of the victorie, and then to retire withall speed, saying: That it was no act of a generous spirit, nor befitting the brave minde of the Greekeish nation, to massacre and execute those who had quit the place and were gone; besides, this also would be safe and commodious for themselves, inasmuch as the enemies who knew once their custome, namely, to put those to the sword who obstinately resist and make head, and to spare those and let them escape who flie before them; find by that means that flight is better than to stand to fight. A certaine man asked him, for what cause he would not suffer the souldiers to rife and spoile the bodies of their enemies as they fell dead: For feare (quoth hee) lest while they busie themselves, and stoupe forward to gather

The Tyrant of Sicilie Dionysius had sent unto LYSANDER two futes of womens robes, that he might choofe whether of them he liked better, to carrie unto his daughter; but hee said unto him: That the herselfe knew best which to choofe, and what was fittest for herselfe, and so he tooke both away with him. This Lysander was a verie craftie and subtil foxe, who ordered and managed most part of his affaires by cunning casts and deceitfull devices, esteeming justice onely by utilitie, and honestie by profit; confessing in word that truth was better than falsehood; but measuring in deed the worth and price as well of the one as the other by commoditie. To them who reprooved and blamed him for conducting the most part of his enterprises by fraud and guile, and not by plaine direct force, a thing unworthy the magnanimity of Hercules, hee would laugh and answer: That where he could not achieve a thing by the lions skin, hee must needs low thereto a piece of the foxes case. And when others charged and accused him mightily, for that he had violated and broken his oath, which he had made in the citie Athens, he used to say: That children were to be deceived with cock-all-bones, but men with oaths: Having defeated the Athenians in a battell by means of an ambush, in a certaine place called the Goats-rivers, and afterward pressed them so sore with famine, that he forced them to yeeld the citie unto his mercie, he wrote unto the Ephori thus: Athens is woon. The Lacedæmonians in his time were at some difference with the Argives about their confines; and it seemed that the Argives alleged better reasons, and brought forth more direct evidences for themselves than the other; whereupon he came among them and drew his sword, saying: They that are the mightier with this, plead best for their confines. Seeing the Bœotians as he passed throw their country, hanging in equall ballance, and as yet not resolved and certaine to which side for to range themselves, he sent one unto them for to know whether they would chuse, that he marched throw their lands with speares and pikes upright, or bending downward and trailing. In a certaine assembly of the estates of Greece, there was a Megarian who spake bravely and audaciously unto him: Thy words my friend (quoth he) have need of a citie; meaning thereby, that he was of too weake and small a citie, as to give such glorious words. The Corinthians rebelled upon a time, whereupon he advanced with his forces against their walles, which the Lacedæmonians seemed to assaile verie coldly: but at the verie instant there was espied an hare, running crosse over the towne ditch: whereupon he tooke occasion to say: Are yee not ashamed in deed o yee Spartans, to feare such enemies, who are so idle and stirre so little abroad, that hares can sleepe quietly, even under their verie walles. When hee was at Smothrace to consult with the oracle there; the priest was in hand with him to confesse what was the most wicked and enormous act that ever hee did in all his life time: whereupon hee asked the priest againe: Whether is it your selfe or the gods that would know thus much, and impoeth this confession upon mee? The gods (quoth the priest) would have it so: Why then (quoth he) retire you aside out of my sight, and if they demaund the same of mee, I will answer them. A certaine Persian asked him what kinde of government hee liked best and praised most: Even that (quoth hee) which ordeineth for cowards and hardy men that reward and hire which is meet for them. Another said unto him: That in every place where he came hee was ready to commend and defend him: I have (quoth he againe) in my grounds two oxen, and neither of them speaks a word; howbeit, I know for al that, which is good of deed, and which is idle and lazie at his worke. There was one who let lie at him divers odious and reprochfull words: Speake on good fellow (quoth he) out with it hardly and spare not, vomit up all and leave nothing behinde, if haply thou canst rid and purge thy heart of all the wicked venom wherewith thou seemest to swell. Some time after, when he was dead, there arose variance betweene the allies of Sparta as touching certaine matters; and for to know the truth and settle all causes among them, Agessilaus went to Lysanders house, for to search certaine papers that might give light and evidence to the thing in controversie; and among other writings he chanced to light upon an oration or pamphlet penned by him as touching policie & the State; wherein he seemed to perswade the Spartans to take the roialtie and regall dignitie from the houses of the Eurytida and Agida, and to bring it to a free election of the citizens, that they might chuse for their kings out of all the citie those who were approved and known for the worst-thiest men, and not to be obliged for to take and admit of necessitie one of Hercules line; so as the crowne and regall state might be conferred as a reward and honoure upon him who in verie resembled resembled Hercules most, considering that it was by the means thereof, that unto him were assigned the honors due unto the gods: now was Agessilaus fully bent to have published this oration before al the citizens, to the end that they might take knowledge how Lysander was another kind of man than he had beene taken for, and withall to traduce those that were his friends and bring them into obloquie, suspition, and trouble: but by report Lacratidas the principall man, and president of the Ephori, fearing lest if this oration were once divulged & openly read, it might take effect, and perswade that indeed which it pretended; staied Agessilaus and kept him from doing so, saying: That he should not now rake Lysander out of his grave, but rather enterre and burie the oration together with him, so wittily and artificially composed it was, and so effectually to perswade. Certaine gentlemen there were of the citie, who during his life were furies to his daughters in marriage; but after his death when his estate was known to be but poore, they defisted and cast them off, whereupon the Ephori condemned them in great fines, for that they made court unto them, so long as they esteemed him wealthy; but afterwards when they found by his poore estate that he was a righteous and just man, they made no more reckoning of his daughters but disdained them.

NAMERTES being sent as embassadour into a forren country, there chanced to be one of those parts who said unto him: That he held and reputed him for an happie man, because he had so many friends; unto whom he replied and asked: Whether he knew the true prooffe where-by a man might be assured that he had many friends? the other answered: No, but I pray you tell me: Why then (quoth he) it is *advertising.

NICANDER, when one brought him, word that the Argives spake ill of him: It makes no matter (quoth he) are they not sufficiently chastised and punished for railing upon good men? One asked of him wherefore the Lacedæmonians wore their haire long of their heads, & suffered likewise their beards to grow side; unto whom he answered: Because a mans owne proper ornament is of all other the fairest, and costeth least. A certaine Athenian being in communication with him, cast out this word: All you Lacedæmonians (Nicander) love your ease well, and are idle: You say true indeed (quoth he) but we busie not our selves as you doe in every trifling matter.

PANTHOIDAS, being sent in embassage into Asia, was shewed by the people of those parts a certaine strong citie well fortified with high and goodly wals: Now by the gods (quoth he) my friends, this seemes to be a trim cloister to mue up women in. In the schoole of Academie the philosophers discoursed and disputed as touching many good themes, and after they had made an end, they said unto him: Now good sir o Panthoidas, how like you these discourses? What should I thinke of them else (quoth he) but that they are goodly and honest in shew, but surely profitable they are not, nor edifie at all, so long as your selves doe not live accordingly.

PAUSANIAS the sonne of Cleombrotus, when the inhabitants of the isle Delos were at debate, and pleaded for the proprietie of the said isle against the Athenians, alleging for themselves that by an old law (time out of minde) observed among them, there might none of their women beare children within the said island, nor any of their dead be buried there: How then (quoth he) can this isle be yours, if none of you were ever borne or buried there? When certaine exiled persons from Athens solicited him to leade his armie against the Athenians, and forto provoke him rather thereto, said: That they were the onely men who hissed and whistled at the naming of him, when he was declared victor in the solemnitie of the Olympick games: But what thinke you (quoth he) will they doe when we have wrought them some shrewd turne, since they sticke not to hisse at us being their benefactors? Another asked of him, wherefore the Lacedæmonians had enfranchized the poet Tyrtæus their denizen? Because (quoth he) we never would be thought to have a stranger or alien our leader and governour. There was a very weak and feeble man of bodie who neverthelesse seemed very earnest and instant to make warre upon the enemies, and to give them battell both on sea and land: Will you (quoth he) strip your selfe out of your clothes; that we may see what a goodly man of person you are, to moove and perswade us for to fight? Some there were who seeing the spoiles that were taken from the dead bodies of the Barbarians after they were slaine in the field, marvelled much at their sumptuous and costly clothes: It had been better (quoth he) that themselves had beene of more valour, and their habilements of lesse valew. After the victorie which the Greeks wan of the Persians before the citie Platea, he commaunded those about him to serve him up to the table that supper which the Persians had provided for themselves, which being woonderfull excessive and superfluous: Now Par-die (quoth he) the Persians are great gourmaunders and greedy gluttons, who who having so great store of viands come higher among us, for to eate up our browne bread and course bisket.

PAUSANIAS the sonne of Plisnonax, unto one who asked him, why it was not lawfull in their countrey to alter any of their aunient statutes, made this answer: Because lawes ought to be mistresses of men, and not men masters of the lawes. Being exiled from Sparta, and making his abode within the citie Tegara, he highly praised the Lacedæmonians; one of the standers by said unto him: And why then staid not you at Sparta, if there be so good men there? why I say fled you from thence? Because (quoth he) physicians doe not use to keepe where folke be found and whole, but where they are sicke and diseased. One came to him and said: How shall we be able to defeat & conquer the Thracians? Mary (quoth he) if we chuse the valiantest man for our captaine. A certaine Physician advised & looked upon him very wittily, & after he had well considered his person, said: Thou ailest nothing, neither is there any evil in thee: I thinke so (quoth he) because I use none of thy counsell & physick. His friends reprooved him for speaking ill of a physician, of whom he had no prooffe nor experience, and at whose hands he had received no harme: True indeed (quoth he) I have made no triall of him; for if I had, surely I should not have bene a lives-man at this day. When a Physician said unto him: You are now become old fir: Thou saist trueth (quoth he) because I have not entertained thee for to minister physicke unto me. He was wont also to say: That he was the best Physician, who would not let his patients rot above ground, but dispatch them at once, and send them quickly to their graves.

PASDARETUS, when one said unto him: There is a great number of our enemies: Then (quoth he) shall we win greater honour, for kill we may the more of them. Seeing one who by nature was a very dastard and coward, howbeit, commended otherwise by his fellow-citizens for his modestie and mildnesse: I would not have men (quoth he) praised for being like women, nor women for resembling men, unlesse peradventure a woman be driven upon some occasion of extremitie to play the man. Having the repulse upon a time, when hee should have bene chosen into the counsell of the three hundred, which was the most honourable degree of State in all the citie, he departed from the assembly all jocund, mery and smiling; and when the Ephori called him backe againe, and demanded of him why he laughed? Because (quoth he) I joy in the behalfe of the citie, that it hath in it three hundred better and more sufficient citizens than my selfe.

PLISTARCHUS the sonne of Leonidas, when one enquired of him the cause why they carried not the denomination of their families from the names of their first kings, but of the later? Because (quoth he) those in the olde time chose rather to be leaders than kings; but their successors not. There was a certaine advocate at the barre, who in pleading for his client, was full of his jests and frumps, never ceasing to scoffe and move laughter: My friend (quoth he unto him) do you not consider and regard, that in seeming to make others for to laugh, you will cause your selfe to be ridiculous and a laughing stocke? even as those who by wrestling oft become good wrestlers? Report there was made unto him one day of a certaine foule-tongued fellow, who used to slander and back-bite all men, and yet spake all good of him: I wonder much (quoth he) if no man tolde him that I was dead; for surely he cannot for his life afford any man living one good word.

PLISTONAX the sonne of Pausanias, when a certaine Athenian oratour called the Lacedæmonians, unlettered and ignorant persons: Thou saiest true (quoth he) for we alone of all other Greeks, are the men who have learned no naughtinesse of you.

POLYDORUS the sonne of Alcarnenes, said unto one who ordinarily did nothing els but menace his enemies: Dost thou perceive how thou spendest the most part of thy revenge in these threats? He led upon a time the army from Lacedæmon against the citie of Massene; and one demanded of him, whether his heart would serve to fight against brethren? No (quoth he) but I can finde in mine heart to march into that inheritance which is not yet set out and parted by lots. The Argives, after the discomfiture of their three hundred men who fought against so many of the Lacedæmonians, were defeated a second time, all in a ranged battell; by reason whereof, the allies and confederates of the Lacedæmonians were earnest with Polydorus not to let slip so good an opportunitie, but to follow the traine of victorie, and to go directly to the oppugnation of their city walles, and to win it by force; which he might effect right easily, considering that all the men were killed up in the field, and none but women left alive within, to defend the citie; unto whom he answered: I am well appaied, and take this for my great honour and glory, that I have vanquished mine enemies in battell, fighting on even-hand so many to so many;

many; but being to determine the quarrell by dint of sword for our confines onely, and having exploited that, so proceed forward, and covet to assault and winne their city, I holde it not to be just and equall; for come I am to recover those lands of ours which they occupied, and not to seize upon their home-stalles. Being demanded why the Lacedæmonians exploited themselves so manfully to the hazzard of warre? It is (quoth he) because they have learned to reverence, and not to feare their rulers and capitaines.

POLYCRATIDAS being sent with others, in ambassage to the lieutenants of the king of Persia, when they demanded of him & the rest, whether they were come of their own proper motion, or sent by commission from the State? If we speed of that (quoth he) which we demand, 10 then are we come in the behalfe of the common weale; but if we misse, we come of our owne heads.

PHOEBIDAS immediately before the battell of Leuctres, when some gave out, and said: This day will trie and shew who is a good man: Such a day (quoth hee) is much worth in deed, if it be able to shew a good man.

SOUS, as it is reported (being upon a time straightly besieged by the Clitorians, in a place which was very rough and without water) made offer to render into their hands all those lands which he had conquered from them, in case that he and all his company might drinke at a certaine fountaine which was neere at hand: the Clitorians accorded thereto, and this covenant was concluded and confirmed by oath betweene them: so hee assembled all his men together, 20 and declared unto them: That if there were any amongst them would abstaine from drinke, he would resigne up into his hands all his soveraigne power and roialtie; but there was not one of all his troupe who could conteine and forbear, so exceeding thirstily they were all; but everie man drunke heartily, himselfe onely excepted, who went last downe to the spring, where he did nothing els but coole and besprinkle his body without, in the presence of his very enemies, not taking one drop inwardly: by which evasion, he would not afterwards yeeld up the forefaid lands, but alledged that they had not all drunke.

TELECRUS when one came unto him & said: That his owne father gave him alwaies hard words; made him this answer: Surely, if there were not cause to use such speeches, he would never speake so. His brother also was discontented, and complained in this wise: The citizens do 30 not beare mee such favour and kindnesse as they shew in your behalfe; notwithstanding we are the sonnes of one father and mother; but they misuse me most injuriously: Thereason is (quoth he) because you know not how to put up a wrong as I doe. Being demanded why the custome was in their country, that young men should rise up from their places where they were set, and do reverence unto their elders: It is (quoth he) to this end, that in doing this honor unto those, who nothing belonged unto them, they might learne so much the more to honour their parents. Unto another that asked him of what wealth he was, and how much goods he had? he answered: I have no more than will suffice.

CHARILLUS being asked the question why Lycurgus had given them so few lawes? Because (quoth he) they have no need at all of many lawes who speake but little. Another demanded 40 of him the cause, why at Sparta they suffered to goe forth into publick place, virgins with their faces open, but wives veiled and covered: For that (quoth he) maidens might finde them out husbands to be wedded unto, and wives keepe those whom they have married already. One of the slaves (called Ilotes) behaved himselfe upon a time over boldly and malapertly with him; unto whom he said: Were I not angrie, I would kill thee at my foot. One asked him what kind of government he esteemed best? Even that (quoth he) wherein most men, in managing of publicke affaires without quarrels and sedition, strive a vie who shall be most vertuous. And unto another who would needs know the reason, why at Sparta the images and statues of the gods were made in armor? he shaped this answer: To the end that the reproches which are fastned upon men for cowardise, might not take hold of them; also that young men should never with- 50 out their armes make their prayers unto the gods.

The Samiens had sent certaine embassadors unto Sparta, who after audience given, were very long and somewhat tedious in their orations; but when they had found the way to make an end, THE LORDS OF SPARTA made them this answer: The beginning of your speech we have forgotten, and we conceived not the rest because the beginning was out of our remembrance. The Thebanes upon a time had contested bravely, and contradicted them stoutly in certaine points in question, unto whom they answered thus: Either lesse hearts, or more puiffance. There was one asked a Lacedæmonian upon a time why he let his beard grow so long? Because (quoth (quoth he) whensoever I see my hoary and grey haire, I might be put in minde to doe nothing unbecoming them. When another highly praised certaine men for most valiant: a Lacedæmonian heard him and said: Oh, such were sometime at Great Troy. Another of them hearing it spoken, that in certaine cities men were forced to drink after supper: And doe they not (quoth he) compell them also to eate? The poet Pindarus in one of his canticles nameth the cite of Athen the prop of all Greece: Thē wil Greece quickly come tumbling down (quoth a Laconian) if it beare but upon so sleight a pillar. Another beheld a painted table, wherein was the pourtrature of the Lacedæmonians, how they were killed by the Athenians, and when one that stood by said, Now surely these Atheniās be valiant men: Yea mary (quoth he) in a picture. There was one seemed to take pleasure in hearing certaine opprobrious and slanderous words untrue given out to against a Laconian, & to beleve the same; but the partie thus misused said: Cease to lend your care against me. Another when he was punished, went crying: If I have don amisse it was against my will: Why then (answered a Laconian) let it be against thy will also that thou art punished. Another seeing men going forth of the country, set at their ease within coaches: (God forbid (quoth he) that I should sit there where I can not rise up to doe my dutie unto him that is elder than my selfe. Certaine Chians there were, who being come to see the cite of Sparta, chanced to be well whittled and starke drunke, who after supper went to see also the consistorie of the Ephori, where they cast up their gorges, yea and that which more is, both vomited and discharged their guts, even upon the very chaires where the Ephori was wont to sit: the morrow after, the Lacedæmonians made great search and diligent enquire at the first, who they were that thus had 20 themselves. Another Laconian seeing hard almonds sold at the double price: What (quoth he) are stones to geason heere? Another having plucked all the feathers off from a nightingale, and seeing what a little body it had: Surely (quoth he) thou art all voice and nothing else. There was likewise a Lacedæmonian, who seeing the cynick philosopher Diogenes in the mids of winter when it was extreme cold, embracing and clipping a brassen statue very devoutly, asked him if he chilled not for cold? and when the other answered, No; Why then (quoth he) what great matter doe you? A certaine Laconian reproched upon a time one borne in Metapontine, say- 30 ing: They were all cowards and false-hearted like women: If it be so (quoth the Metapontine) how is it that wee hold so much of other mens lands as wee doe? Why then (replied the Laconian) I see that you are not cowards onely, but unjust also. A traveller being come to Sparta for to see the cite, stood upright a long while upon one foote onely, and said unto a Laconian I doe not thinke thou canst stand so long of one leg as I do: Not I indeed (quoth the other) but there is not a goose but can do as much. There was one vaunted greatly what a Rhetorician he was, and namely that he was able to perswade what he would; Now by Cassor and Pollux I sweate (quoth a Laconian) there never was, nor ever will be any arte indeed without verity. A certaine Argive boasted much, that there were in their cite many graves & tombes of the Lacedæmonians: And contrariwise (quoth a Laconian) there is not among us one sepulcher of the Argives; 40 giving him thus much to understand, that the Lacedæmonians had many times entred with a puissant armie into the country of Argos, but the Argives never into the territorie of Sparta. A Laconian being taken prisoner in warre (when hee should bee sold in port sale, as the cite began with a loud voice to pronounce: Who will buy a Laconian, who) put his hand to the citers mouth and said: Cry for Gods sake who will buy a prisoner? One of those mercenary soldiers whom king Lysimachus waged, being demanded of him this question: Art thou one of these Lacedæmonian slots? Why, thinke you (quoth the other) that a Lacedæmonian will deigne to come and serve for foure obols by the day? After that the Thebans had defeated the Lacedæmonians at the battell of Leuctres, they invaded the country of Laconia, so farre as to the verie river Eurotas; and one of them in boasting & glorious manner, began to say; And where be now 50 these brave Laconians? what is become of them? a Laconian who was a captive among them, straight waies made this answer: They are no where now indeed, for if they were, you would never have come thus farre as you doe. At what time as the Athenians delivered up their owne cite into the hands of the Lacedæmonians, for to be at their discretion, they requested that at leastwise they would leave them the isle Samos: unto whom the Laconians made this answer: VVhen you are not masters of your owne, doe you demand that which is other mens: hereupon arose the common proverb through out all Greece:

VVho

Who cannot that which was his owne save,
The isle of Samos would yett saue have.

The Lacedæmonians forced upon a time a certaine cite, and wan it by assault; which the Ephori being advertised of, said thus: Now is the exercise of our yong men cleane gone, now shall they have no more concurrences to keepe them occupied. When one of their kings made promise unto them for to rase another cite and destroy it utterly (if they so would) which oftentimes before had put those of Lacedæmon to much trouble; the said Ephori would not permit him, saying thus unto him: Doe not emolish and take away quite the whetstone that giveth an edge to the harts of our youth. The same Ephori would never allow that there should be 10 any professed masters, to teach their yong men for to wrestle and exercise other feats of activitie: To this end (say they) that there might bee jealousie and emulation among them, not in artificiall flight, but in force and vertue. And therefore when one demanded of Lysander, how Chiron had in wrestling overcome him and laid him along on the plaine ground: Even by flight and cunning (quoth he) and not by pure strength. Philip king of Macedonia, before he made entrie into their country, wrote unto them to this effect: Whether they had rather that he entred as a friend, or as an enemy: unto whom they returned this answer: Neither one nor the other. When they had sent an embassadour to Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus, having intelligence that the said embassadour in parle with him, effsoones gave him the name of King, they condemned him to pay a fine when he was returned home; notwithstanding that hee 20 brought as a present and gratuite from the said Demetrius, in time of extreme famine, a certaine measure of come called Medimnus, for every poll throughout the whole cite. It hapned that a leud and wicked man delivered in a certaine consultation very good counsell: this advice of his they approoved right well, howbeit receive it they would not comming out of his mouth, but caused it to be pronounced by another who was known to be a man of good life. Two brethren there were at variance, and in sute of law together; the Ephori let a good fine upon their fathers head, for that he neglected his sonnes, and suffred them to maintaine quarrell and debate one against another. A certaine musician who was a stranger and a traveller, they likewise condemned to pay a summe of money, for that he strake the strings of his harpe with his fingers. Two boies fought together, and one gave the other a mortall wound with a sickle or reaping hook; 30 & when the boy that was hurt lay at the point of death, & was ready to yeeld up the ghost, other companions of his promised to be revenged for his death, and to kill the other, who thus deadly had wounded him: Doe not so I beseech you (quoth he) as you love the gods, for that were injustice; and even I my selfe had done as much for him, if I had beene ought, and could have raught him first. There was another yong lad, unto whom certaine mates and fellows of his (in that season wherein yong lads were permitted freely to filch whatsoever they could handsomely come by, but reputed it was a shamefull and infamous thing for them to be surprized and taken in the manner) brought a yong cub or little foxe to keepe alive, which they had stolen: those who had lost the said cub came to make search; now had this lad hidden it clofe under his clothes, & the unhappie beast being angered, gnawed & bit him in the flanke as far as to his very bowels, 40 which he endured resolutely and never quetched at it, for feare he should be discovered: but after all others were gone and the search past, when his companions saw what a shrewd turne the curst cub had done him; they chid him for it, saying: That it had been far better to have brought forth the cub and shewed him, rather than to hide him thus with danger of death: Nay I wis (quoth he) for I had rather die with all the dolorous torments in the world, than for to save my life shamefully to be detected so, for want of a good heart. Some there were who encountered certaine Laconians upon the way in the country, unto whom they said: Happie are you that can come now this way, for the thieves are but newly gone from hence: Nay forsooth (by god Mars we sweate) we are never the happier therefore; but they rather, because they are not fallen into our hands. One demanded of a Laconian upon a time, what he knew and was skillfull in? 50 Mary in this, to be free. A yong lad of Sparta being taken prisoner by King Antigonus, and sold among other captives, obeyed him who had bought him in all things that he thought meet for to be done by a freeman; but when he commanded to bring him an urinall or chamber-pot to pisse in; he would not endure that indignitie, but said: Fetch it your selfe for me, I am no servant for you in such ministeries: now when his master urged him thereto and pressed hard upon him, hee ran up to the ridge or rooffe of the house, and said: You shall see what an one you have bought; and with that cast himselfe downe with his head forward, and brake his owne necke. Another there was to be sold; and when the partie who was about him, said thus: Wilt thou be good and profitable if I doe buy thee? Yea that I will (quoth he) though you never buy me. Another there was likewise upon sale in open market, and when the crier proclaimed aloud: Here is a slave, who buies him, who? A shame take thee (quoth he) couldst not thou say, a captive or prisoner, but a slave. A Laconian had for the badge or ensigne of his buckler a flie painted, and the same no bigger than one is naturally; whereupon some mocked him and flie painted, and the same no bigger than one is naturally; because he would not be known by it: Nay rather said: That he had made choise of this ensigne, because he would not be known by it: Nay rather (quoth he) I did it, because I would be the better marked: for I meane to approch mine enemies

 to neere, that they may see how great or little my cognifance is. Another there was, who when there was rendered unto him at the end of a banquet, the harpe to play upon according to the custome of Greece, refused it and said: The Laconians have not yet learned to play the foolles.
 One asked a Spartan once, if the way that led to Sparta, were safe or no? but he answered thus:
 Even according as a man doth goe downe thither: for * they who goe thither as lions, be hardly entreated and rue their comming; but hares we hunt from under the shade of their boroughs. In wrestling it chanced that a Laconian was caught hold on by the necke, and notwithstanding standing that he strove what he could to make the other leave his hold; yet hee forced him and made him stoupe groveling downeward to the ground: the Laconian seeing himselfe feeble in the reines of the backe, and at the point to be laide along, bit the others arme who held him so hard, whereupon hee began to crie: What thou Laconian, dost thou bite like women? No (quoth he) but I bite as lions use to do. A certaine Laconian who was maimed and lame of this legge, went to warfare, whereupon some mocked him; but hee said unto them: It is not for those to goe into the warres who are good of foot-manship and can runne away apace; but such as are able to make good their ground and keepe well their ranke. Another Laconian being shot thorow the body with an arrow, when he was at the point to yeeld up his vitall breath, said thus: It never grieves me to leese my life, but to die by the hand of an effeminate archer, before I came to hand-strokes, that is it that troubleth me. Another being come to an hostellie or inne to be lodged in, gave his hoste that kept the inne, a piece of flesh to dresse for his supper;
 but hee called for cheefe besides and oyle: And what needes that (quoth the Laconian) if I had cheefe, do you thinke that I would desire to have any viands more? Another hearing the marchant named Lampus borne in Aegina, highly praised and esteemed happie, for that he was exceeding rich, and had many great ships going at sea: I never (quoth hee) make reckoning of that felicitie, which hangeth by ropes and cords. Another likewise answered unto one who said unto him: Thou liest Laconian: And why not? (quoth he) wee are free, as for others that happen to speake untruths, they are wel punish for it and crie out, alas. There was a Laconian who laboured hard to make a dead body stand upright upon his feet; but when he saw that he could not bring his purpose to effect, do what he could: Now by Jupiter (quoth hee) there wanteth somewhat that should bee within. Tynnichus the Laconian, when his sonne Thrahybulus was slaine in the warre, tooke his death verie well and like a man, whereupon was this Epigram made:

*Thy body was upon the sheild of Thrahybulus brought All breathlesse to the armed troupe, from place where thou hadst fought:
 Seven deadly wounds at Ar gives hands thou didst receive in fight,
 And on the forepart of thy corps, thou shew'st them all in fight.
 Thy father old Sir Tynnichus
 it tooke with blood beaid,
 And putting it in funerall fire,
 with good cheere thus he said:
 Let cowardes weepe and waile thy death;
 but I thy father kinde,
 Will shed no teares, nor semblance make of sad and grieved minde:
 But thee enterre (my sonne) as doth*

*beseme thy fathers child,
 And as a true Laconian, who loves to die in field.*

The master of the baines where Alcibiades the Athenian was wont to bathe and wash himselfe, powred great store of water upon his bodie more than ordinarily upon others; a Laconian being then by said: It seemeth that he is not cleane and neat, but that he is exceeding foule and filthie, that he bestoweth so much water upon him. When King Philip of Macedonia entred with a maine army into Laconia, at what time as it was thought all the Lacedaemonians were killed up and dead, he said unto one of the Spartans: O poore Laconians, what will you do now?
 10 what else (quoth the Laconian) but die valiantly like men; for we alone of all other Greeks have beene taught to live free and not to serve in bondage under any others. After that King Agis was vanquished; Antipater the king demanded of the Lacedaemonians for hostages, fittie children of theirs: Eteocles one of the Ephori for the time being, returned this answer: That hee would not deliver into his hands any of their children, for feare they would learne ill manners and lewd conditions; for that they should not be brought up and nourtered in the discipline of their owne country, and wanting it they would not prove so much as good citizens; but if he would be so content, he should receive for pledges women or old men, twice as many. And when he menaced hereupon and said: That he would worke him all the despite that possibly he could;
 they answered all with one accord: If thou impose upon us those conditions which are more 20 grievous than death, we shall die with so much the better will. One old man desirous to see the combats at the Olympicke games, could not get a roome to sit in, but passed along by manic places, and no man would make him roome, but fell to laugh and made good game at him, untill he came at length to that quarter of the whole theater, whereas the Lacedaemonians were set; and there all the children, yea and many of the men rose up unto him, and offered him their place: all the whole assembly of the Greekes observed well this behaviour of theirs, and with great applause and clapping of hands, approoved and praised the same: then the good olde father

*Shaking his head with haire all gray,
 His beard also as hoare as they.*

30 and weeping withall: Ah, God helpe (quoth he) what a world is this? that Greekes should all of them know well enough what is good and honest; but the Lacedaemonians onely practise it?
 Some write, that the same hapned in Athens also, at the festivall solemnitie called Panathena;
 where those of Athens plaied mock-holiday, and made themselves merry with a poore olde man, who they seemed to call unto them (as it were) to give him a place among them; but after hee was come to them, no roome he could have with them, but was well mocked and flumped for his labour: howbeit, when he had passed along by all the rest, at length he came to a place where certaine ambassadours of Lacedaemon were set, and they made him roome, and set him among them: the people there assembled, taking great pleasure to see this act, clapped their hands aloud, with great acclamation, in token that they approved it: then one of the Spartans, who 40 there was: By the two twin-gods, Caster and Pollux (quoth he) I sweare, these Athenians know what is good and honest, but they doe not according to their knowledge. A begger upon a time craved almes of a Laconian, who answered him thus. But if I should give thee any thing, thou wouldst make an occupation of it, and beg still so much the more; for verily, whosoever he was that first bestowed almes upon thee, was the cause of this villanous life which thou lea-dest now, and hath made thee so vagrant and idle as thou art. Another Laconian seeing a collectour going about, and gathering mens devotions for the gods, said thus: I will now make no more reckoning of the gods, so long as they be poorer than my selfe. A certaine Spartan having taken an adulterer in bed with his wife, a foule and illfavoured woman: Wretched man that thou art (quoth he) what necessitie hath driven thee to this? Another having heard an oratour 50 making long periods, and drawing out his sentence in length: Now by Caster and Pollux, what a valiant man is he here? how he rolleth and roundly turneth his tongue about, and all to no purpose. A traveller passing thorow Lacedaemon, marked among other things, what great honour and reverence yong folke did to their elders: I perceive (quoth he) there is no place to Sparta, for an olde man to live in. A Spartan was upon a time asked the question, what maner of Poet Tyrtaeus was? A good Poet beleeveme (quoth he) to * wher and sharpen the courages of yong men to warre. Another having very badde and disealed cies, would needs goe to warfare; and when others said unto him: Wilt thou go indeed in that case as thou art in? what deed thinkest

thou to do there? Why (quoth he) if I do no other good els, I will be sure to dull the brightnesse of mine enemies sword. Buris and Speris, two Lacedæmonians, voluntarily departed out of their countrey, and went to Xerxes king of Persia, offering themselves to suffer that paine and punishment, which the Lacedæmonians had deserved by the sentence of the oracle of the gods, for killing those heralds which the king had sent unto them; who being come before him, were desiring that he should put them to death in what maner he would himselfe, for to acquit the Lacedæmonians: the king wondering at this resolution of theirs, not onely pardoned the fault, but earnestly requested them to stay with him, promising them liberrall enterainment: And how can we (say they) live here, abandoning our native soile, our lawes, and those kinde of men, for whose sake to die we have so willingly undertaken this long voiage? and when a great captaine<sup>10</sup> under the king, named Indarnes, intreated them fill very instantly, assuring them upon his word, that they should be kindly used, and in equall degree of credit and honour, with those who were, in highest favour with the king, and most advanced by him, they said unto him: It seemeth unto us sir, that you full little know what is liberty and freedome; for he that wist what a jewell it were, if he be in his right wits, would not change the fame for the whole realme of Persia. A certaine Laconian as he way-fared, came unto a place where there dwelt an olde friend and host of his, who the first day, of purpose avoided him and was out of the way, because he was not minded to lodge him; but the morrow after, when he had either hired or borrowed faire bedding, coverings and carpets, received him very stately; but this Laconian mounting up to his beds, trampled and stamped the faire and rich coverlets under his feet, saying withall: I be shew these fine beds<sup>20</sup> and trim furniture, for they were the cause that yesternight I had not so much as a mat to lie upon, when I should sleepe and take my rest. Another of them, being arrived at the city of Athens and seeing there the Athenians going up and downe the city, some crying salt-fish to sell, others flesh and such like viands; some like publicanes, sitting at the receit of custome, other professing the trade of keeping brothel-houses, and exercising many such vile and bale occupations, esteeming nothing at all foule and dishonest: after he was returned home into his owne countrey, when his neighbours and fellow-citizens asked him, what newes at Athens, and how all things stood there? Passing well (quoth he) and it is the best place that ever I came in (which he spake by way of mockerie and derision) every thing there, is good and honest; giving them to understand, that all meanes of gaine and lucre, were held lawfull & honest at Athens, and nothing<sup>30</sup> there, was counted villanous and dishonest. Another Laconian being asked a question, answered; No: and when the party who mooved the question said: Thou liest; the Laconian replied againe, and said: See what a foole thou art, to aske me that which thou knowest well enough thyselfe! Certaine Laconians were lent upon a time, ambassadours to Lygdamis the tyrant, who put them off from day to day, and hastened with them so, as he gave them no audience; at the last, it was tolde them, that hee was at all times weake and ill at ease, and not in case to be conferred with: the ambassadours thereupon said unto him who brought this word unto them: Tell him from us, that we are not come to wrestle, but to parle onely with him. A certaine priest, induced a Laconian into the orders and ceremonies of some holy religion; but before that he would fully receive and admit him, he demanded of him what was the most grievous sinne that ever he committed, and which lay heaviest upon his conscience? The gods know that best (quoth the Laconian: but when the priest pressed hard upon him, and was very importunate, protesting that there was no remedie, but he must needs utter and confesse it: unto whom (quoth the Laconian) must I tell it, unto you or to the God whom you serve? unto God (quoth the other:) Why then turne you behind me (quoth hee) or retire aside out of hearing. Another Laconian chanced in the night to goe over a church-yard by a tombe or monument, and imagined that he saw a spirit standing before him; whereupon he advanced forward directly upon it with his javelin; and as he ran full upon it, and as he thought, strake thorow it, he said withall: Whither fliest thou from me, ghost that thou art, now twise dead? Another having vowed to fling himselfe headlong from the high Promontorie Leucas, downe into the sea, mounted up the top thereof, but when hee saw, what an huge downfall it was, he gently came downe againe on his feet: now when one twitted and reproched him therefore: I wist not (quoth he) that this vow of mine had need of another greater than it. Another Laconian there was, who in a battell and hot medley, being fully minded to kill his enemy who was under him, and to that purpose had lifted up his sword backe, to give him a deadly wound; so soone as ever hee heard the trumpet sound the retreat, presently staied his hand, and would no more follow his stroake: now when one asked him, why he slew not his enemy whom he had in his hands? Because (quoth he) it is better<sup>40</sup> to

to obey a captaine, than to kill an enemy. There was a Laconian tooke the soile in wrestling at the Olympicke games; and when one cried aloud: Thy concurrent is better than thou, Laconian: Better (quoth hee) not so, but in deed he can skil better than I of supplanting and tripping.

THE CVSTOMES AND ORDINANCES AMONG THE LACEDÆMONIANS.

HE manner and custome was at Lacedæmon, that when they entred into their publicke halles where they tooke their meats and meales together; the eldest man of the whole companie should shew the doores unto everie one as they came, and say unto them: At these doores there goeth not forth so much as one word. The most exquisite dish among them was a messe of broth, which they called Blacke-pottage; inso much as when that was served up to the table, the elder folke would not care for any flesh meats, but leave all them fame for the yonger fort. And (as it is reported) Demys the Tyrant of Sicily, for this purpose bought a Cooke from Lacedæmon, and commaunded him to make him such pottage and spare for no cost; but after he had a little tasted thereof, he found it so bad that he cast up all that he had taken of it; but his Cooke said unto him: Sir, if you would finde the goodnesse of this broth, you must be exercised first after the<sup>50</sup> Lacedæmonian manner, all watted, and be well washed in the river Enrotas. Now after the Laconians have eat & drunk soberly at these ordinaries, they returne home to their houses without torch or any light before them: for it is not lawfull for any man at Lacedæmon, to go either from thence or to any place else with a light carried before him in the night; because they should bee accustomed to keepe their way, and goe confidently without leare, all night long in the darke without any light at all. To write and reade they learned for necessitie onely; as for all other forein sciences and literature they banished them quite out of their coasts, like as they did all strangers and aliens: and in verie truth their whole studie was to learne how to obey their superiours, to endure patiently all travels, to vanquish in fight, or to die for it in the place. All the yeere long they went in one single gaberdine without coat at all under it; and ordinarily they were<sup>40</sup> foule and sullied, as those who used not the stoupes & baines, ne yet annointed themselves for the most part. Their boies and yong men commonly slept together in one dorter, by bands and troups, upon pallets and course beds, which they themselves gathered, breaking and tearing with their owne hands without any edged tooles, the heads of caues and reeds which grew along the banks of the river Enrotas: and in winter time they strewed and mingled among, a certaine kind of Thistle downe, which they call Lyophanes; for they are of opinion, that such stuffe hath in it (I wot not what) which doth heat them. It was lawfull and permitted among them to love yong boies for their good minds and vertuous natures; but to abute their persons wantonly and fleshly, was reputed a most infamous thing, as if such were lovers of the bodie and not of the minde; in such fort, as whosoever was accused and attaint thereof, became noted with infamie,<sup>50</sup> and shame followed him wherefoever he went all his life time. The custome was that elder folke when and wherefoever they met with yonger, should demand whither and whereabout they went? yea and checke and chide them, if they were to seeke of a good answere or if they went about to devise colourable excuses: and whosoever he was that did not reprove him that did a fault in his presence, incurred the same reprehension and blame as he did who transgressed; yea and if he chafed and shewed himselfe discontented, when he was reprooved, he sustained reproch, disgrace and discredit thereby. If peradventure one were suspected and taken tardie in some fault; he must be brought to a certaine altar within the citie, and there forced to go round about about it singing a song, made of purpose for his owne reproofe, and containing naught else, but the blame and accusation of himselfe. Moreover, yong folke were not onely to honor their owne fathers, and to be obedient unto them; but also to shew reverence unto all other elder persons; namely, in yielding them the better hand, in turning out of their way when they met them, and giving them the wall, in rising up from their seats before them when they came in place, and in standing still when they passed by: and therefore everie man had a certaine hand of government, and dispose, not onely (as in other cities) over their owne children, their proper servants and goods; but also they had a regard of their neighbours children, servants and goods, as well as if they had bene their owne: they made use also of them as of things common, to the end, that to each one everie thing might be (as it were) his owne in proprietie. Whereupon, if it fortuned that a child having bene chastised by another man, went to complaine thereof to his owne father; it was a shame for the said father, if he gave him not his payment againe: for by the ordinarie course of discipline in that countrey, they were assured, that their neighbors would impose nothing upon their children, but that which was good and honest. Yong lads were used to fitch and steale whatsoever they could come by, for their food and victuals; yea and they learned from their verie infancie, to forelay and lie prettily in ambush for to surprisethose who were asleepe, & stood not well upon their guards: but say that one were taken in the manner when he stealerh; this was his punishment, namely, to be whipped and to fast from meat; expressly therefore and of very purpose they were allowed verie little to eate, to the end that they might be driven upon verie extreame necessitie to make shifts and expose themselves venturously into any danger, yea and to devise alwaies some cunning craft or other to steale more cleanly: but generally the reason and effect of this their straight diet was, that they should long before accustom their bodies never to be full, but able to endure hunger; for that in deed they were of opinion, that they should be the meetest for foulitarie, if they could take paines and travell without food; yea and that it was a good meanes to be more continent, sober, and thrifte; if they were taught & inured to continue a long time with small cost & expence: to be brieve, persuaded they were: That to abstaine eating of flesh or fish dressed in the kitchin, or to feed savordy of bread or any other viands that came next to hand, made mens bodies more healthy, & caused them to burnish and grow up; for that the naturall spirits not pressed nor over-charged with a great quantitie of meat, and so by that meanes not kept and depressed downward, but dispersed and spread in largeness and breadth, gave libertie for the bodies to shoot up, waxe tall, and perfectible; yea and made them more faire and beautifull; for that the habitudes and complexion which be slender, lank and empie, are more obsequent unto that naturall vertue and facultie which giveth forme and fashion to the limmes; whereas those who be corpulent, grosse, full, and given to much feeding, by reason of weight and heavines resist the same. They set their minds also to compose and make proper ditties and ballads, yea, and no lesse studious are they to sing the same; having alwaies in these their compositions, a certaine pricke or sting (as it were) to stir up and provoke their courage and stomacke, to enspire also into the hearts of the hearers a considerate resolution, and an ardent zeale and affection to doe some brave deed: the ditties were plaine, simple, and without all affectation; containing in manner nothing else, but the praises of those who had lived virtuously, and died valiantly in the warres for the defense of Sparta, as being of all others most happie; as also the blame and reproch of such as for cowardise and faint heart were afraid to die, whom they accounted to live a wretched and miserable life. Moreover they stood much upon promises of future prowess or vanteries of present valour, according to the diversitie of their ages who chanted the said songs; for alwaies in their solemne and publike feasts, three quiers or dances there were: one of old folke, and the foreburthen of their canticle was this:

*The time was when we gallant were,
Youthfull and hardy, void of feare.*

Next to it came in place a daunce of men in their best age and full strength, who answered them so in this wise:

*But we are come to prooffe, and now at best;
Try who that list, to fight we are now prest.*

And a third followed after of children who chaunted thus:

*And we one day shall be both tall and strong;
Surpassing far, if that we live so long.*

Now their very notes and tunes to the measures and numbers whereto they daunced and marched ched in battell against their enemies after the sound of the flute, were appropriate and fitted to incite their hearts to valour, confident securitie, and contempt of death: for Lycurgus did study and endeavor to joine the exercise & practise of militarie discipline with the pleasure of musick, to the end, that warlike and vehement motions being mingled and delaid with sweet melodie, might be tempered with a delectable accord and harmonie: and therefore in battels before the charge and first shock of the conflict, their king was wont to sacrifice unto the Muses, for this entent, that the soldiers in fight might have the grace to performe some glorious and memorable exploits. But if any man passed one point beyond this ancient musicke, they would not endure him, in so much as the Ephori set a fine upon the head of Terpander (though otherwise he loved antiquitie well enough, and was the best harper in his time, yea & tooke greatest delight to praise the heroicke acts of the renowned woorthies in times past) and more than that, they hung up his harp upon a stake or post, onely because he had set to it one string more than ordinarie, whereby he might varie his voice the better with more sundry notes; for they allowed no songs nor sonets but such as were plaine and simple; and when Timothus at the feast Carnia played upon the harpe for to winne the prize; one of the Ephori taking a skene or knife in his hand, asked him, on whether side, either above or beneath, he would rather have him to cut a two the strings which were more than seven. Moreover Lycurgus tooke from them all vaine & superfluous feare as touching sepulchers, permitting them to burie their dead within the citie, and to reare their monuments and tombs round about the temples of their gods: he cut off likewise all pollutions of mortuaries, and would not give them leave to enterre any thing with the corps, but onely to enwrap the same within a winding sheet of red cloth, together with olive leaves strewed among, and the same indifferently to all bodies, no more to one than another: sensibly he put downe all epitaphes and superscriptions upon graves, unless it were for such as lost their lives in battell; forbidding all mourning and dolefull lamentations. Furthermore it was unlawfull for them to make voiajes into strange countries, for feare they should learne forreign fashions and uncivill manners, favouring of no good bringing up; and for the same reason, Lycurgus banished aliens out of the citie, lest if they should thither resort, by reason of their confuence, they might teach and shew the citizens their vices. And as for citizens borne, any of them would not suffer their children to be brought up according to the discipline and institution of the citie, they might not enjoy the rights and privileges of free burgesse. Some say also that Lycurgus ordained; If a very alien would yeeld to the observation of his discipline, and be ranged under the policie of the State, he might enjoy one of those portions which from the beginning was set out and appointed; but he was not allowed to sell the same. The maner and custome was in Lacedemon, to make use of their neighbours servants, even as well as of their owne, whensoever they had any businesse or occasion to employ them; as also to make bold with their horses and hounds, unless the owners themselves and masters had present need of them. In the countrey also and territorie of Laconia, if they stood in need of anything that was in their neighbours house, they would goe boldly and aske no leave, to their cupboards, presses, coffers, and such places where the thing was, make no more ado but open them, take out and carie away whatsoever they thought good; so they made fast and shut againe the roome out of which they had taken ought. To warfare they went in red liveries, both for that they thought this colour more decent for a man, as also because it resembled blood, it sticke the greater feare into those who were not used thereto; besides, there was good use and profit thereof in this respect, that if any of them hapned to be wounded, the enemies could not so perceive it, because that colour looked so like unto blood. Whensoever they had vanquished their enemies by some stratagem that their capitaines used, their maner was to sacrifice an ox unto Mars; but if they got a victorie by fine force & open manhood, they sacrificed a cock; by which meanes, they occasioned their leaders to be not onely valiant, but also politicke warriors. Among other praies that they made unto the gods this was ever one: That they might have the power and grace to beare wronges; but the shame of all their supplications was this: That the gods would vouchsafe them honour for well doing, & no more. If they worshipped the goddess Venus in her compleat armor, and made all the images of their gods, as well female as male, with launces and javelins in their hands, as if they all had militar and martiall verue in them. Also they used this saying as a common proverbe: Call upon fort are in each enterprife; millius

As if they would say, that we ought when we invoke the gods, to enterprife somewhat our selves, selves, and lay our hands to worke, or else not to call upon them. They used to let their children see the Ilotes when they were drunk, to keepe them by their example from drinking much wine. They never knocked and rapped at their neighbours doores, but stood without, and called aloud to those within. The curry-combes that they occupied were not of iron, but of canes and reeds. They never heard any comedies or tragedies acted, because neither in earnest nor in game they would not heare those that any wise contradicted the lawes. When Archilochus the poet was come to Sparta, they drave him out the very same houre that he came, for that they knew he had made these verses, wherein he delivered: That it was better to fling away weapons than to die in the field:

*A foole he is, who trusting in his shield,
Doth venture life and limme in bloody field:
As for mine owne, I have it flung me fro

Others translate it thus.

*Some say as now, in that my doubtie shield
Doth take great joy, which flying out of field,
Though full against my mind, I flung me fro
And left behind in bushes thicke that grow.
Although it were right good, yet would not I Presume to fight with it, and so to dy,
Farewell my shield, though thou be lost and gone,
Another day as good I shall buy one.*

All their sacred and holy ceremonies were common, as well for their daughters as their sonnes. The Ephori condemned one Siraphidas, to pay a summe of money, for that he suffered himselfe to take wrong and abuse at many mens hands. They caused one to be put to death for playing the hypocrite, and wearing sackcloth like a publike penitent, for that the saide sackcloth was purfled with a border of purple. They rebuked and checked a yoong man as he came from the ordinary place of exercise, for that he frequented it still, knowing as he did the way to Pytea, where was held the assembly of the States of Greece. They chased out of the citie a Rhetorician named Cephisophon, because he made his boast; That he could speak if it were a whole day of any theme proposed unto him; for they said: That speech ought to be proportionable to the subject matter. Their children would endure to be lashed & whipped all the day long, yea, and many times even to death, upon the altar of Diana, surnamed Orthia, taking joy and pleasure therein, striving a vie for the victorie who could hold out longest; and looke who was able to abide most beating, he was best esteemed, and caried away the greatest praise: this strife & emulation among them was called the Vhippados; and once every yeere they observed such an exercise. But one of the best, most commendable and blessed things that Lycurgus provided for his citizens; was the plentie & abundance that they had of rest & leisure; for they were not allowed at all to meddle with any mechanicall arte; and to trafficke and negotiate painfully for to gather and heape up goods, was in no wise permitted; for he had so wrought that riches among them was neither honored nor desired. The Ilotes were they that ploughed and tilled their ground for them, yeelding them as much as in old time was set downe and ordeined; and execrable they esteemed it to exact more of any of them, to the end that those Ilotes for the sweetness of gain which they found thereby, might serve them more willingly, and themselves covert to have no more than the old rate. Forbidden likewise were the Lacedæmonians to be mariners, or to fight at sea; yet afterwards for all that, they fought triall battels, and became lords of the sea; howbeit they soone gave that over, when they once saw that the manners and behavior of their citizens were thereby corrupted and depraved; but they changed afterwards againe, and were mutable, as well in this as in all other things: for the first that gathered and hoarded up money for the Lacedæmonians, were condemned to death, by reason that there was an ancient oracle which delivered this answer unto Alcamenes and Theopompus, two of their kings,

Avarice one day (who ever lives to see)

Of Sparta citie will the ruine bee.

And yet Lysander after he had wonne the citie of Athens, brought into Sparta a great masse of gold and silver, which the citizens received willingly, and did great honour unto the man himselfe for his good service. True it is, that so long as the citie of Sparta observed the lawes of Lycurgus, and kept the othes which it was sworne by, she was a paragon, yea and the soveraigne of all all Greece, in good government and glorie for the space of 300. yeeres: but when they came once to transgresse the saide lawes and breake their oathes; avarice and covetousnesse crept in among them by little and little, and they with all their puissance & authoritie decreased, yea and their allies and confederates heereupon began to be ill affected unto them: and yet being as they were in this declining estate, after that king Philip of Macedonia had wonne the battell at Charonea, when all other cities and states of Greece, by a generall consent, and with one accord had chosen him the generall capitaine of all the Greeks, as well for land as sea, yea, and after him his sonne Alexander the Great, upon the destruction of the citie Thebes, only the Lacedæmonians, notwithstanding their citie lay all open, without any wall about it, and themselves were brought to a very small number by occasion of their continuall warres, which had wasted and consumed them, whereby they were become very feeble, and by consequence more easie to be defeated than ever before, yet for that they had retained still some little reliques of the government established by Lycurgus, they would never yeeld to serve under those two mightie monarches, no nor other kings of Macedonia their successors, neither would they be present at the generall diets and common assemblies of other states, nor contribute any money with the rest, untill they having utterly cast aside and rejected the lawes of Lycurgus, they were held under and yoked with the tyranny of their owne citizens; namely when they retained no part of the ancient discipline, whereby they grew like unto other nations, and utterly lost their old reputation, glory, and libertie of franke speech, so as in the end they were brought into servitude, and even at this day be subject unto the Roman empire, as well as other cities and states of Greece.

THE APOPTHEGMES, THAT IS TO SAY, THE NO- BLE SAYINGS AND ANSWERS OF LACEDÆMONIAN DAMES.

ARGILEONIS the mother of Brasidas; (after that her sonne was slaine, when certaine embassadors from the citie Amphipolis came to Sparta, and visited her;) demanded of them, whether her sonne died like a valiant man, and as became a Spartan? now when they praised him exceedingly, saying that he was the bravest man in armes in all Lacedæmon; she said againe unto them: My sonne was indeed a knight of valour and honour (my good friends;) but Lacedæmon hath many others yet more valiant than he was.

GORGO, the daughter of king Cleomenes, when Aristagoras the Milesian was come to Sparta, for to sollicit Cleomenes to make warre upon the king of Persia, in the defence of the Ionians freedome; and in consideration heereof promised him a good round summe of money; and the more that he contradicted and denied the motion, the more he still augmented the summe of money which he promised: Father (quoth she) this stranger here will corrupt you if you, send him not the sooner out of your house. Also when her father willed hir one day to deliver certaine corn unto a man, by way of a reward and recompence, saying withall: For this is he who hath taught me how to make wine good: How now, good father (quoth she) shall there be more wine drunke still, considering that they who drinke thereof become more delicate and lesse valorous? When she saw how Aristagoras had one of his men to put on his shooes: Father (quoth she) heere is a stranger that hath no hands. When she saw a forreiner comming toward her who was wont to goe softly and delicatlie, she thrust him from her her and said: Avaunt idle lusk as thou art, and get thee gone, for thou art not so good of deed as a woman.

GYRTIAS, when Acrotatus her nephew or daughters sonne, (from out of a braule and fray that was betwene him and other yoonkers his companions) was brought home with many a wound, inso much as no man looked for life; seeing his familiar friends and those of his acquaintance, waile and take on piteously: What (quoth she) let be this weeping and lamentation, for now hath he shewed of what blood he is descended; neither ought wee to crie out and bewaile for the hurts of valiant men, but rather to goe about their cure and salve them; if haply we may save their lives. When a messenger coming out of Candia, where he served in the warres, brought newes that the said Acrotatus was slaine in fight: Why (quoth she) what else should he do, being once gone forth to warre, but either die himselfe or else kill his enemies? yet had I rather heare, and it doth me much more good that he died woorthy my selfe, woorthy his native country and his progenitours, than that he should live as long as possible a man could, like a coward and man of no woorth.

DEMETRIA hearing that her sonne proved a dastard, and indeed not woorthy to be her sonne, so soone as ever he was returned from the wars, she killed him with her owne hands; whereupon was made this epigram of her:

*By mothers hand was slaine one Demetrie,
For that he brake the lawes of chivalrie,
No marvell, she a noble Spartan dame
Disclaime her sonne, unwoorthy of that name.*

Another woman of Lacedæmon being given to understand, that her sonne had abandoned his ranke, made him likewise away, as unwoorthy of that country wherein he was borne, saying: That he was no sonne of hers: And thereupon this epigram also was composed of her:

*Amischiefe take thee wicked impe, be gone in devils name Through balefull darknesse: Hatred is too good, and earthly shame:
For cowards such of craven kind like hims, are not to drinke, Nor wash in faire Eurotas streame their bodies, as I thinke.
Avaunt thou cur-dogge, w helpe to hell,
thou devils limme unmon'd, unwoorth by Sparta soile thou art for thee I never grow'd.*

Another, hearing that her sonne was saved and had escaped out of the hands of his enemies, wrote thus unto him: There runneth a naughtie rumor of thee; either stop the course thereof, or else live not. There was another likewise, whose children had fled out of the battell, and when they came home unto her, she welcomed them in this manner: VVhither goe you running leawd lozels and cowardly slaves as you are; thinke you to enter hither againe from whence you first came? and therewith plucked up her cloaths, and shewed them her barebelly. Also another espying her sonne new returned from the wars, and comming toward her: What newes (quoth she) how goeth the world with our country and common-wealth? and when he answered: We have lost the field and all our men be slaine; sheooke up an earthen pot, let it fly at his head & killed him our-right, saying: And have they sent thee to bring us the newes? There was one brother recounted unto his mother what a noble death his brother died, unto whom his mother answered: And wert not thou ashamed that thou didst not accompanie him in so faire a journey? Another there was who had sent her sonnes (and five they were in number) to the warres, and she stood waiting at the townes end, about the suburbs and hamlets neere unto them, for to hearken what was the issue of the battell: and of the first man whom he encountered from the campe, she asked, what newes, and who had the day; hee told her that her sonnes were slaine all five: Thou leawd varlet (quoth shee) and base slave as thou art, I did not demand that question of thee; but in what state the affaire of the common-wealth stood: The victorie (quoth he) is ours: Then am I well appaid (saith shee) and contented with the losse of my children. Another there was, unto whom as she buried her sonne slaine in the warres; there came a silly old woman and moaned her, saying: Ah good woman what fortune is this? Why good (quoth shee?) by Castor and Pollux I sweare; for I bare him into this world for nothing else, but that he should spend his life for Sparta; and loe this is now hapned. A ladie there was of Tonia, who bare herselfe verie proud of a worke in tapistrie which she herselfe had made, most costly and curiously; but a Lacedæmonian dame shewed unto her, foure children, all verie well given and honestly brought up: Such as these (quoth shee) ought to be the works of a ladie of honour, and herein should a noble woman in deed, make her boast and vaunt herselfe. Another there was, who heard newes, that a sonne of hers behaved himselfe not well in a strange country where hee was, unto whom she wrote a letter in this wise: There is blowen a bad brute of thee in these parts, either prove it false or else die, I advise thee. Certaine fugitives or exiled persons from Chios, came to Sparta, who accused Pedaretus, and laid many crimes to his charge: his mother Teletia hearing thereof, sent for them to come unto her; at whose mouthes when she heard the severall points of their imputations, and judging in herselfe that hee was in fault, and had done great wrongs, she sent a letter unto him in this sort: Either do better or tarry there still, and never thinke to have thy selfe here. In like manner another wrote unto her sonne accused of an heinous crime, in these termes: My sonne quit thy selfe of this imputation, or else quit thy life. Another accompanying a son of hers upon the way when he went to battell, said unto him: Sonne remember every foot that thou steppst to vertue and prowess, and fight like a man. Another whose sonne returned out of the field wounded in the foot, and complaining unto her of the great paine which he endured: Sonne (quoth shee) if thou wouldst remember vertue and valour, thou shouldst never thinke of thy paine. A certaine Lacedæmonian chanced so grievously to be wounded in a skirmish, that he had much adoe to stand upon his legs, so that he was faine to go with crutches (as it were) upon foure feet; now when he was abashed to see some laugh at him for it, his mother said: Greater cause thou hast (my sonne) to rejoice for this testimonie of thy valour and prowess, than to be dismayed at their fond and senselesse laughter. Another woman when she gave unto her sonne a shield, admonished him to use it well, and do his devoir like a man, and these words she used unto him: My sonne either bring this shield home againe, or let it bring thee dead upon it. Another likewise giving a targuet to her sonne when he tooke his leave of her to go to warre, said unto him: Thy father kept this targuet well from time to time; see thou (for thy part) keepe it as well, or else die with it. Another when her sonne found fault with his short sword, said unto him: Then set foot neerer to thine enemy. A woman hearing that her sonne died valiantly in battell: No marvell (quoth shee) for he was my sonne. Contrariwise, another when she heard that her sonne tooke him to his heeles, and escaped by good footmanship: He was never (quoth shee) a sonne of mine. But another hearing that her sonne was slaine fighting in the verie place where his captaine had set him: Remoove him than (quoth shee) from thence, and let his brother step into his place. A Lacedæmonian woman being in a solemne and publicke procession, with a chaplet of flowers upon his head, understood that her sonne had wonne a field, but was so grievously wounded, that ready he was to yeeld up his breath; without putting off her chaplet of flowers from her head, but glorying (as it were) in these newes: Oh my friends (quoth shee) how much more glorious and honourable is it for a souldier to die with victorie in battell, than for a champion to survive after he hath wonne the prize in the Olympike games. A brother reported unto his sister, how valiant her sonne died in battell, unto whom she answered againe: Looke how much I joy & take pleasure to heare this of him; so much I am displeased and discontented at you, brother, for that you would not beare him companie in so vertuous a voiage, but tarry behind him. When one sent unto a Lacedæmonian woman to sollicite and found her, whether she would consent unto him, she made this answer: When I was a maiden, I learned to obey my father, and so I did evermore; and when I was a wife, I did the like unto my husband; if then that which he demanded of me be honest and just, let him acquaint my husband with it first. A poore maiden being asked the question on what dowrie she would bring her husband? The pudicitie (quoth shee) and honestie of my country. Another Lacedæmonian woman being demanded, whether she had yet bene with her husband? Not I (quoth shee) but hee hath bene with me. Also another young woman chanced secretly to be deflowred and to lesse her maiden-head; now when by some mishap she fell unto untimely labour, and to slip an abortive fruit; she endured the paines of travell thereto belonging so patiently, without one crie or groane, that neither her father, nor any one about her, perceived any thing at all that she was delivered; for shame and honestie fighting together, overcame all the vehemencie of her paines. A Lacedæmonian woman being sold in the market for a slave, was asked what she could doe? I can skill (quoth shee) to bee true and faithfull. Another likewise being a captive and demanded the like question, answered, that she could keepe the house well. Another likewise when she was asked by one whether shee would proove good if he bought her, made answer thus: Yea that I will, although you never buy me. Last of all, a Lacedæmonian woman when she was to be sold in port-sale, and the crier demanded of her what she had skill in? answered: To be free. Now when he that bought her commaunded her to do some things unbecoming a free person: You will repent (quoth she) that you envied your selfe to noble a possession; and so she killed herselfe.

THE VERTVOVS DEEDS OE WOMEN.

The Summarie.

Vertue alwaies deserueth praise where so ever it is found, but especially when it is proceeded from feeble instruments, and those of small shew; for by that meanes the excellencie thereof is so much better seeme: our Author therefore in that regard, hath made here a collection of histories, relating the worthy demeanours of many women who have shewed manly courage in sundry dangers; the consideration whereof, is able greatly to move and affect the reader. In the Preface of this discourse, after he had refuted the opinion of Thucydides, who would confine women (as it were) into a perpetuall eremitage, he proveth by divers reasons, that vertue being alwaies the selfe-same, notwithstanding that it hath objects and subjects different, it were meere injurie and too much iniquitie, either to forget or to despise those women who for their valour have deserued, that their name and example should continue to the end that the same might be imitated as occasions requirer in many sorts, not onely by other women, but also by the most part of men. Which done, he describeth the notable exploits of some in generall: and then he commeth to speake of certaine in particular, noting and observing in them divers graces and commendable parts, but especially an excreame hatred of tyrannie and servitude, an ardent love and affection toward their country, a singular affection to their husbands, rare honestie, pudicitie, chastitie joined with a generous nature, which hath caused them, both to enterprize and also to execute heroique acts and well deserving that praise, which hath bene reserved entire for such women, after so many yeeres until this day, by the meanes of this present historickall fragment; the which concerneth goodly instructions for men and women of name and make, to induce them to governe themselves in such sort, that in the mids of the greatest confusions they might take a good courage, and lay their hands to that which their vocation requirerh; and to hold this for certeine, that enterprises lawfull and necessarie, will sooner or later have good issue, to the shame and ruine of the wicked, but to the repose and quietnesse of all persons, who desire, seeke, and procure that which is good.

THE VERTUOUS DEEDS of women.

Am not of Thucydides minde (dame Clea) touching the vertue of women; for he is of this opinion: That she is the best & most vertuous, of whom there is least speech abroad, as well to her praise as her dispraise; thinking that the name of a woman of honour, ought to be shut up and kept fast within, like as her bodie, that it never may go forth. Gorgias yet (me thinks) was more reasonable, who would have the renowne and fame, but not the face & visage of a woman, to be knowne unto men: and it seemeth unto me, that it was an excellent law and custome among the Romans, which imported thus much: That women as well as men, after their death might be honoured publicly at their funerals, with such praises as they had deserved: and therefore immediately after the decease of the most vertuous ladie Leontis, I discoursed with you at large upon this matter; which discourse (in my conceit) was not without some consolation founded upon reason & Philosophy: and now also (according to your request at that time) I send you in writing, the rest of our speech and communication, tending to this point: That the vertue of man and woman is all one and the very fame; which appeareth by the prooffe and testimony of many and sundry examples, drawn out of ancient histories, collected by me, not upon any intention to please the eare; but if the nature of an example be such, as alwaies, to the persuasive power that it hath to proove, there is joined also a lively vertue to delight. This treatise of mine rejecteth not the grace of that pleasure, which doth second and favour the efficacy of a prooffe; neither is it ashamed to join Graces with Muses, which (as Empyridas saith) is the best conjunction in the world, inducing the minde most easily to give eare and credit unto good reasons, by means of the delectation which it there findeth. For it to proove, that it is all one art, to paint and draw the life of women and men, I should produce and bring forth such pictures of women as Apelles, Zeuxis or Nicomachus have left behind them; hath any man reason to finde fault and to charge me, that I aime and intend to delight the eie and content the minde, rather than to verifie my assertion? I suppose that no man will do so: seemably, if otherwise to shew, that the art of Poetrie, or skill to represent in verse, all things whatsoever, is the same in women and men, and nothing different one from the other, I should confesse the Odes and verses of Sappho with those of Anacreon; or the oracles penned by the Sibilles with those which are set downe by Bacchis; is there any man that could justly blame such a demonstration, for that it draweth the hearer to beleve with some pleasure and content? no man (I trow) would ever so say: and yet there were no better way to know either the resemblance, or the difference in the vertue of man and woman, than in comparing lives with lives, and deeds with deeds; as if wee should lay together the works of some noble science, and consider them one by another; even so likewise, to see whether the magnificence of queene Semiramis, hath all one forme and figure with that of king Sesostrius; and the wisdom of queene Tanquil, with that of king Servius; or the magnanimitie of ladie Porcia, with that of Brutus; or of dame Timoclea, with that of Pelopidas; namely, in that quality which is most principall, and wherein lieth the chiefest point and force of these vertues: for vertue admitteth certeine other differences, as proper and particular colours, according to divers natures, and is in some sort conformable to the manners and conditions of those subjects wherein they be, and to the temperatures of their bodies, or to the vertie nutriments and divers diets and fashions of their life. For Achilles was after one sort valiant, and Ajax after another; the wisdom of Ulysses was not like unto Nestors; neither were Cato and Agesilanus just alike; Irene loved not her husband in that manner as Alceste loved hers; nor Cornelia & Olympias were alike magnanimous; and yet for all that, we say not, that there be many and divers kinds of fortitude, sundry sorts of prudence and widome, nor different justices, in regard of the dissimilitude and varietie which ariseth particularly in each one person, so as the said peculiar differences, do not exclude any one vertue from the proper definition thereof. As for such examples as are most divulged and published abroad (of which I presume you have already sufficient knowledge, and firmly remember their historie, by that which you have read in ancient books) I will passe them over at this present; unless haply there be some acts worthy of remembrance brance, which they were ignorant of, who before our time have written the common histories and vulgar Chronicles. But for that the women in times past, as well in common as particular, have performed many memorable deeds, it will not be amiss in the first place to set downe briefly what some of them have done in societie and companie together.

THE TROJANE DAMES.

OF those Trojanes who escaped after the winning and destruction of Troie the Great, the most part went to seeke their fortune, and by force of tempest (the rather for that they had no skill in navigation, and were not acquainted with the seas) were cast upon the coast of Italie,<sup>10</sup> where putting into such baies, ports & creeks as they could meet with, in that very place (whence the river Tybris dischargeth it selfe into the sea) with much adoe and great difficultie they landed, and the men went wandering up and downe the countrey, for to see if they could light upon those that might direct them in their voyage, and give them some light and intelligence of those coasts. Meane while the women communed and devised thus among themselves: That since they had bene the most fortunate and happie nation in the world, it were better for them to settle in any one certaine place whatsoever, than still to wander uncertainly upon the seas, and to make that, their countrey and seat of habitation, since they were not able to recover that native soile which they had lost: to which motion after they had all with one accord agreed, they set fire on their ships, and the first ring-leader in this action was a Ladie (by report) named Roma; which done, they went farther up into the continent to meet with the men aforesaid, who now by this time were coming apace to the sea for to succour their ships on fire, & fearing their furious anger, they fell to embrace and kisse them very kindly, some their husbands, others their kinsfolke, and by this means appeased their wrath. Hereupon arose that custom, which continueth at this day among the Romanes, that no men should salute their kinsfolke, and those that be joined in blood to them, by kissing their lips: for the Trojan men seeing (as it should seeme) in what necessitie they stood, were well enough content; and withal, finding the inhabitants of the sea-coasts courteous, and ready to receive and entertaine them friendly, approved that which the women had done, and so remained and dwelt in the same part of Italie among the Latines.<sup>30</sup>

THE DAMES OF PHOCIS.

THE worthy act of the dames of Phocis, whereof we now meane to make mention, no Historiographer of name hath yet recorded and set downe in writing: howbeit there was never a more memorable deed of vertue wrought by women, and the same testified by the great sacrifices, which the Phocians do celebrate even at this day, neere unto the citie Hyampolis, and that according to the ancient decrees of the countrey. Now is the totall historie of this whole action from point to point particularly recorded in the life of Daiphantus; as for that which the said women did, thus stood the case. There was an irreconcilable and mortall warre betweene the Thessalians and those of Phocis, for that the Phocians upon a certaine fore-set day, killed all the magistrates and rulers of the Thessalians, who exercised tyrannie in the cities of Phocis: and they againe of Thessalia had beaten and bruised to death two hundred and fiftie hostages of the Phocians, whom they had in custodie; and after that, with all their puissance entred and invaded their countrey by the way of the Locrians; having before hand concluded this resolution in their generall counsell, not to pardon nor spare any one that was of age sufficient to beare armes, and as for their wives and children, to leade them away captives as slaves: whereupon Daiphantus the sonne of Bathyllus, one of the three soveraign governours of Phocis, moved and perswaded the Phocians (as many as were of yeres to fight) for to go forth and encounter the Thessalians; but their wives and children, to assemble all together unto a certaine place in Phocis, & environe the whole pourprise and precinct thereof with a huge quantity of wood, and there to set certaine guards to watch and ward; whom hee gave in charge, that so soone as ever they heard how their countrey-men were defeated, they should set the wood on fire, and burne all the bodies within the compasse thereof: which desseigne when all others had approved, there was one man among them, stood up and said: It were just and meet, that they had the consent also of the women as touching this matter; and if they would not approve and allow of this counsell, to leave it unexecuted, and not to force them thereto: this consultation being come to the eares of the said women, they held a counsell together apart by themselves as touching this this intended action, where other resolved to follow the advice of Daiphantus, and that with so great alacritie and contentment, that they crowned Daiphantus with a chaplet of flowers, as having given the best counsell that could be devised for Phocis. It is reported also, that their verie children sat in counsell hereabout by themselves, and concluded the same: but it fortun'd so, that the Phocians having given the Thessalians battell neere unto a village, called Cleone, in the marches or territorie of Hyampolis, defeated them. This resolution of the Phocians, was afterwards by the Greekes named Apomaea, that is, A desperat desseigne: and in memoriall of the said victorie, all the people of Phocis to this day do celebrate in Hyampolis, the greatest and most solemne feast that they have, to the honour of Diana, and call it Elaphebolia.

THE WOMEN OF CHIOS.

THE men of Chios inhabited sometime the colonie Leuconia, upon such an occasion as this. A gentleman, one of the best houses in Chios, chanced to contract a marriage; and when the bride was to be brought home to his house in a coach, King Hippoclaus being a familiar friend unto the bridegroom, & one who was present with others at the espousales and wedding; after he had taken his wine well, being set upon a merrie pin, and disposed to make sport, leapt up into the coach where the new wedded wife was; not with any intent to offer violence or villanny, but only to dallie, toy & make pastime in a meriment, as the maner was at such a feast: howbeit the friends of the bridegroome tooke it not so, but fell upon him and killed him outright in the place: upon which murder there appeered unto those of Chios many evident tokens and signes of Gods anger; yea and when they understood by the oracle of Apollo, that for to appease their wrath, they should put all those to death who had murdered Hippoclaus; they made answer: That they all were guiltie of the fact: and when the god Apollo commanded them, that if they were all tainted with the said murder, they should all depart out of the citie Chios, they sent away (as manie, as either were parties and principals, or accessaries and privie to the said blood-shed; yea, and whosoever approved and praised the fact, and those were neither few in number, nor men of meane qualitie and power) as far as to Leuconia; which citie the Chians first conquered from the Coroneans, and possessed by the helpe of the Erythraens: but afterwards when there was warre betweene the said Chians and the Erythraens (who in those daies were the mightiest people in all Ionia) in so much as the Erythraens came against Leuconia, with a power intending to assault it: the Chians being not able to resist, grew to make a composition, in which capitulated it was & agreed, that they should quit the citie, & depart every person with one coat & cassock onely, without taking any thing els with them. The women understanding of this agreement, gave them foule words, & bitterly reproched them, for being so base minded as to lay off their armor, & thus to go naked thorow the mids of their enemies; but when their husbands alleaged that they had sworn & taken a corporall oth so to do, they gave them counsel in any wise, not to leave their armes and weapons behind them, but to say; that a javelin was a coat, and a shield the cassocke of a valiant and hardie man. The Chians perswaded hereunto spake boldly to the Erythraens to that effect, and shewed them their armes, in so much as the Erythraens were afraid to see their resolute boldnesse, and there was not one of them so hardie as to come neere for to impeach them, but were verie well content that they abandoned the place, and were gone in that sort. Thus you may see how these men having learned of their wives to be courageous and confident, saved their honours and their lives. Long after this, the wives of the Chians achieved an other act nothing inferiour to this in vertue and prowesse. At what time as Philip the sonne of Demetrios, holding their citie besieged, caused this barbarous edict, and proud proclamation to be published: That all the slaves of the citie should rebell against their masters, and come to him: for that he would make them all free, and give them libertie to espouse and marie their mistresses, even the wives of their former masters. The dames conceived hereof so great cholet and indignation in their harts (together with the slaves themselves, who were provoked likewise to anger as well as they, and readie to assist their mistresses) that they tooke heart to mount upon the walles of the citie, and to carrie thither stones, darts and all manner of shot, beseeching their husbands to fight lustily and with good courage, & estoones admonishing and encouraging them to quit themselves like men, and do their devoir; which they did so effectuallly both in word and deed, that in the end they repulld the enemy, and constrained Philip to raise his siege from before the citie without effecting his purpose, and there was not so much as one slave that revolved from his master unto him.

THE WOMEN OF ARGOS.

THe exploit of the Argive dames against Cleomenes king of Lacedæmon, in defence of the citie Argos, which they enterprised under the conduct and by the perswasion of Telephila the poetesse, is not lesse glorious and renowned, than any action that ever was achieved by a crew of women. This dame Telephila (as the faine goeth) was descended of a noble and famous house, howbeit in body she was very weake and sickly; by occasion whereof, she lent out to the oracle for to know how she might recover her health: answer was made, that she should serve, honour and worship the Muses: she yeelding obedience to this revelation of the god, and giving herselfe to learne poeie, and likewise vocall musicke, and skill in song, in short time was delivered from her maladie, and became most renowned and highly esteemed among women for hir poeticall veine, and musically knowledge in this kind: in proceesse of time it fortuned that Cleomenes the king of the Spartans, having in a battell slaine a great number indeed of Argives, but not as some fabulous writers have precisely set downe (seven thousand, seven hundred, seven-<sup>10</sup> tie and seven) advanced directly to the citie of Argos, hoping to finde and surprize the same void of inhabitants: but the women, as many as were of age sufficient (as it were by some heavenly and divine instinct) put on a resolute minde, and an extraordinary courage, to doe their best for to beate backe their enemies that they should not enter the citie; and in very truth under the leading of Telephila, they put on armes, tooke weapon in hand, and mounting up the wals stood round about the battlements thereof, and environed them on every side, defending the citie right manfully, to the great wonder & admiration of the enemies: thus they gave Cleomenes the repulse, with the losse and carvage of a great number of his men. Yea and they chased Democratæ another king of Lacedæmon out of their citie, as Socrates saith, who had made entrance before, and seized that quarter which is called Pamphiliacum: when the citie was thus saved by the prowess of these women, ordeined it was, that as many of them as chanced in this service to be slaine, should be honorably enterred, upon the great cauley or high-way called Argeia; and unto them who remained alive, graunted it was for a perpetuall monument and memoriall of their prowess, to dedicate and consecrate one statue unto Minerva. This combat and fight (as some have written) was the seventh day, or (as others say) the first of that moneth<sup>30</sup> which at Argos in old time they called Tetartus, but now Hermæus, on which day the Argives do celebrate even in this age, a solemne sacrifice and feast which they call Hybristica (as one would say) reprochfull and infamous; wherein the custome is, that women went clad in soldiers coates and mantels, but men were arraied and attired in womens petticoates, frocks, and veiles. Now to replenish and repeople the citie againe, for default of men who died in the wars, they did not (as Herodotus writeth) use this pollicie, to marrie their slaves to their widdowes, but they granted free burgesie of their citie, unto the better sort of men who were their neighbors and borderers, and granted unto them for to affiance and espouse the said widdowes: but it should seeme that these wives disdained & despised (in some sort) these husbands of theirs, as not comparable to their former; for they made a law, that these wives should have counterfeit beards set to their<sup>40</sup> chins whensoever they slept and lay with their husbands.

THE PERSIAN WOMEN.

Cyrus (having caused the Persians to rebel against king Astages & the Medes) hapned to be discomfited & vanquished together, with the Persians: now when the Persians fled amaine toward the city, and their enemies followed hard at their heeles, ready to enter pell-mell with the women issued out of the gates, met them even before the citie, and plucking up their clothes before, from beneath, to their waste, cried unto them: VVhither away, and whither doe you flee, the most beaulty cowards that ever were? for run as fast as you will there is no reentrance here for you into that place, out of which you came first into the world: the Persians being ashamed as well to see such a sight, as to heare those words, blamed and rebuked themselves; whereupon they turned againe, and made head at their enemies, fought fireshly, and put them to flight: from which time forward, there was a law established: That whensoever the king returneth from some farre voiage, and entred into the citie, everie woman should receive of him a peece of gold, and that by the ordinance of king Cyrus, who first enacted it. But it is reported, that king Ochus one of his successors (who being bad enough otherwise) was the most covetous prince that that ever reigned over them, turned alwaies out of the way, passed besides the citie, and never would come into it after such a journey; whereby the women alwaies were disappointed of that gratiitie and gift which they ought to have had: but king Alexander contrariwise entered the citie twice, and gave to every woman with childe, double so much, that is to say, two such pieces of gold.

THE WOMEN OF GAULE.

BEfore that the Gaules passed over the mountaines called Alpes, and held that part of Italy which now they doe inhabit; there arose a great discord and dangerous sedition among<sup>10</sup> them, which grew in the end to a civill warre: but when both armies stood embattailed and arranged, ready to fight, their wives put themselves in the very mids betwene the armed troupes, tooke the matter of difference and controversie into their hands, brought them to accord and unitie, and judged the quarrell with such indifferent equitie, and so to the contentment of both parts, that there ensued a woonderfull amitie, and reciprocall good will, not onely from citie to citie, but also betwene house and house; insomuch that ever after, they continued this custome in all their consultations, aswell of warre as peace, to take the counsell and advice of their wives; yea to compose and pacifie all debates and braules with their neighbours and allies, by the mediation of them: and therefore in that composition and accord which they made with Anniball, at what time as he passed through their citie, among other articles this went for one:<sup>20</sup> That in case the Gaules complained of any wrongs done unto them by the Carthaginians, the Carthaginian captains and governors which were in Spain should be the judges betwene them; but contrariwise, if the Carthaginians pretended that the Gaules had wronged them, the Gaule dames should decide the quarrell.

THE WOMEN OF MELOS.

THe Melians purposing to seeke for another land to inhabit, more large and fertile than their owne, chose for the captaine and leader of that troupe or colonie which was sent forth, a yong gentleman of singular beaultie, named Nymphæus; but first they had consulted<sup>30</sup> with the oracle, where they received this answer: That they should take the seas, and saile; and looke in what place soever they happened to leese their porters and cariers, there they should rest and inhabit: now it happened as the coasted along Caria, and were set aland, their ships were lost in a tempest and perished; and then the inhabitants of the city Cryssa in Caria, (were it that they had pity of their necessitie, or feared their hardinesse and valour) requested them to make their abode with them, and granted them a part of their territorie to holde and occupie: but afterwards the Carians seeing, that in a small time the Melians mightily increased and waxed great, they comploted and laid ambushes for to murder them al, at a certeine solemne feast and supper which they prepared for them: but it fell out so, that a yong damosell of Caria named Cophene (who secretly was in love and enamoured upon Nymphæus above said, and could not endure that her love Nymphæus should so treacherously be murdered) discovered the said plot and intended desseigne of her countrey men: now when the Cryassians came to call them to the feast above said, Nymphæus made them this answer: That the custome of the Greeks was not to go unto any great suppers or feasts, unless they had their wives with them; which when the Carians heard, they said: Bring your wives with you and spare not, they shall be welcome: thus when he had advertised his countrey men the Melians, what had passed betwene him and the Carians, he gave order that they should themselves come unarmed in their plaine apparell, but every one of their wives should bring with them a skeine or dagger under their clothes, and so each of them sit close unto her husband: now in the mids of supper, when the signall was given to the Carians for to go in hand with the execution of their desseigne, they Greeks knew thereby<sup>50</sup> incontinently, that the time was now come to execute this feat; and then the women all at once opened their bosoms, and their husbands caught the skeines afore said, ran upon the barbarous Carians, and massacred all in the place, insomuch as not one of them escaped with life: and thus being masters of the countrey, they rased the city, and built another, which they called New Cryssa: Cophene then was married to Nymphæus, and woon much honour and favor, which she right well had deserved for the great good service that she did: but in my conceit, the principal matter in this whole action, and that which is most to be commended, was the silence and and secrecie of these dames, that being so many as they were, there was not one whose hart fainted in the execution of this enterprife, nor perforce and for feare against her will, failed in her dutie.

THE TUSCANE WOMEN.

There were in times past certaine Tyrrhenians or Tuskanes, who seized upon the isles of Lemnos and Imbros; yea and ravished certaine Athenian wives out of Brauron, and begat children of them; but afterwards, the Athenians chased that generation out of the said isles, as being mungrels and halfe Barbarians, who fortuning to arrive at the cape or head of Tenarus, did very good service under the Spartans in their wars against the Ilots; and for this cause obtained their freedom and burgeoisie in Sparta, yea, and were allowed to take wives and marrie among them; onely they were not capable of any office of State or magistracie, nor admitted into the counsell of the citie: howbeit, suspected they were in the end, that they conspired and went about a change and alteration in the government: whereupon the Spartans apprehended their bodies, and cast them in prison, where they kept them very straight, as close prisoners, to see if they could convince them by some proofes and undoubted evidence. Meanwhile, the wives of these prisoners came to the goales, and by their earnest praies and importunate sute, wrought fo with their keepers, that they suffred them to have access unto their husbands, onely to visite, salute, and speake unto them: they were no sooner entred in, but they advised and perswaded their husbands, with all speed to put off their owne clothes, and doe on their apparell, and so to get away with their faces veiled and covered; which presently was put in execution, and themselves remained fast shut up in the said prison, prepared and resolute to abide all the miseries and tortures that might be done unto them: thus the goalers let out their husbands, taking them to be their wives. No sooner were they at libertie, but immediately they went and seized the mountaine Taygeta, and solicited withall the Ilots to take armes and rebell; which the men of Sparta much fearing, sent unto them an herald with an trumpet, by whose entercourse they agreed upon these articles of composition. Inprimis, to deliver them their wives. Item, to restore unto them their money and all their goods. Item, to furnish them with ships to passe upon the seas for to seeke their adventure: and when they had found a commodious land, in one place or other, & were provided of a citie to inhabit; that they should be named and reputed kinsfolke to the Lacedæmonians, and a colonie derived and descended from them. The fame did the Pelasgians, who tooke for their captaines in this voiage, Pollis, Adelphus, and Cratidas, all three Lacedæmonians; for when one part of them staid in the isle Melos, the greater troupe under the conduct of Pollis arrived in Candie, attending and expecting if those signes which had beene foretold them by the oracles would happen; for answer was given them by oracle: That whensoever they had lost their anker and goddesse, then they were at an end of their voiage and should build them a citie: being come therefore unto the demie island Chersonesus, and their ship lying at anker in the harbour; there hapned in the night a sudden feare and fright among them without any apparant cause, such as they call Panique Frights, wherewith being wonderfully troubled and scared, they went a shipboord, without all order, and in a tumultuous maner, leaving behinde them for haste, the image of Diana upon the land, which had remained a long time among them, and had passed by descent from father to sonne, and by their forefathers had beene first brought unto them from Brauron unto the isle Lemnos, and which they caried with them from thence into all places wherefoever they came: after this sudden fright and tumult was passed, as they sailed in the open sea, they missed the said image, and withall Pollis also was advertised, that a flouke of an anker was wanting and lost; for that when they came to weigh anker by great force (as commonly it hapneth in such places where it taketh hold of the ground among rocks) it brake and was left behinde in the bottome of the sea; whereupon he said that the oracles were now fulfilled which foretold them of these signes, and therewith gave signall to the whole flecte for to retire backe, and so he entred upon that region to his owne use: and after he had in many skirmishes vanquished those who were up in armes against him, he lodged at length in the citie Lyctus, and wan many more to it. Thus you see how at this day they call themselves the kinsfolke of the Athenians by the mothers side; but indeed by the father they are a colonie drawne from Lacedæmon.

THE LYCIAN WOMEN.

That which is reported to have beene done in Lycia, as a meere fable and tale devised of pleasure, yet neverthelesse testified by a constant fame that runneth verie currant. For Amisodarus (as they say) whom the Lycians name Isarus, came from about the marches of Zeles, a colonie of the Lycians, with a great flect of rovers and men of warre, whose captaine or admirall, was one Chimæra a famous arch-pirate, a warlike man but exceeding cruell, savage and inhumane) who had for the badges and ensignes of his owne ship, in the prow a lion, and at the poepe a dragon: much hurt hee did upon all the coasts of Lycia; inso-much as it was not possible either to saile upon the sea, or to inhabit the maritime cities and townes, neere unto the sea side for him. This man of warre or arch-rover, Bellerophon had slaine who followed him hard in chase with his swift pinnace (Pegasus) as he fled, untill he had overtaken him, and withall had chased the Amazones out of Lycia; yet for all this, hee not onely received no worthy recompence for his good service, at the hands of Iobates king of Lycia, but also which was woofse, sustained much wrong by him: by occasion whereof Bellerophon taking it as a great indignitie, went to sea againe, where hee praied against him unto Neptune, that he would cause his land to be barraine and unfruitfull; which done, hee returned backe againe: but behold a strange and fearfull spectacle, for the sea swelled & overflowed all the countrey, following him everie where as he went, and covering after him the face of the earth: and for that the men of those parts, who did what possibly they could to entreat him for to stay this inundation of the sea, could not obtaine so much at his hands, the women tooke up their petticoats before & went to meet him, & shewed their nakednes; whe upon for very shame he returned backe, & the sea likewise (by report) retired with him into the former place. But some there be (who more civilly avoiding the fabulosity of this tale) say: That it was not by praies & imprecations that he drew after him the sea, but because that part of Lycia which was most fertile, being low and flat, lay under the levell of the sea: there was a banke raised along the sea side which kept it in; and Bellerophon cut a breach throtow it, and so it came to passe: that the sea with great violence entred that way, and drowned the flat part of the countrey; whereupon the men did what they could by way of praies and intreatie with him, in hope to appease his mood, but could not prevaile: howbeit, the women environing him round about by great troups & companies, pressed him so on all sides, that he could not for verie shame deny them, & so in favour of them, laid downe his anger. Others affirme that Chimæra was an high mountaine, directly opposite to the sunne at noon-tide, which caused great reflections and reverberations of the sunne beames, and by consequence, ardent heats in manner of a fire, in the said mountaine, which coming to be spread and dispersed over the champion ground, caused all the fruits of the earth, to dry, fade, and wither away: whereof *Bellerophon*es (a man of great reach and deepe conceit) knowing the cause in nature, caused in many places, the superface of the said rocke or mountaine to be cloven and cut in two, which before was most smooth & even, and by that reason consequently, did fend back the beames of the sun, & caused the excessive heat in the countrey adjoining: now for that he was not well considered and regarded by the inhabitants, according to his demerit, in despite he meant to be revenged of the Lycians; but the women wrought him so, that they allaid his fury. But surely that cause which Nymphus alleageth in his fourth booke as touching Heraclæa, is not fabulous nor devised to delight the Reader: for he saith: That this *Bellerophon*es having killed a wilde bore that destroyed all the fruits of the earth, & all other beasts within the Xanthiens country, had no recompense therefore; whereupon, when he had poured out grievous imprecations against those unthankfull Xanthiens, unto Neptune, hee brought salt-water all over the land, which marred all and made all become bitter, untill such time as he (being wonne by the praies and supplications of the women) besought Neptune to let fall his wrath. Loc whereupon the custome arose and continueth still in the Xanthiens countrey: That men in all their affaires negotiate not in the name of their fathers, but of their mothers, and bee called after their names.

THE WOMEN OF SALMATICA.

Amibal of the house of Barea, before that he went into Italie to make warre with the Romaines, laid siege unto a great citie in Spaine, named Salmatica: the besieged were at the

the first affraid, and promised to do whatsoever Annibal would command them; yea and to pay him three hundred talents of silver; for securitie of which capitulation to be performed, they put into his hands three hundred hostages: but so soone as Annibal had raised his siege, they repented of this agreement which they had concluded with him, and would do nothing according to the conditions of the accord; whereupon hee returned againe for to besiege them afresh: and to encourage his souldiers the better to give the assault, he said: That hee would give unto them the saccage and pillage of the towne; whereupon the citizens within, were wonderfully affraid, and yielded themselves to his devotion, upon this condition: That the Barbarians would permit as many as were of free condition, to goe forth, every man in his single garment, leaving behind them their armes, goods, money, slaves and the citie. Now the dames and 10 wives of the towne, fearing lest the enemies would search and rife their husbands as they went forth of the gates, and not once touch and meddle with them, tooke unto them short curtelaisses or skeines, hid them under their clothes, and so went forth together with their husbands. When they were all out of the towne, Annibal (having set a guard of Macesylians to attend them) staid them at the end of the suburbs: meane while the rest of his armie, without all order put themselves within the citie, and fell to the spoile and sackage of it: which when the Macesylians perceived, they grew out of all patience, & could not containe themselves, nor looke wel into their prisoners; but were woonderous angrie, and in the end meant for to have as good a part and share as the rest, of the spoile: hereupon the women tooke up a crye, and gave unto their husbands the swords which they had brought with them, yea & some of them sel upon the guard or 20 garrison, in so much as one of them was so bold, as to take from Banon (the Truchman or interpreter) the speare which he had, and thrust at him with it, but he had on a good corps of a curace which saved him: but their husbands having wounded some of them, and put the rest to flight, escaped by this meanes away, together in a troupe with their wives; which when Annibal understood, he set out immediately after them, and surprised those who were left behind; whiles the rest got away and saved themselves for the present, by recovering the mountaines adjoining; but after they sent unto Annibal and craved pardon, who graciously granted it yea and permitted them to returne in safetie and reinhabit their owne citie.

THE MILESIAN WOMEN.

THE Milesian maidens upon a time, were surprized with a verie strong passionate fit of a fearfull melancholicke humour, without any apparant cause that could be rendred thereof, unless it were (as men most conjectured:) that the aire was infected and empoisoned, which might cause that alienation of the mind, and worke a distemperature in their braines, to the overthrow of their right wits; for all on a sudden, every one had a great desire to die, and namely, in a furious rage would needs hang themselves; and in truth many of them secretly knit their necks in halats, and so were strangled; no, reasons and remonstrances, no teares of father and mother, no perswasions and comfortable speeches of their friends would serve the turne; but looke what keepers soever they had, and how carefully soever they looked unto them, they 40 could find means of evasion to avoide and goe beyond all their devices and inventions; in such sort, that it was thought to be some plague and punishment sent from the gods above; and such as no humane provision could remedie, untill such time as by the advice of a sage and wise citizen, there went forth a certaine edict, and the same enacted by the counsell of the citie: That if any one more, hapned to hang herselfe, she should be carried strake naked as ever she was borne thorow the market place in the view of the whole world: this proclamation being thus ratified by the common-counsell of the citie, did not onely repress for a while, but also staid for altogether, this furious rage of the maidens and their inordinate desire to make themselves away. Thus we may see, that the fear of dishonor, shame & infamy, is a great signe & infallible token of good nature and vertue, considering that they feared neither death nor paine, which are the most horrible accidents that men can endure; howbeit they could not abide the imagination of villannie, shame and dishonor, though it hapned not unto them, untill they were dead and gone.

THE WOMEN OF CIO.

THE manner and custome was for the young virgins of Cio, to goe altogether unto their publick temples and churches, and so to passe the time al the long day there, one with another: where where their lovers who wooed them for marriage, might behold them disport and daunce: and in the evening they went home to each of their houses, in order, where they waited up to their fathers and mothers, yea and the brethren, one of another, even to the very wathing of their feet. Now it hapned sometimes that many young men were enamoured of one and the same maide; but their love was so modest, good, and honest, that so soone as a maiden was affianced and betrothed unto one, all the rest would give over fute, & so cease to make any more love unto her: In summe, the good order and cariage of these women of Cio might be knowen in this: that in the space of eleven hundred yeeres, it was never knowen nor appeared upon record, that anie wife committed adulterie, nor maiden unmarried lost her virginitee.

THE WOMEN OF PHOCIS.

THE tyrants of Phocis, surprized upon a time and seized the citie of Delphos; by occasion whereof, the Thebans made that warre upon them, which was called the Holy warre; at which time it so befell, that the religious women consecrated unto Bacchus, named Thyades, being besetraught and out of their right wits, ranne wandring like vagrants up and downe in the night, and knew not whither, untill ere they were aware, they ranne unto the citie Amphissa, where being wearie (but yet not come againe to their senses) they lay along in the mids of the market place, and couched themselves scattering heere and there to take their sleepe: the wives 20 of Amphissa being advertised heereof, and fearing lest their bodies should be abused by the soldiers of the tyrants (whereof there lay a garrison within the citie, for that Amphissa was of the league, and confederate with the Phocæans) ranne all thither to the place, standing round about them with silence, and not saying one word, and so long as they slept, troubled them not; but so soone as they wakened of themselves and were gotten up, they tooke the charge of them, gave them meat, and each of them looked to one; yea, and afterwards having gotten leave of their husbands, they conveyed and accompanied them in safetie, so farre as to the mountains and marches of their owne territorie.

VALERIA and CLOELIA.

THE outrage committed upon the person of a Roman ladie, named Lucretia, and her vertue together, were the cause that Tarquinius Superbus (the seventh king of the Romanes after Romulus) was deprived of his roiall estate, and driven out of Rome: This dame being married unto a great personage, descended of the bloud roiall, was abused and forced by one of the sons of the said king Tarquinius, who was entertained and friendly lodged in her house: by occasion of which villanous fact, she called all her kinsfolke and friends together about her; unto whom after she had declared and given them to understand the shamefull dishonour that he had done upon her body, she stabbed herselfe in the place before them: and Tarquinius the father (for this cause being deposed from his princely dignitie, and chased out of his kingdome) levied manie warres against the Romans, thinking thereby to recover his state; and among the rest in the end 40 wrought so effectually with Porfena king of the Tuskanes, that he perswaded him to laie siege to the citie of Rome, and to beleaguer it with a puissant power: Now over and besides this hostilitie, the Romans within, were afflicted also and sore pressed with famine; but hearing that the said Porfena was not onely a valiant captaine in armes, but withall a good and righteous prince, they were willing to make him the indifferent umpire and judge betweene them and Tarquinius: but Tarquinius standing stiff in his owne opinion, and highly conceited of himselfe, giving out also, that Porfena if he continued not a fait and constant ally, he would not afterwards be a just & equal judge: whereupon Porfena forsaking him, and leaving his alliance, capitulated and promised to depart in good tearmes of amitie & peace with the Romans, upon condition to recover 50 of them all those lands which they had occupied in Tuskane, & to have away with him those prisoners whom they had taken in those wars: now for the better assurance of this composition so concluded, there were delivered into his hands as hostages, ten boies, and as many young maidens; among whom Valeria the daughter of Poplicola the consull was one: which done, presently he brake up his campe and dislodged, yea and gave over preparation of farther warre; notwithstanding that all the articles of the said capitulation were not yet accomplished. These young virgins before said, being in his campe, went down as it were to bath and wath themselves, unto the river side, which ran a good way from the campe; and by the motion and instigation of

of one among the rest named Cleolia; after they had wrapped and weathed their clothes fast about their heads; theyooke the river which ran with a very strong streame and swift current, and by swimming crosse over it, helping one another what they could amid the deepe channell, and surging whirlpoles thereof, untill with much travell, they hardly recovered the banke on the other side. Some report, that this damosell Cleolia, made meanes to get an horse, mounted his backe, and gently by litle and litle passed overthwart the river, shewing the way unto the rest of hir fellows, encouraging, yea, and supporting them as they swomme on each side and round about her: but what the reason is of this their conjecture, I will shew anon: when the Romans saw that they were gotten over in safetie, they woondered at their boldnesse and rare vertue; howbeit they were nothing well pleased with their returne, neither could they endure to be chalenged and reproched: that in fidelitie and troth, they all should be inferior to one man, and therefore gave commandement that these virgins should returne from whence they came, and sent with them a guard to conduct them; but when they were passed over the river Tybris againe, they escaped very hardly of being surprized by an ambush that Tarquin had laid for them by the way: as for Valeria the consull Papilius daughter, she fled at first with three servants into the campe of Porfena: and the rest, Arms the sonne of Porfena, who ran presently to the rescue, recovered out of the hands of the enemies: now when they were all presented and brought before the king; he demaunded which of them it was, who had encouraged her companions to swim over the river, and given them counsell so to doe: all the rest fearing lest the king would doe Cleolia some harme, would not speake a word; but she her selfe confessed all: Porfena highly esteeming her valour and vertue, caused one of the fairest horses to be fetched out of his stable, richly trapped and set out with costly furniture, which he bestowed upon her, yea, and that which more is (for her sake and to grace her) curiously and kindly dismissed all her fellows, and sent them home. This is the gesse (I say) by which some thinke that Cleolia passed over the river on horse-back: but others say no; who deliver the storie thus. That the king marvelling at this valour and extraordinarie hardinesse, above the proportion of that sex, thought her woorthy of a present, which is woont to be given unto a valiant man at armes and a brave warrior: but how ever it was, for a memoriall of this act, there is to be seene her statue at this daie, to wit, a maiden sitting on horse-backe, and it standeth in the street called Via sacra, which some say, representeth Cleolia, others Valeria.

MICCA and MEGISTO.

Aristotimus having usurped tyranny and violent dominion over the Elians, bare himselfe much upon the favor and countenance of king Antigonus, established the same; but so cruelly and excessively he abused this power and authoritie under him, that in nothing he was tolerable; for over and besides that, he was a man by nature given to violence (by reason that he stood in some servile feare, and was glad to please the guard that he had about him of mixt Barbarians, whom he had gotten together from divers parts, for the defence of his state and person) he suffered them also to commit many insolent parts and cruell outrages upon his subjects; and among the rest, that unhappie indignitie which befell to Philodemus, who had a faire damosell to his daughter, named Micca, unto whom one of the captaines of the said tyrant, named Lucius, seemed to make court, not for any true love and heartie affection that he bare unto her, but upon a wanton lust to abuse and dishonour her bodie: so he sent for this maiden to come and speake with him: her parents seeing, that whether they would or no, constrained they should be to let her goe, gave her leave; but the damosell her selfe of a generous spirit and magnanimous heart, clasped them about and hung upon them, fell downe at their feet, and humbly besought them, all that ever she could, rather to kill her out of hand, than to suffer her thus shamefully to be betrayed, and villanously to be disposed of her maidenhead: but for that she staid longer than was to the good liking of the foresaid Lucius, (who burned all this whiles in lust, and had withall taken his wine liberally) he rose from the table in great choler, and went himselfe toward her: when he came to the house, he found Micca with her head upon her fathers knees, and her he commanded to follow him; which she refused to do; whereupon he rent her clothes from her bodie, and whipped her stark naked; and she, without giving one word againe, endured for her part with patience and silence all the smart and paine: but her father and mother, seeing, that with all their piteous praiers and tender teares, they could not prevaille nor boot anie thing with this wretch, turned to call and implore the helpe both of God and man, crying with a loud loud voice: Out upon such injurious indignity and intolerable villany: whereupon, this barbarous villaine (grown now to be furious and enraged, partly with choler, and in part with drunkenesse) killed this filly poore gile, even as she couched her face in the very lap and bosome of her father: howbeit, for all this and such like wicked pranks plaied, the tyrant was nothing at all moved to pite and compassion, but many citizens he murdered, and more he banished and caused to leave their country; in such sort, that (as the speech went) no fewer than eight hundred fled to the Aetolians, craving at their hands to make meanes unto the tyrant, that they might have away their wives and little children also. Not long after, the tyrant of his owne accord caused proclamation to be made by sound of trumpet; that as many women as were willing to go unto their husbands, should make them ready and depart, yea, and cary with them as much of their goods as they would: now when he understood, that they all with great joy of this proclamation thus published, and that they were assembled together with much contentment of minde, to the number of fixe hundred, he commanded that they should depart; and put themselves in their journey all together on a certaine day by him prefixed, making semblant against that time, to provide a good convoy for their better security: when the time appointed was come, they flocked thicke to the gates of the city, having brought with them their trusses and fardles of such goods as they meant to have away with them, carying some of their little babes in their armes, taking order for others for to be brought in waggons; and so they staid there, &c attended one anothers coming: but suddenly, many of the souldiers and those of the tyrants guard, came running toward them, and crying aloud as farre off: Stay, stay: now when they approached nere, all the women they commanded to go backe againe, but the waines and waggons they turned together with the horses full upon them, and drave them amaine thorow the mids of the troupe and throng of the women, not suffering them either to follow, or to stay or succor their poore little infants, whom they saw to die before their faces: for some of them perished with falling out of the chariots to the ground, others were destroyed and trampled under the horse feet; and all this while, these pensioners of the guard, with loud out-cries and with whipping, drave the women before them, like as they had bene for many sheepe, and thronged them so hard, that one tumbled upon another; and thus they chased them, untill such time as they had cast them all into prison: but all their bag and baggage was seized upon, and brought unto Aristotimus. Now when the men of Eli were herewith mightily offended; the religious women consecrated to the service of Bacchus, whom they call the Sixteene (carying in their hands boughs of olive trees, like suppliants, and chaplets of vine branches about their heads, which they tooke from the god whom they served) went to meet with Aristotimus about the marketplace of the citie: his squires and pensioners about him for the guard of his bodie, made a lane for them, and seemed (upon some reverence) to give them way that they might come nere: and the women at first kept silence, doing nought els but in most humble and devout maner tender unto him their branches, like suppliants: but after that the tyrant understood that it was for the Eliens wives that they came thus to make supplication, and namely, that hec would take some commiseration of them; being wroth &c displeased with his guard, he cried out upon them for suffering the said women to approach so neere unto his person; and thereupon commanded them to drive some and to beat others, untill they were all chased out of the market-place; and more than all this, he condemned these religious votaries in a fine of two talents a piece. During these occurrences, there was within the citie, one of the burgessees named Hellanicus, a man very farrre stept in age, who was the authour of a conspiracie and insurrection against the tyrant; one that of all others he least distrusted, and whom he never thought likely to practise against him, both for that he was very aged, and also because but a litle before he had buried two of his children: and it fortunated at the very same time, that fro Aetolia the exiles before named, passed into the territorie of Eli, and seized upon a fort called Anymum situate in a very commodious place for to mainteine warre; where they received and entertained many other inhabitants of the citie, who immediatly resorted thither, and ran apace: upon these tydings, the tyrant Aristotimus much fearing the sequel hereof, went unto their wives in prison; and thinking to compass his desseignes better by feare, than favor and love, he commanded them to send unto their husbands, &c to write unto them, for to abandon their holde and depart out of the country, menacing the poore women, that if they did not so, he would cause their children first to be mangled with whips, and so killed before their face, and then put themselves also to death: all of them were silent a good while, &c notwithstanding he importuned them a long time, and urged them to speake at once whether they would doe it or no? they looked one upon another without saying a word, giving him thereby to understand, that they stood in no feare, and were not affonied for all his threats: at the last, one of them, named Megisto, wife to Timolon, and a woman whom the rest regarded and held as their captainesse, as well in respect of her husbands honour, as her owne vertue, deigned not to rise up from her seat herselfe, nor suffered any of the rest to stand up; but sitting still in her place, thus said: If thou wert a wise man, thou wouldest not deale thus as thou dost, betwene women and their husbands, but rather send unto them, as to those who have the power and authoritie over their wives, and to deliver unto them better speeches than such, whereby thou hast deceived us; now if (being past hope to perswade them) thou thinkest to circumvent and delude them by the meanes of us, never looke that thou shalt abuse us any more, nor thinke that they will be so ill advised or so base minded, as that for to spare their wives and little children, they will abandon and lose the libertie of their countrey: for surely the losse of us will not be to them so much, considering that they now enjoy us not, as the gaine and benefit, in delivering their countrey and fellow-citizens from such outrageous crueltie. Whiles Megisto entertained Aristotimus with these speeches, he could no longer endure, but commanded her little sonne to be brought before him, for to murder him before her eyes; and when the pensioners about the tyrant searched for him among other little boies that were playing & wrestling together, his mother called unto him by name, saying: Come hither to me my boy, that thou maiest be delivered from the crueltie of this tyrant, before thou hast any sense or understanding to know what tyranny is: for a greater griefe it would be unto me another day to see thee for to serve like a slave unworthily, than to die here presently: hereat Aristotimus through impatience of furious anger, drew his sword upon the woman herselfe, meaning to run her thorough; but one of his familiar friends, named Cylon (who made semblant to be true & faithful unto him but hated him secretly in his hart, & indeed was of the complices in that conspiracy of Hellanicus) stepped before him, and by his effectuall prayers turned his hand, making remonitance unto him, that it was no generous and manly deed, but a womanish act: neither favoured it of a prince or such a personage as knew how to manage great affaires of State, to deale in that sort, which he forced and pressed so instantly that hardly and with much ado though it were; Aristotimus was of a better minde, bethought himselfe and went his way. Now there befell unto him a strange accident, which presaged what mischief was toward him; for about high noone it was, when being in his bed-chamber, & reposing himself with his wife, whiles his dinner was now ready to be served up, those of his household might perceive an eagle soaring round over his house; and the lesser stone directly upon the very place of the roofe of the said chamber where he lay, as if upon deliberate purpose the had aimed and leveled as it were so to doe, himselfe hearing the noise and rap that the stone gave upon the house top over his head, and withall, the outcry beneath of those who beheld the foule, was mightily affrighted, and demanded what the matter might be? when he understood what it was; hee sent presently for the wizard or soothsaier, whom he was wont to use in such cases, and all troubled and perplexed in spirit, asked him what this signe might preface? the soothsaier comforted him, & willed him to be of good cheere, saying unto himselfe: That it was Jupiter who wakened him, & shewed how willing he was to assist and succour him; but unto other citizens whom he might trust, he expounded it otherwise, and assured them that it was the vengeance of God, which speedily would light upon the tyrants head: whereupon Hellanicus and his adherents were resolved to deferre the execution of their designes no longer, but to set upon the enterprize the next morrow in the night that came betwene, Hellanicus as he slept, dreamed, and in that vision he thought, that one of his sons late deceased stood before him & said: Father, what meane you to lie a sleepe, considering that once to morrow you must be captain general and soveraigne governor of this citie: Hellanicus wonderfully encouraged by this vision, started up, and went to sollicite the rest of his complices and companions in the said conspiracie. By this time was Aristotimus advertized that Craterus was comming to aide him with a puissant armie, and lay encamped neere to Olympia; in the assurance and confidence whereof, he presently tooke Cylon with him, and went forth without any guard about his person: Hellanicus seeing the opportunitie now offered, and taking the vantage thereof, gave not the signal and watchword which was agreed upon, with those who first were to set to the execution of their intended enterprize; but stretching forth both his hands with a loud voice cried out: Now, now, my masters and valiant men, what staie you for? can you desire a fairer theater to shew your valour in, than to fight for the defence of your libertie, in the very heart of your native countrey? At which words, Cylon drew his sword first, and smote one of them that followed and accompanied Aristotimus; but Thrasibulus and Lampis came came afront, and ran upon the tyrant himselfe, who preventing the venue of their stroke, fled for refuge and sanctuary into the temple of Jupiter, where they slew him out-right, and drew his dead corps into the market place; and then assembled all the citizens thither, for to recover their freedome: but many of the people could not prevent the women; for they ranne out with the first in great alacritie, weeping and crying out for very joy, and envioning their husbands round about, crowned them, and set chaplets of flowers upon their heads: then the multitude of the common people set upon the tyrants house, and assaulted it; his wife having shut herselfe within her chamber, there hung herselfe, and whereas she had two daughters, virgins as yet, but in the prime and flower of their yeeres, ready for marriage; those they tooke, and by force haled them out of the house, with full intent to kill them; in the end after they had abused their bodies first, and then perpetrated all the villanie & shame they could devise unto them; which no doubt they would have put in execution, but that Megisto with other honest matrons of the citie, opposed themselves and came betwene, who cried aloud unto them; that in so doing they should commit an indignitie unbeseeming them, if considering, that now being in the verie traine and high way of recovering their libertie, for to live from henceforth in a popular government, they should perpetrate as violent outrages, as the most bloody and cruell tyrants are used to commit: the people in good respect and reverence to the honour and authoritie of this vertuous and honest dame, who spake her minde so frankly unto them with teares gushing out of her eyes, were reclaimed and advised to offer no abuse nor villanie unto their persons; but to put unto their choise what death they would die: and when they had brought them both back againe into the house, and intimated unto them, that there was no other remedie but die: they mult, and that presently; the elder of the twaine named Myro, untied her girdle from about her walle, and with a running noose did it about her owne necke in manner of an halter; then kissing and embracing her younger sister, she praised her to marke what she did, and according to her example to doe thereafter: To the end (quoth she) that we may not die basely, unworthily the place from whence we are come and descended: but the younger desired againe, that she might die first, caught hold of the girdle and snatched it from her; then the elder: Well sister (quoth she) I never yet refused to do any thing that you desired at my hands; & even now content I am to doe so much for you as to endure and suffer that, which will be more greivous unto me than death it selfe, namely, to see my most deere and best beloved sister to die before me; which said, she her selfe taught her how to fit the said girdle to her necke, and to knit it for the purpose, and when she perceived once that the life was out of her bodie, she tooke her downe and covered her breathlesse corps; then addressing her speech unto dame Megisto her selfe, she besought her, that she would not suffer her bodie after she was dead, to lie shamefully above the ground, and not interred: the sight heereof and the words withall were so pathetically, that there was not one present so hard hearted, or so spightfully and maliciously bent against the tyrant, but deplored their wofull estate, and pitied the generositie and magnanimitie of these two young ladies. Now albeit there be infinit presidents of noble deeds, that in old time, women have done in companies together; yet me thinkes these few examples which I have already delivered, may suffice: from henceforth therefore I will rehearse the particular vertuous acts of severall women by themselves, as they come scattering into my remembrance: for I suppose that such narrations and histories as these, doe not require of necessitie the precise order and consequence of the times.

PIERIA.

OF those Ionians who were come to dwell in the citie of Miletum, some chaunced to be at variance and debate with the children of Ncleus; by occasion whereof in the end, they thought the city too hot for them, and constrained they were to remove and retire themselves into the citie Myus, where they made their abode & habitation; and yet even there also, much molested they were and troubled by the Milesians, who warred upon them, for their revolt and apostasie: howbeit this warre was not so bloudie and mortall, but that they used to send one unto another, yea and to communicate and negotiate reciprocally in divers things: for even upon certaine solemnne and festivall daies, the wives and women of Myus would repaire boldly unto Miletum: now among these Myuntines, there was a noble man and of great name, one Pythes, who had to wife a ladie called Jaggia, by whom he was father of a faire daughter, cleped Pieria: when as therefore the great feast unto Diana and a solemnne sacrifice called Ncleus, was celebrated celebrated by the Milefians: Pythes, sent thither unto this solemnitie, his wife and daughter aforefaid, for they had requested leave of him to be partakers of the feaft. It fortun'd whiles they were there, that one of the fonnes of Xelem (a man of moft credit and greateft authority in the citie) named Phrygius, caft a fance to Pieria; and in courting her after the manner of lovers, defired to know of her what it might be, wherein he might gratifie her moft, and beft content her, unto whom (he answered: If Sir you will fo bring about, that I my felfe with many more may oftentimes refort hither, you fhall doe me the greateft pleasure that you can devife: Phrygius (conceiving prefently what her meaning was, namely that there might bee continuall peace and amitie betweene thofe two cities) wrought fo, that he compofed the warre on both fides: in regard herof Pieria was highly eftemed and honoured in both cities; in fuch wife, 10 that unto this day the Milefian dames do with ordinarily and pray unto the gods, that they may be as well beloved, as Pieria was of Phrygius.

POLYCRITE.

There was in times paff, warre betweene the Naxians and the Milefians, about Neera the wife of Hypferon, and the fame arofe upon this occafion. This Neera was enamoured upon Promedon, a Naxian, in fomuch as fhe would embarke, take the fea, and faile with him: for why? an ordinarie gueft he was of Hypferons, and used to lodge in his houfe whensoever hee came to Miletum: yea and fecretly fhe had him to lie with her, fhe loved him fo well: but 20 in proceffe of time when fhee feared that her husband perceived it, he faire tooke her cleane away with him to Naxos, where he ordained, that fhe fhould be a fuppliant of Peffa. Hypferon fent for her againe; but when the Naxians in favour of Promedon refufed to render her, alleging for a colourable pretence of their excufe the privilege and franchifes of fuppliants: hereupon the warre began betweene them; in which quarrell the Erythreans favoured the Milefians verie affectionately and fided with them, in fomuch as it grew to a long and lingering warre, and many miseries and calamities that follow warres, it drew withall, as well to the one part as the other; until at laft the quarrel was finally ended by the vertue of one woman, like as it began firft by the vice and wickedneffe of another. For Diognetus the captaine generall of the Erythreans, (unto whom was committed the charge of keeping a fort, feated upon a very commodious place 30 to annoy & endamage the Naxians) made rodes and incursions into their territorie, where with many other huge booties that he drave and carried away, he took and led as his prifoners many maidens and wives of good houfes and parentage; among whom there was one named Polycrita, whom himfelfe fancied and fell in love with; her he kept and entertained not like a captive or prifoner, but as if fhe had bene his fpoiled wife: now it fortun'd that the day was come when the Milefians lying in campe, were to folemnize a great feaft; by reafon whereof they fel to drinking freely and making good cheere, inviting one another as the maner was: then Polycrita asked captaine Diognetus, whether hee would be offended if fhe fhould fend certaine tarts, pies, and cakes, provided for that feaft unto her brethren? who answered: that he not onely permitted, but alfo willed her fo to doe: fhe taking the opportunitie of good occafion, put within 40 one of thefe tarts, a little thinn plate of lead which was written upon, charging him exprefly who had the carriage thereof, to fay unto her brethren, that in any cafe none but they, fhould taft of the faid cakes or tarts: this meffage was done accordingly, and when they came to eate the tarts, they found within one, a writing of their filthirs; whereby fhee advertifed and advifed them not to faile, but that very night to come and affaile their enemies, for that they fhould finde them in great diforder, without fentiell and corps-de-guard, without any watch and ward at all, for that they were all drunke by occafion of the good cheere that they had made at that feaft: having this intelligence, they prefently acquainted the captaines generall of the Naxians 50 arme therewith, praying them to enterprife this fervice by their direction and with them: thus were the Erythreans defieized of their ftrong hold, and a great number of them within, put to the fword: but Polycrita craved Diognetus of her fellow-citizens, and by that meanes faved his life; now when fhe approached neere unto the gates of Naxos, feeing all the inhabitants coming forth to meet her with exceeding great joy and mirth, putting garlands of flowers upon her head, and chanting fongs of other praifes, her heart was not able to endure fo great joy; for fhe died at the very gate of the citie, where afterwards fhe was enterred and entombed; and her monument was called, the Sepulcher of Envie, as if there had bene fome envious fortune, which had grudged unto Polycrita, the fruition of fo great glorie and honour. Thus the Hiftoriographers riographers of Naxos have delivered this narration: howbeit (Aristotle faith) that Polycrita was never taken prifoner; but Diognetus having had a fight of her by fome other meanes, became enamoured upon her fo farre, that he was ready to give unto her, and to do for the love of her, whatsoever fhe would: alfo that fhe promifed to go with him, in cafe he would agree and graunt one thing, and (as the faid philofopher telleth the tale) thereupon fhe required of him an obligation of his oth; and after he had faithfully fworne unto her, fhe demanded that hee fhould deliver unto her the caftle Delios; for that was the name of the fort or piece whereof hee had the charge, otherwife fhe faid that fhe would never come in bed with him; whereupon hee (alwell for the great defire that he had to enjoy her love, as in regard of his aforefaid oath, by 10 which he was bound and obliged) quit the place and rendred it into the hands of Polycrita, who prefently delivered it up unto her countrey-men and fellow-citizens; by which meanes they being now able once againe to make their parts good with the Milefians, made an accord and concluded peace, under what conditions they defired themselves.

LAMPSACE.

In the citie Phocæa, there were fometimes two brethren twinned, of the houfe and family of the Coarida; the one named Phobus, the other Blepfus; of which twaine, Phobus was the firft that (according as Chiron the Chronickler of Lampfacum doth record) caft himfelfe from the 20 high rocks and cliffes of Leuca into the fea. This Phobus being of great puiffance and royall authoritie in his countrey, hapned to have fome private affaire and negotiation of his owne in the ifle of Paros, and thither he went; where he contracted amitie, alliance and hofpitalitie with Mandron king of the Bebrycians, furnamed Pityoeffenes: and by vertue of this new league he aided them, and in their behalfe made warre with them, againft other barbarous people their neighbours, who did them wrong and wrought them much damage: afterwards (when he was upon his departure and returne home) Mandron among many other courtesies and tokens of kindeffe which he beftowed upon him, now ready to embarke and take the fea, offered him the one moitie of his country and city, if he would come & dwell in the citie Pityoeffa, with fome part of the Phocæans, for to people the place: whereupon Phobus after he was come home againe to 30 Phocæa, propofed this matter unto the Phocæans his citizens; & having perfwaded them to accept of the offer, he fent his owne brother, as leader and captaine to conduft this colonie of new inhabitants; who upon their firft arrivall and coming thither, found themselves as well entreated, & as courteoufly entertained as they could wifh or looke for at Mandron his hands: but in tract of time, after that they had gotten many advantages at the Barbarians hands, their neighbours & borderers, wan divers booties from them, and gained much pillage & fpoile; they began to be envied firft, and afterwards to be dread and feared of the Bebrycians; who being defirous for to be rid and delivered of fuch guefts, durft not addrefse themselves unto Mandron, whom they knew to be an honeft and juft man, for to perfwade him to praftife any difloyaltie or treacherie, againft men of the Greek nation; but elpying a time when he was abfent and out of 40 the countrey; they comploted and prepared to furprize the Phocæans by a wile, and fo to difpatch them al at once out of the way: but Lampface (the daughter of Mandron, a maiden yet unmarried, having fome fore-inkling and intelligence of this forelaied ambuſh) laboured & dealt, firft with her familiar friends to divert them from fo wicked an enterprife, fhewing and proving unto them, that it was a damnable act before God, and abominable among men, to proceed to treacherouſly againft their allies and confederates, who had bene ready at all times to aid and affift them in their need againft their enemies, and befides, were now incorporate with them, and their fellow-citizens: but when fhe faw that there would no good be done, and that fhe could not diffwade them from it: ſhe acquainted the Greeks under-hand with this treafon, which was a warping againft them, & advifed them to look unto themſelves, & ſtand upon their 50 own guard: fo the Phocæans made a folemn ſacrifice & a publick feaft, invited the Pityoeffenes to come out of the citie into the ſuburbs to take part thereof; & themſelves they divided into two troupes, whereof the one feized the wals of the citie, whiles the inhabitants were at the feaft, meane time the other were buſie in maſſacring the guefts that were bidden to it; and by this meanes they became maſters of the whole citie, and ſent for Mandron, whom they defired to participate with them in their counſels and affaires: as for Lampface his daughter, who fortun'd to die of fickneffe, they interred magnificently, and in memoriall of that good which ſhe did unto them, called the citie after her name Lampſacum: howbeit Mandron becauſe he would not be suspected to have bene a traitour unto his owne people, would not consent to dwell among them, but required to have of them, the wives and children of them who were dead; whom they sent unto him with all speed and diligence, without dooing any harme or displeasure at all unto them; as for Lamfaca unto whom before they had ordeined heroick honors; they decreed for ever to sacrifice unto her as unto a goddesse, and even to this day they doe continue and observe the same divine worship unto her.

ARETAPHILA.

Aretaphila of Cyrene, was none of them that lived in ancient time, but lately in the daies
10 of king Mithridates; but she shewed vertue, & performed an act comparable to the magnanimous counsels and desseignes of the most antike demi-goddesses that ever were: daughter she was to Aeglator, and wife to Phadimus, both noble men and great personages; faire & beautifull of visage, of deepe conceit and high reach, and namely in matters of estate, & affaires of government well experienced: the publike calamities of her country did illustrate her name, and caused her to be well knowne and voiced in the world: for Nicoerates having usurped the tyrannie of Cyrene, put to death many of the chiefe and principall men of the citie, and among the rest, one Melanippus the high priest of Apollo, whom he slew with his owne hands, for to enjoy his priesthood: he did to death also Phadimus the husband of Aretaphila, and not content therewith, married her person and against her will: this tyrant over & above an infinit
20 number of other cruelties which he daily committed, set certaine warders at every gate of the city; who when there was caried forth any dead corps to buriall out of the citie, abused the same, with digging into the soles of their feet, with the points of their daggers and poinards, or else with searing them with red hot irons; for feare that any of the inhabitants should be conveyed alive out of the citie, under colour of being borne to the grave as dead: private and particular crosses, had Aretaphila no doubt, which were greivous unto her, and hardly to be endured, although the tyrant was otherwise kinde enough unto her, and led her a faire life, letting her have her owne will, for the love he bare unto her; inasmuch as the tyrant suffered her to enjoy a great part of his puissance and regall power; for love had enthralled and subdued him unto her; and not one there was but she alone who knew how to use and handle him; for to all the 30 others he was untractable, inflexible, and savage beyond all measure: but it grieved her most of all, to see her native country so miserably abused, and so unworthily intreated by this tyrant; for there was not one day went over his head, but he caused to be executed one citizen or other, neither was there to be seene any hope of revenge or deliverance out of these calamities on any side; for that the exiled persons and such as fled, being weake and feeble every way, and altogether heartlesse and fearefull, were scattered some in this place others in that: Aretaphila therefore (building upon her selfe alone, the onely hope of recovering and raising the State of the common-weale, and proposing the magnanimous and renowned acts of Theba, the wife of the tyrant Pheres, as examples to imitate; but wanting and destitute altogether of faithfull friends and trustie kinsfolke for to helpe and second her in any enterprise, such as the present times and 40 affaires did afford unto the other) assaied to make away the tyrant by some poison; but as she was about the provision hereof, and assaied to make proove of the forces of many strong poisons, she could not carrie her desseigne so secretly but it came forth, and was discovered: now when the thing was averred & evidently proved; by strong presumptions: Calbia the mother of Nicoerates (a bloudy woman, and of nature implacable) thought to have her put to many exquisite torments, and then to bring her soone after to her death: but the affection that Nicoerates bare unto her wrought some delay in revenge, and dulled the edge of his anger, and withall, Aretaphila, (who constantly and resolutely offered her selfe to answer all imputations that were laid unto her charge) gave some colourable excuse unto the passionate affection of the tyrant: but in the end finding that she was convinced by certaine proofes and evidences, which she knew 50 not how to answer, neither could she denie that she had some drugs in her closet, & did temper certaine medicines; but confessed that indeed she had prepared certaine drugs, yet such as were neither deadly nor dangerous: But my good lord (quoth the unto her husband the tyrant) I am much perplexed and troubled with many things of great consequence, and namely how to preserve the good opinion which you have of me, the kinde affection also which of your gracious favour you beare unto me, by meanes wherof, I have this honour, as to enjoy a good part of your power and authoritie jointly with you; this maketh me to be envied of wicked women, at

whole hands I (feearing sorceries, charmes, enchantments, and other cunning divellish casts, by which they would goe about to withdraw and distract you from the love that you beare me) resolved at the length with my selfe for to seeke means how to meet, encounter, and prevent their devices; foolish peradventure they may be (as indeed the very inventions of a woman) but in no wise worthy of death; unlesse haply, (in your judgement) it be just and reasonable to put your wife to death, for that she mindeth to give you some love-drinks, and amatorious cups; or deviseth some charmes, as desirous to be more loved of you than haply it is your pleasure for to love her. Nicoerates having heard these excuses alledged by Aretaphila, thought good, and resolved to put her to torture; whereat Calbia her mother was present, who never relented 10 nor seemed to be touched with her dolorous torments, but remained inexorable: now when she was laid upon the racke, and asked sundrie questions, she yielded not unto the paines that she sustained, but continued invincible, and confessed no fault in the height of all extremities; untill at length Calbia herselfe, even against her will was forced to give over tormenting her any longer: and Nicoerates let her goe, being not fully perswaded, that the excuses alledged by her were true & to be credited, repenting that he had put her to such paine as he did; and it was not long after (so deeply was the passion of love imprinted in his heart) but he returned to her, and assaied to win her grace and good will againe, by all honours, favours, courtesies and kindness that possibly he could shew unto her; but she, who had the power and strength to resist all torments and yield unto no paines, would not be overcome with all his flatteries; but joining
20 now unto her former desire of doing some vertuous deed, the animosities for to be revenged and to effect her purpose, assaied other meanes. One daughter she had marriageable, and beautifull she was besides; her she suborned and fet as an alluring bait to entrap and catch the tyrants brother, a yong gentleman, easie to be caught with the pleasures & delight of youth; and many are of opinion, that she used certaine charmes and amatorious potions, aswell as the object of her daughters beautie, whereby the enchanted and bewitched the wits and senses of this yong man, whom they called Leander: when he was once enamoured with the love of this yong damosell, he prevailed so much by prayers and entreatie with his brother, that he permitted him to wed her: no sooner was he married, but his fresh spouse (having instructions before-hand from her mother) began to be in hand with him, and to perswade him for to enterprise the recovery
30 of freedome unto the citie, shewing by good remonstrance, that himselfe enjoyed not libertie, so long as he lived under tyrannie, neither had he power of himselfe, either to wed a wife, or to keepe her when he had her, if it pleased not the tyrant: on the other side, his friends and other of his familiar acquaintance, for to gratifie Aretaphila and to doe her pleasure, repaired unto him continually, forging some new matter of quarrels and suspitions against his brother the tyrant: when he perceived that Aretaphila was also of the same minde, and had her hand therein, he resolved to execute the enterprise; and thereupon he set one Daphnis, a servant of his owne, in hand with the businesse, by whose meanes he killed Nicoerates: but after he was thus murdered, Leander would no more be advised by Aretaphila, nor follow her counsell in the rest; but thewed incontinently by his deportments and carriage in all actions, that a brother indeed hee had 40 murdered, but not killed a tyrant: for in his owne government, he bare himselfe like a foole, and ruled insolently and furiously: howbeit, unto Aretaphila he thewed alwaies some honour and reverence, conferring upon her some part of his authoritie in management of State affaires; for that she made no semblant at all of discontentment, nor directly and in open maner seemed to warre against him, but privily practised, and cunningly disposed all: for first and foremost, she raised warre upon him out of Lybia, by the meanes of a prince there, named Anabus, betweene whom and her there passed secret intelligence: him shee solicited and perswaded to invade his country, and with a puissant armie to approach the citie Cyrene: then he buzzed into Leanders head, certaine surmizes and suspitions of disloyaltie in his peeres, his friends and captaines; giving him to understand, that their hearts stood not to this warre, but that they loved 50 peace and quietnesse rather: Which (quoth she) to say a truth, as things now stand, were better for you & for the establishment of your roial state & dominion, in case you would rule in deed, holde under, and keepe in awe, your subjects and citizens: and for mine owne part, I holde it good policie for you to make meanes for a treatie of peace, which I will labour to effect, and for that purpose bring you and Anabus together, to an interview and parle (if you thinke so good) before that you grow to farther tearmes of hostilitie and open warre, which may breed a mischief, that afterwards will admit no cure nor remedie. This motion he handled and followed with such dexteritie, that Leander condescended thereto; and shee herselfe in person went to conferre conferre with the Lybian prince, whom she requested, that so soone as ever they were met together to treat of this pretended accord, he should arrest the tyrant as his prisoner; and to doo this feat, she promised him great gifts and presents, besides a good reward in money: the Lybian soone accorded hereto: now Leander made some doubt at first, to go into this parle, and staid a while, but afterwards (for the good respect that he had unto Aretaphila, who promised in his behalfe, that he should come to conference) he set forward, naked, without armes and without his guards: when he approached the place appointed for this interview, and had a sight once of Anabus, his heart misgave him againe; and being much troubled and perplexed, he would not go on, but said, he would stay for his guard: howbeit, Aretaphila who was there present, partly encouraged him, and in part rebuked and checked him, saying: That he would be taken and reputed for a base minded coward, and a disloyall person, who made no account of his word, if he should now flinch and start backe: at the last, when they were at point to meet; she laied holde upon him, plucked him forward by the hand, and with great boldnesse and resolution haled him, untill she had delivered him into the hands of the barbarous prince: then immediatly was hee apprehended, and his bodie attached by the Lybians, who kept him bound as a prisoner, and set a straight guard about him, untill such time as the friends of Aretaphila with other citizens of Chene, were come to the campe, and brought the money and gifts unto her which she had promised unto Anabus. For so soone as it was known in the city that Leander was taken prisoner & in sure hold, a number also of the multitude ran forth, to the place appointed of conference; and so soone as they had set an eye on Aretaphila, they went within a litle of forgetting all their anger and malice which they bare unto the tyrant, thinking that the revenge and exemplar punishment of him was but accessarie and by-matter; as being now wholly amused upon another thing, and supposing the principall fruition of their libertie consisted in saluting and greeting her most kindly, and with fo great joy, that the teares ran downe their cheeks, inasmuch as they were ready to kneele, yea, and cast themselves downe prostrate at her feet, no lesse than before the sacred image and statue of a goddesse: thus they flocked unto her, by troups out of the citie one after another, all day long, inasmuch as it was wel in the evening before they could adwise with themselves to seize upon the person of Leander, and hardly before darke night did they bring him with them into the citie. Now after they were well satisfied with giving all manner of praises, and doing what honour they could devise unto Aretaphila, in the end they turned to consultation what was best to be done with the tyrants: so they proceeded to bunc Calbia quicke; and as for Leander, they put him in a leather poke and fowed it up close, and then cast it into the sea. Then ordeined and decreed it was, that Aretaphila should have the charge and administration of the weale publicke, with some other of the principall personages of the citie joined in commission with her: but she (as one who had plaied many and sundry parts already upon the stage so well, that shee had gotten the garland and crowne of victorie) when shee saw that her countrey and citie was now fully free and at libertie, immediatly betooke her selfe to her owne private house, as it were cloistered up with women onely, and would no more intermeddle in the affaires of State abroad; but the rest of her life shee passed in peace and repose with her kinsfolke and friends, without setting her selfe to any businesse, save onely to her wheele, her web, and such womens works.

C A M M A.

Here were in times past, two most puissant Lords and Tetrarches of Galatia, who also were in blood of kinne one to the other, Sinatux and Synorix. Sinatux had espoused a young virgin named Camma, and made her his wife; a ladie highly esteemed of as many as knew her, as well for the beautie of her person, as the floure of her age; but admired much more in regard of her vertue and honestie; for shee had not onely a tender respect of her owne good name and honour, carried an affectionate love and true heart unto her; but also, shee was wise, magnanimous, and passing well beloved of all her subjects and tenants, in regard of her gentle nature, and her debonair and bounteous disposition; and that which made her better reputed and more renowned, was this; that shee was both a religious priestresse of Diana (a goddesse whom the Galatians most devoutly honour and worship) and also in every solemne proceffion and publicke sacrifice, shee would alwaies be seene abroad most sumptuously set out, and stately adorned. It fortuned so, that Synorix was enamoured of this brave dame, but being not able to bring about his purpose and to enjoy her, neither by faire means nor foule, perswade he, or menance what he

he could, so long as her husband lived: the devill put in his head, to commit a most heinous and detestable fact; for he laied waite for Sinatux, and treacherously murdered him: he staid not long after, but he fell to wooing of Camma, and courting her by way of marriage; she made her abode within the temple at that time, and tooke the infamous act committed by Synorix, not piteously, and as one cast downe and dejected therewith, but with a stout heart and a stomacke mooved to anger, and yet considerably, waiting the time and opportunitie of revenge: on the other side, Synorix followed his sure verie earnestly, soliciting and intreating importunately; neither seemed he to alledge vaine and frivolous reasons, but such as carried some colourable pretense of honestie; namely, that he had alwaies shewed himselfe a man of more valor & worth than Sinatux; and whereas he took away his life, induced he was thereto for the exceeding love that hee bare to Camma, and not mooved thereto by any malice otherwise. This young dame at the first seemed to denie him, but yet her denials were not verie churlish, and such, as he might take for his small answer; for daily by litle and litle, she made semblant that shee relented and inclined unto him, for that divers kinsfolke and friends also of hers, joined with him to second his sute, who (for to gratifie and doe pleasure unto Synorix, a man of the greatest credit and authoritie in his countrey) perswaded, yea & forced her to yeeld unto this match. To be short, in the end shee gave her consent, & Synorix was fent for to come unto her, where she kept her residence, that in the presence of the said goddesse the contract of marriage might passe, & the espousals be solemnized: when he was come, shee received and welcomed him with an amiable and gracious countenance, lead him unto the very altar of Diana, where religiously & with great ceremonie shee powred forth before the goddesse, a litle of a potion which shee had prepared, out of a boules; the one part thereof shee drunke herselfe, & the other shee gave unto Synorix for to drinke: now this potion was mead mingled with ranke poison: when shee saw that hee had taken his draught, shee fetching a loud and evident groane, doing reverence also unto the goddesse: I protest and call thee to witnesse (quoth shee) the most powerfull and honourable goddesse, that I have not survived Sinatux, for any other cause in the world, but onely to see this day, neither have I had any joie of my life all this while that I have lived since, but onely in regard of hope that one day I might be revenged of his death, which seeing that now I have effected, I go most gladly and joyfully unto that sweet husband of mine; and as for thee (most accursed & wicked wretch in the world) give order to thy kinsfolke and friends, in stead of a nuptiall bed, to provide a grave for thy burial: the Galatian (hearing these words, and beginning withal to feelee the operation of the poison, and how it wrought & troubled him within his bowels, and all parts of his body) mounted presently his chariot, hoping that by the jogging and agitation thereof, he might vomit and cast up the poison; but immediatly hee alighted againe, and put himselfe into an easie litter; but did he what he could, dead he was that very evening: as for Camma, she continued all the night languishing, and when shee heard for certaintie that he was deceased, shee also with joy and mirth departed out of this world.

S T R A T O N I C E.

The selfesame province of Galatia afforded two other dames woorthy of eternall memorie, to wit, Stratonice the wife of king Deiotarus, and Chiomara the wife of Ortiagon: as for Stratonice, shee (knowing that the king her husband was desirous to have children lawfully begotten, for to leave to be his successors & inheritors of the crowne, and yet could have none by her) praied and intreated him to trie another woman, and beget a childe of her body, yea and permitted that it should be put unto her, and shee would take it upon her as her owne: Deiotarus wondered much at this resolution of hers, and was content to doe all things according to her mind: wherupon shee chose (among other captives taken prisoner in the warres) a proper faire maiden named Electra, whom shee brought into Deiotarus bed chamber, & shut them in both together: and all the children which this concubine bare unto him, his wife reared and brought up with as kinde an affection and as princelike, as if hee had borne them herselfe.

C H I O M A R A.

At what time as the Romans, under the conduct of Cn. Scipio, defeated the Galatians that inhabit in Asia; it befell that Chiomara the wife of Ortiagon, was taken prisoner with other Galatian women: the captaine whose captive shee was, made use of his fortune, did like a soldier, dier, and abused her bodie, who as he was a man given unto his fleshly pleasure, so he looked also as much or rather more unto his profit and filthie lucre; but so it fell out, that overtaken he was and entrapped by his owne avarice: for (being promised by the woman a good round quantitie of gold, for to deliver her out of thralldome and set her at libertie;) he brought her to the place which he had appointed for to render her and fet her free; which was at a certaine banke by the river side, where the Galatians should passe over, tender him the said monie, and receive Chiomara: but she winked with her eie, & thereby gave a signall to one of her own companie for to kill the said Romane captaine, at what time as he should take his leave of her with a kisse and friendly farewell; which the partie did with his sword, & at one stroke fetched off his head: the head she herselfe tooke up, and wrapped it in the lap of her gowne before, and so gat her away apace homeward: when she was come to her husbands house, downe she cast his head at his feet, whereat he being astonied: Ah my sweet wife (quoth he) it is a good thing to keepe faithfull promise: True (quoth she) but it is better, that but one man alive should have my companie. Polybius writeth of the same woman, that himselfe talked with her afterwards in the citie of Sardis, and that he found her then to be a woman of an high minde and of wonderfull deepe wit. But since I am fallen to the mention of the Galatians, I will rehearse yet one story more of them.

A WOMAN OF PERGAMUS.

King Mithridates sent upon a time for threescore of the principall lords of Galatia, to repaire unto him upon trust and safe-conduct as friends, into the citie Pergamus: whom being come at his request, he entertained with proud & imperious speeches, whereat they all took great scorn and indignation, in so much as one of them named Toredorix (a strong & tall man of his hands, & besides wonderfull courageous, Tetrarch of the Toslepians country) undertooke this one day enterprize, to set upon Mithridates, at what time as he sat in judgement, & gave audience from the tribunall seat in the publicke place of exercise, and both him and seat together to tumble downe headlong into the pit underneath: but it fortune that the king that day came not abroad as his maner was, up into that place of open exercise, but commanded all those Galatian lords, to come and speake with him at his house: Toredorix exhorted them to be bold and confident, and when they were altogether in his presence, to runne upon him from everie side, to teare him in pieces and make an end of him: this plot was not projected so closely, but it came to Mithridates eares, who caused them all to be apprehended, and sent to chop off all their heads one after another: but immediately after, he called to remembrance that there was one young gentleman among the rest, for the flower of his yeeres, for beautie also, and feature of bodie, the goodliest person that he had set eie on in his daies; whom he tooke pitee of, and repented that he had condemned him to die with his fellowes, shewing evidently in his countenance, that he was mightily grieved and disquieted in his minde, as thinking verily that he was executed already with the first; howbeit, at a very venture he sent in all haste a countermaund, that if he were yet alive, he should be spared and let goe: this young mans name was Bepolitamus, and verily his fortune was most strange and woonderfull: for had away hee was to the place of execution in that habit wherein he was attached, and the same was a very faire and rich suite of apparell, which because the butcherly executioner desired to reserve cleane and unsprent with blood, he was somewhat long about the stripping of him out of it; & whiles he was so doing he might perceive the kings men come running apace toward him, and with a loud voice naming Bepolitamus. See how covetousnesse, which hath bene the death of many a thousand, was the meanes beyond all expectation, to save the life of this young gentleman: as for Toredorix, after he was cruelly mangled with many a chop and hacke, his bodie was cast forth unburied to the dogs; neither durst any of his friends come neere for to enterre it: one woman onely of Pergamus, whom this Galatian in his life time had knownen, in regard of her fresh youth and beautie, was so hardie as to hazard the taking of his dead corps away, and to burie it; which when the warders and watchmen perceived they attached her, and brought her to the king: and it is reported that Mithridates at the very first sight of her, had compassion, for that she seemed to be a young thing, & a simple harmlesse wench every way; but when he understood withal that love was the very cause thereof, his heart melted so much the rather; whereupon he gave her leave to take up the bodie, and commit it to the earth, allowing her for that purpose funerall clothes, and furnishing her at his owne charges, with all other things meet for comely and decent buriall.

TIMOCLIA.

TIMOCLIA.

Theagines the Theban, carried the like minde and purpose for the defence of his country and the common wealth, as sometimes Epaminondas, Pelopidas, and the bravest men in the world had done; but his fortune was to fall in that common ruine of Greece, when as the Greeks lost that unfortunate battell before Cheronea; and yet for his owne part he was a victour, and followed them in chace, whom he had disarmed and purto flight; for he it was who when one of them that fled cried out unto him: How farre wilt thou pursue and follow us; answered: Even as farre as into Macedonia: but when he was dead, a sister of his who survived him, gave good testimony, that in regard as well of his auncestors vertue, as his owne naturall disposition, he had bene a worthy personage, and worthy to be reckoned and renowned amongst the most valiant knights in his daies; for some fruit received, and reaped vertue, which helped her to beare and endure patiently as much of the common miseries of her country as touched her; for after that Alexander the Great had woon the citie of Thebes by assault, & the soldiers ran to and fro into all parts of the towne, pilling and ransacking whatsoever they could come by: it chanced that one seized upon the house of Timoclia, a man who knew not what belonged to honour, honestie, or common curtisie and civilitie, but was altogether violent, furious and out of reason; a captaine he was of a coronet of Thracia light horsemen; and caried the name of king Alexander: his lord and master, but nothing like he was unto him in conditions: for having filled himselfe with wine after supper, and good cheere, without any respect unto the race and lineage of this noble dame, without regard of her estate and calling; he was in hand with her to be his bedfellow all that night, neither was this all; for he would needs search and know of her, where she had laid up and hoarded any gold or silver, one while threatening to kill her, unless she would bring him to it, another while bearing her in hand that he would make her his wife, if she would yeeld unto him: she taking vantage of this occasion which himselfe offered and presented unto her: It might have pleased the gods (quoth she) that I had died before this night, rather than remaine alive; for though I had lost all besides, yet my bodie had bene undefiled & saved from all violence and villanie; but since it is my fortune, that heere after I must repute you for my lord, my master, and my husband, and seeing it is gods will to give you this puissance and sovereignty over me, I will not deprive and disappoint you of that which is yours, and as for my selfe, I see well, that my condition from henceforth must be such as you will; I was wont indeed to have about me, costly jewels and ornaments for my bodie; I had silver in plate, yea and some gold in good coine and other ready money; but when I saw that the citie was lost, I willed my women and maid-servants about me to get altogether, and so I cast it away, or rather indeed to say a truth, I bestowed it, and reserved it in safetie within a dry pit, wherein no water is, an odde blinde corner I may say to you, that few or none doe know; for that there is a great stone lieth over the mouth of it, and a many of trees grow round about to shade and cover the same; as for you, this treasure will make you a man, yea, and a rich man for ever, when you have it once in your possession; and for my part, it may serve for a good testimony and sufficient proofe, to shew how noble and wealthy our house was before-time. When the Macedonian heard these words, his teeth so watred after this treasure, that he could not stay untill the morrow, and attend the day light; but would needs out of hand be conducted by Timoclia, and her maidens to the place; but he commanded her in any wise to shut fast and locke the fore-yard gate after them, that no man might see and know; and so he went downe in his shirt into the foresaid pit: but cursed and hideous Clotio was his mistress and guide, who would punish and be revenged of his notorious wickednesse by the hands of Timoclia, who standing above; for when she perceived by his voice that he was now at the very bottom, she herselfe threw downe a number of stones upon him, & her women also tumbled downe many others, & those very big ones so and heavy, after him, untill they had brained him, overwhelmed him, and in manner filled the pit up: which when the Macedonians heard of, they made meanes to draw up his dead bodie, and for that there was a proclamation published before by found of trumpet throughout the city, that they should not massacre one Theban more, they apprehended Timoclia, & brought her before king Alexander, whom they had already acquainted from point to point in particular, with that audacious act which she had committed: the king judging (by her feele & confident countenance, by her staid gate also and portly pace) that she could not chule but be of some great and noble house; demanded of her, first, what she was? and the with rare boldnesse and resolution tion without shewing any signe that she was daunted and astonied; I had (quoth she) a brother named Theagines, who being capitaine generall of the Thebans, against you, in the battell of Cheronea, lost his life fighting manfully, in the defence of the libertie of Greece, to the end that we might not fall into that wofull misery, into which we are at this present fallen; but seeing it is so, that we have suffered those outrages & indignities which be unworthy the place from whence we are defended, for my selfe I refuse not to die, and peradventure it were not expedient for me to live any longer, and trie such another night as the last was; unless your selfe impeach and debarre such demeanors: at these words, the noblest and most honorable persons who were present, could not forbear but weepe; as for Alexander, he thought that the haucie mind and courage of this dame, was greater than to moove pittie and compassion; and therefore highly praising her vertue and commending her speech which he marked, and pondered well enough, gave straight charge and commaundement unto his captaines, to have a good cie; and careful regard, yea, and to take order presently, that there should no more such abuses be offered in any house of honor and nobilitie: and as touching Timoclia, he ordeined immediately, that she should be set at full libertie, both herselfe, and also all those who were knowne and found any way to be of her bloud and kintred.

ERYXO.

Battus who was surnamed Demon, that is to say, Happie, had a sonne whose name was Arceflamus, in nothing at all resembling the maners and conditions of his father; for even during his fathers life (for raising of battlements and pinnacles round about the walles of his owne house,) hee was condemned by his father himselfe in a fine of one whole talent; and after his death, being of a crooked, rough and troublesome spirit, (according as his very name, Caleps, implied), and for that he was governed altogether by the counsell of a minion and favourite of his owne, named Laarchus, a man of no worth nor respect, he proved a tyrant in stead of a king. And this Laarchus aspiring likewise to be tyrant, either chafed and banished out of the citie, or els caused to be put to death, the best and principall citizens of all Cyrene; but when he had so done, he derived from himselfe all the blame and imputation upon Arceflamus; and in the end gave him to drinke a cup of poison, to wit, a sea-hare, whereupon he fell into a lingering and languishing disease, whereby he pined away, and died at the last; by which meanes himselfe usurped the seignorie and rule of the citie, under a colour of keeping it as Tutor and Lord Protector, for the behoofe and use of Battus the sonne of Arceflamus; for a very childe he was, and lame withall; so that in regard aswell of his nonage and minoritie, as the defect and imperfection of his body, he was despised of the people; but many there were, who drew and ranged themselves unto his mother, and were willing to obey and honour her, for that she was a wise ladie, and of a milde and courteous nature: besides, most of the mightiest men in those parts were knit to her either in bloud and kindred, or els by bond of friendship: by meanes whereof, Laarchus made court to her, yea, and sued unto her for her good will by way of marriage, offering unto her (if she would be affianced and wedded unto him) to adopt Battus for his owne sonne, and make him partaker of his seignorie and dominion: but Eryxo (for that was the name of this noble ladie) being advised and counselled thereto before-hand by her brethren, willed Laarchus to impart the matter unto them, for that upon conference with them (if they thought well of this marriage) she would be content and confesceend thereto: Laarchus failed not so to do, but went and brake the thing unto her brethren accordingly; and they (as it was complotted before) drew the matter out in length, and drave him off from day to day; but Eryxo sent unto him secretly one of her waiting maidens, to give him notice from her, that her brethren in deed for the present did contradict her minde and crossed her will; but were the knot once knit and consummate in bed together, they would contest and halte no longer, but be willing enough to like and approve thereof as a convenient match: and therefore she advised him (if he thought so good) to repair by night unto her: for if the thing were once wel begun, she rest no doubt would speed accordingly; this message pleased Laarchus, and fired his humour passing well: being therefore transported wholly besides himselfe with these lovely and sugred words of this dame, he promised to attend her at what houre soever she would appoint. Now was this device complotted and laid by the counsell of her eldest brother Polyarchus; and after that she had set downe the just time when they should meet and company together, against that very instant, she tooke order that the said brother should secretly be conveyed into her chamber, who brought with him him two luttie tall yong men well appointed with good swords, and who desired nothing more than to revenge their fathers bloud, whom lately Laarchus had caused to be put to death: when all things were now in readinesse, she sent for Laarchus, willing him to come alone without any of his guard about him: no sooner was he entred into the chamber, but these two yong men charged upon him with their swords, wounded him in many parts of his bodie, that he died in the place: his dead corps they cast over the walles of the house; which done, they brought the yong prince Battus abroad into the publicke place, declared and proclaimed him king after the maner and custome of the citie. Thus Polyarchus rendered unto the Cyrenians their ancient government which they had from the beginning. Now there happened to be at the same time in Cyrene many souldiers of Amasis the king of Aegypt, in whom Laarchus reposed his confidence, and found them fast & trustie unto him; by whose meanes he became dread and terrible to the Cyrenians: these sent in post with all speed unto king Amasis, messengers of purpose, to charge & accuse Eryxo & Polyarchus for this murder; whereat the king was wroth, and in great indignation intended out of hand to make sharpe war upon the Cyrenians; but as he prepared to set forward this expedition, it fortuned that his mother departed this life: whiles therefore he was busie about her funerals, newes came to Cyrene, how this king was highly displeased and resolved to levie warre against them: whereupon Polyarchus thought good to address himselfe in person to the said king, and to render a reason unto him of this late fact committed upon the bodie of Laarchus: neither would his sister Eryxo tary behinde, but follow him, and expose her to owne person to the same perill that he entred into: yea, and the mother of them both, named Critola (very aged though she was) was right willing to goe, and accompanied her sonne and daughter in this journey: now was she a great ladie, and most highly esteemed in this regard especially, that shee was the sister in the whole bloud to Battus the first of that name, surnamed the Happie. When they were arrived in Aegypt, all other lords and noble men of the court approved well of that which they had done in this case; and Amasis himselfe infinitely commended the pudicitie and magnanimitie of dame Eryxo; and after he had honoured them with rich presents, and roially entertained them, he sent them all backe (Polyarchus I meane, and the two ladies) with his good grace and favour, to Cyrene.

XENOCRITE.

Xenocrite a ladie of the citie Cumes, deserveth no lesse to be praised and admired, for that which she practised against Aristodemus the tyrant, whom some thinke to have bene surnamed Malacos, that is to say, Soft and effeminate, in regard of his loose and dissolute carriage: but they are deceived and ignorant in the true originall and occasion of his name; for the Barbarians gave him this addition Malacos, which in their language signifieth a Yonker: because being a very youth, with other companions of equall age, as yet wearing their haire long, whom in olde time they tearmed Coronists, (of their blacke locks as it should seeme) he above the rest, in the warres against the Barbarians, bare himselfe so bravely: (for he was not only hardy & courageous in spirit, stout also and tall of his hands, but withall full of wit, discretion and foresaite, and so farre excelled all others in singularity) that hee became right famous and renowned; whereupon he grew into such credit and admiration among his countrey men and fellow-citizens, that incontinently promoted he was and advanced by them to the greatest offices of State and highest dignities in common-weale; insomuch as when the Tuskans made warre upon the Romans in the right and quarrell of Tarquinius Superbus, and namely, to restore him againe to his crowne and kingdome, from which he was deposed; the Cumans made him capitaine generall of those forces which they sent to aide the Romans: in which expedition and warfare that continued long, he carried himselfe so remissly among his citizens, (which were in the campe under his charge, and gave them so much the head to do what they would, winning their hearts by courtesies and flatterie, rather than commanding them as their generall) that he put into their heads, and perswaded them (upon their returne home) to run upon the Senate, and to joine with him in expelling and banishing the mightiest persons and best men of the citie. By which practice he set up himselfe as an absolute tyrant: and as he seemed wicked and violent otherwise in all kind of oppression and extortion; so most of all he was outrageous and went beyond himselfe in villanie toward wives and maidens, to yong boies also of good houses and free borne: for among other enormities, this is recorded of him: That he forced yong lads to wear their haire long, like lasses, to have also upon their heads, borders, cawles, and attires with spangles of golde;

golde; contrariwise, hee compelled yong maidens to be rounded, polled, and notted, and to wear short jackets, coats & mandilions without sleeves, after the fashion of springalds: howbeit, being exceedingly enamored upon Xenocrita the daughter of one of those principall citizens who by him were exiled, he kept, not having espoused her lawfully, nor wooed her good will by faire perswasions, supposing that the maiden might thinke her selfe well appealed, and her fortune verie happie, to be entertained (in any fort whatsoever) by him, being by that meanes highly reputed of and esteemed fortunate among all the citizens: but as for her, all these favors did not ravish and transport her found judgement and understanding; for besides that she was mightily discontented to converse and keepe companie with him, not espoused, nor affianced and given in marriage by her friends, she had no lesse desire to recover the liberty of her country, than those who were openly hared of the tyrant. Now it fortuned about the same time, that Aristodemus caused a trench to be cast, & a bank to be raised round about his territory, a piece of worke neither necessarie, nor profitable, which he did onely upon a policie, because he would thereby vex, out-toile consume & waste his poore subjects; for he tasked every man, to cast up & cary forth by the day a certaine number of measures full of earth. Xenocrita when she saw him at any time comming toward her, would tume aside, and cover her face with the lappet of her gown: but when Aristodemus was passed by & gone, yong men her play-feres, by way of mirth and pastime, would aske her why she musted and masked her selfe, as ashamed to see him onely, and was not abashed to see and be seene of other men as well; unto whom she would answer demurely, & that in right good earnest say: I wis I do it of purpose because there is not one man among all the Cumans but Aristodemus: this word touched them all very neere; but such as were of any noble spirit and courage, it galled and prickled for very shame, yea, and gave them an edge to set in hand and enterprise some manly act for to recover their freedom: which when Xenocrita heard, she said by report, that she would rather herselfe carie earth in a basket upon her owne shoulders as other did, for her father if he were there present, than participate in all delights and pleasures, yea, and enjoy great power and authoritie with Aristodemus. These and such like speeches cast out by her, confirmed those who were conspired and ready to rise against the tyrant, of whom the chieftaine and principall leader, was one Themoteles: unto these conspiratours Xenocrita gave free access and ready entrie unto Aristodemus; who finding him alone, unarmed and unguarded, fell many at once upon him, and so quickly dispatched him out of the way. Lo how the cite of Cumes was delivered from tyrannie by two vertues of one woman; by the one she first gave the citizens an affection, minde and heart, to begin and enterprise; and by the other she ministred unto them, meanes to execute and performe the same: for which good service of Xenocrita, those of the cite offered unto her many honors, prerogatives, and presents; but she refused them all, onely she requested this favour at their hands, that she might enterre the corps of Aristodemus, which they graunted, and more than so, they chose her for to be a religious priestresse unto Ceres, supposing that this dignitie would be no lesse acceptable and pleasing unto the goddesse, than becoming and fitting the person of this lady.

THE WIFE OF PYTHES.

IT is reported moreover, that the wife of rich Pythes, in the daies of Xerxes when he warred upon Greece, was a vertuous and wife dame; for this Pythes having (as it should seeme) found certaine mines of gold, and setting his minde thereon, not in measure, but excessively, and unsatiably, for the great sweetnesse and infinit gaines that arose thereby; both himselfe in person bestowed his whole time therein, and also he employed all his subjects and citizens indifferently without respect of any person, to digge and delve, to carrie, to purge, and cleanse the said golde oare; not suffering them to follow any other trade, or exercise any occupation else in the world: upon which unmeasurable and incessant toile, many died, and all were wery, and grumbled thereat, in so much as at last, their wives came with olive branches, like humble suppliants to the gate of this lady his wife, for to moove pittie, and beseech her for redresse and succour in this case: she having heard their supplication, sent them away home to their houses with verie good & gracious words, willing them not to distrust and be discomfited: meane while she sent secretly for gold-smiths, goldsmithes, and other worke-men in gold, such as the reposed most confidence in, & that them up close within a certaine place, willing them to make loaves, pies, tarts, cakes, pastrie-works, and junkets of all sorts, sweet meats, fruits, all manner of meats and viands, such as she knew her husband Pythes loved best, all of cleane gold; afterwards, when all were were made, and he returned home to his house (for as then he was abroad in a forren country:) so soone as he called for supper, his wife set before him a table furnished with all kinds of counterfeited viands made of gold, without any thing at all, either good to be eaten or drunken, but all gold, and nothing but gold: great pleasure at the first tooke Pythes for to see so rich a sight, and so glorious a banquet, wherein arte had so lively expressed nature; but after he had fed his eyes sufficiently with beholding these goodly golden works, he called unto her in good earnest for somewhat to eat; but she still whatsoever his minde stood to, brought it him in gold; so that in the end he waxed angrie, and cried out, that he was ready to famish: Why sir (quoth she) are not your selfe the cause of all this? for you have given us foison and store of this mettall, but caused extreame want and scarcitie of meat and all things else, for all other trades, occupations, arts, and mysteries are decayed, and their use cleane gone; neither is there anie man that followeth husbandry and tilleth the ground; but laying aside, and casting behind us all thing that should be sown and planted upon the earth for the food and sustentation of man, we doe nothing else but digge and search for such things as will not serve to feed and nourish us, spending and wearing out both our selves and our citizens. These words mooved Pythes verie much; howbeit, for all this, he gave not over quite the mines and mettall works, but enjoining the fifth part of his subjects to travell therein by turnes, one after another; he gave the rest leave to husband their lands, and ply their other crafts and misteries. But when Xerxes came downe with that puissant armie for to make warre upon the Greeks, this Pythes shewed his magnificence in the entertainment of him, with sumptuous furniture, costlie gifts and presents, which he gave unto the king and all his traine: for which he craved this onely grace and favour at his hands againe: that of many children which he had, he would dispend with him for one of them, that he might not goe to the warres, to the end that the said sonne might remaine with him at home in his house, for to tend and looke unto him carefullie in his old age: whereat Xerxes was so wroth, that he commanded that one sonne (whom he requested) to be killed presently, and his dead body to be cloven through in the mids, and divided into two parts; and so dislodged and caused his armie to march betwene them both; the rest of his sonnes he led with him to the warres, who died all in the field; whereupon Pythes being discomfited, and his heart cleane cast downe, did that which those ordinarily doe, who want courage and wit; for he feared death, and hated life; willing he was not to live, and yet hee had not the power to make an end of his life; what did he then? There was within the cite a great banke or mount of earth, under which there ranne a river, which they called Pythopolites; within this mount he caused his tombe to be made, & turned aside the course of the said river, in such sort, that as it passed, the streame might glide upon this monument of his; which being prepared and done accordingly, hee went downe quicke and alive into the same sepulchre, having resigned over unto his wives hands the cite, and the whole seignorie thereof; injoyning her thus much, that she should not approach herselfe unto this tombe or monument but onely every daie once send unto him, his supper in a little punt or boat downe the riveret, and to continue this so long untill she saw, that the said punt went beyond the monument, having in it all his victuals whole and untouched; for then she should not need to send him any more, but take this for an assured signe, that he was dead. Thus lived Pythes the rest of his daies; but his wife governed and managed the State prudently, and wrought a great change and alteration in the toilsome life of her people.

A CONSOLATORIE ORATION SENT UNTO

APOLONIUS UPON THE DEATH OF HIS SONNE.

The Summarie.

Howsoever Plutarch in this treatise hath displayed his eloquence and all the skill and helps that he had by the means of Philosophie, yet we see that the same is not sufficient to set the minde and spirit of man in true repose; and that such consolations are (as they say) but palliative cures & no better: wherein also is discovered the want and defect of light in the reason and wisdom of man: yet notwithstanding, take this with halt that such discourses doe recommend and shew unto us so much the better, the excellencie of celestiall wisdom, which furnissheth us with true and assured remedies; and in stead of leaving the heart afflicted with humane thoughts and considerations, riseth and lifeth it up unto the iustice, wisdom and bountie of the true God and heavenly father; it causeth us to see the estate of eternall life; it assurith of the soules immortalitie, of the resurrection of the bodie, (points of learning, wherein the Pagans were altogether ignorant) and of the permanent and everlasting ioyes above, in the kingdome of heaven. Now albeit as this truth of God (revealed unto us in his sacred word) hath instructed and resolved us sufficiently, it will not be amisse and impertinent, to learne of our neighbour and such others, those things which themselves did not well and thoroughly understand, neither in life nor yet in death; for that the foundation faileth them, and they misse the ground-woke indeed, and in cleaving and leaning unto it not not what fortune and fustall destine, they caused man to rest and stay himselfe upon a vaine shadow of vertue, and willed him (in one word) to seeke for consolation, where there was nothing but desolation, for happinesse in misery, and for life in death. As touching the argument and contents of this treatise; adorned it with notable reasons, similitudes, examples and testimonies, the substance whereof is this: That Apollonius (unto whom it is addressed) ought not to be over-pensive and heavie for the death of his sonne, deceased in the flower of his age. To move and persuade him thereto, Plutarch after he had excused himselfe in that he wrote no sooner unto him, and shewed, that space of time coming betwene, doth better prepare mens hearts, which sorrow and bein anguish, to receive comfort; he condemneth as well blockish and senselesse folke, as also those that be weaklings and over-tender in adversity. Which done, he entreteth into a generall review of the remedies which be appropriate to cure the miseries and afflictions of man; namely, that hee ought to holde a meane, and to continue alwayes like himselfe to cast his eye and have regard upon the divers accidents of our life, and in enjoying the blessings thereof; to thinke upon future crosses and calamities, to be armed with reason for to beare all changes; to remember and carefully to thinke upon the estate of this mortall and transitorie life; to consider the evils and miseries of the same; to endure patiently that which can not be avoided and presented with all the cares and lamentations that be; and to compare our owne adversities with others mens. Then he proceedeth unto the particular consolations of those who are hevie and sorrowfull for the death of their children, kinsfolke or friends; to wit: That there is no harme nor evil in all in death, but rather that it is a good thing, that the houre of it being uncertaine, it is a comfort unto those whom it summoueth, who no doubt would be cast downe and overthrowen with the apprehension of miseries to come, in case they had any foresight thereof. After this, he proveth at large by three inductions and arguments of Sociates, that there is not any evil in death; which he confirmeth by divers examples; and then returning into his consolations, he maineinerth and holdeth: That whosoever die young, are most happy; that the consideration of Gods providence ought to reiteine and stay us; that we are not to mourne and lament for the dead, neither in regard of them nor of our selves; that since we are long heaving heaving and sorrow maketh a man miserable, it were very good for him to be rid and dispatched of that paine quickly. Having finished this point, he resolveth and assaileth certaine difficulties which are presented in these matters: and then taking in hand his purpose againe, he rulerth and resolveth the afflictions of the living, toward them that are departed; he reclaimeth them from persisting and continuing obstinately in bewailing their absence, willing them rather to bewaile the case of those who are living; and by many reasons doth prove and conclude, that they who die betimes have one unenviellous advantage over those that remaine alive in the world. Then he teacheth a man to mainteine and carry himselfe as he ought in all affaires; refuseth those who can abide no paine and trouble; and knitting up all the premisses in few words, he assigneth certaine necessary and profitable counsels in such accidents; and before that he concludeth the whole treatise, he describeth the felicity of those whom death cutteth off in the prime of their yeeres, having a speciall regard herein, to Apollonius the partie unto whom he writeth, and assuring him by the recitall of the good parts and vertues which were in his sonne lately departed, that he was without all question, in that place of repose and rest which the Poets do imagine. Upon which occasion he treateth of the immortalitie of the soule, according to the doctrine of Plato and his followers, which is the very end and closing up of all that had bene delivered before.

A CONSOLATORIE ORATION sent unto Apollonius upon the death of his sonne.

LIt is not newly come upon me now at this present and not before, to pittie your case and lament in your behalfe (O Apollonius) having heard long since (as I did) the heavy newes concerning the untimely death of your sonne, a young gentleman singularly well beloved of us all, as who in that youth and tender yeeres of his, shewed rare examples of wife carriage, staid and modest behaviour, together with precise observance of those devout duties and just offices, which either pertained to the religious service of the gods, or were respective to his parents and friends; for even from that time have I condoled with you, and had a fellow-feeling of your sorrow: but for me to have come then, and visited you immediately upon his decease & departure out of this world, to present you with an exhortation to beare patiently and as becommeth a man, that unfortunate accident, had bene an unseemly part of mine and inconvenient, considering how in that verie instant your minde and bodie both (overcharged with the insupportable burden of so strange and unexpected a calamitie) were brought low and much infeeblid; and my selfe besides, must needs have moaned you, felt part of your griefe, and sorrowed with you for companie: for even the best and most skilfull Physicians, when they meet with violent rheumes and catarrhes, which suddenly surprize any part of the body, doe not proceed at the first to a rough cure by purgative medicines, but permit this rage and hot impression of inflamed humours to grow of it selfe to maturitie by application onely of supple oiles, mild liniments, and gentle fomentations. But now, that since your said misfortune, some time (which useth to ripen all things) is passed betwene, and given good opportunitee, considering also, that the present disposition and state of your person seemeth to require the helpe and comfort of your friends, I thought it meet and requisite to impart unto you certaine reasons and discourses consolatorie, if happily by that means I may ease your anguish, mitigate your pensiveness, and stay your needlesse mourning and bootlesse lamentation: for why?

If minde be sicke, what physicke then?

But reasons fit for each disease?

A wise man knowes the season when

To use those meanes, the heart to ease.

And according as the wise Poet Euripides saith:

Ech griefe of minde, ech maladie

Doth crave a severall remedie:

If restless sorrow the heart torment,

Kind words of friends worke much content.

Great need there is of sharpe correction.*

For verily among so many passions and infirmities incident to the soule of man, dolor and heaviness be most irkefome and goe neereft into it. By occasion of anguish many a one (they say) hath run mad and fallen into maladies incurable; yea, and for thought and hearts-griefe, some have bene driven to make away themselves. Now to sorow and be touched to the quicke for the losse of a sonne, is a passion that ariseth from a naturall cause, and it is not in our power to avoid; which being so, I cannot (for my part) holde with them, who so highly praise and extoll, I wot not what brutish, hard, and blockish indolence and stupiditie, which if it were possible for a man to entertaine, is not any way commodious and available. Certes, the same would bereave vs of that mutuall benevolence and sweet comfort which we finde in the reciprocall interchange of loving others and being loved againe; which (of all earthly blessings) we had most need to preserve and mainteine. Yet do I not allow that a man should suffer himselfe to be transported and caried away beyond all compasse & measure, making no end of sorow; for even that also is likewise unnaturall, and proceedeth from a corrupt and eronious opinion that we have: and therefore, as we ought to abandon this excesse as simply naught, hurtfull, and not becomming vertuous and honest minded men; so in no wise must we disallow that meane and moderation in our passions, following in this point sage Cranor the Academick Philosopher: I could wish (quoth he) that we might be never sicke; howbeit, if we chance to fall into some disease, God send us yet some sense and feeling, in case any part of our bodie be either cut, plucked away, or dismembered in the cure. And I assure you, that senselesse impassibilitie is never incident unto a man, without some great mischief and inconvenience ensuing; for lightly it falleth out, that when the bodie is in this case without feeling, the soule soone after will become as insensible: reason would therefore, that wise men in these and such like crosses, cary themselves, neither void of affections altogether, nor yet out of measure passionate; for as the one bewraith a fell and hard heart, resembling a cruell beast; so the other discovereth a soft and effeminate nature, becomming a tender woman: but best advised is he, who knoweth to keepe a meane, and being guided by the rule of reason, hath the gift to beare wisely and indifferently, as well the flattering favours, as the scowling frownes of fortune, which are so ordinarily occurrent in this life; having this forecast with himselfe: That like as in a free State, and popular government of a common wealth, where the election of soveraigne magistrates passeth by lots; the one whose hap is to be chosen, must be a ruler and commander; but the other who misseth, ought patiently to take his fortune, and beare the repulse; even so in the disposition and course of all our worldly affaires, we are to be content with our portion allotted unto us, and without grudging and complaint, gently to yeeld our selves obedient: for surely they that can not so doe, would never be able with wisdom and moderation to weld any great prosperitie: for of many wise speeches and well said sawes, this sentenace may goe for one:

*How ever fortune smile and looke full faire,
Be thou not proud nor beare a losse mind;
Ne yet cast downe and plung'd in deepe aspaire,
If that she frowne or shew herselfe unkind;
But alwaies one and same let men thee find.
Constant and firme receive thy nature still,
As gold in fire, which alter never will.*

For this is the propertie of a wise man and wel brought up, both for any apparent shew of prosperitie to be no changling, but to beare himselfe alwaies in one sort; & also in adversitie, with a generous and noble mind, to mainteine that which is decent & becomming his own person: for the office of true wisdom & considerate discretion is, either to prevent & avoid a mischief coming, or to correct and reduce it to the least & narrowest compasse when it is once come, or els to be prepared and ready to beare the same manfully, and with all magnanimitie. As touching that which we call good, is scarce and employed foure maner of waies; to wit, in getting, in keeping, in augmenting, or in well and right using the same: these be the rules as well of prudence, as of other vertues, which we are to make use and benefit of in both fortunes, as well the one as the other: for according to the old proverb:

*No man there is on earth alive,
In every thing who ay doth thrive.
And verily*

By

*By course of nature, unmet it wrought may be,
That ought should check far all nece sitie.*

And as it falleth out in trees and other plants, that some yeeres they beare their burden, and yeeld great store of frute, whereas in others they bring forth none at all; also living creatures one whiles be frutefull and breed many yooing, otherwhiles againe, they be as barren for it; and in the sea it is now tempest, and then calme: semblably in this life there happen many circumstances and accidents, which winde and turne us into the chaunces of contrarie fortunes; in regard of which varietie, a man may by good right and reason, say thus:

*O Agamemnon, thy father Atreus hee, Alwaies to prosper hath not begotten thee:
For in this life thou must have one day joy,
Another, griefe and wealth, mixt with annoy.
And why? thou art by mortall nature fraile,
Thy will against this course cannot prevail:
For so it is the pleasure of the gods,
To make this change, and worke in man such odds.*

As also that which to the same effect the poet Menander wrote in this wise:

*Sir Trophimus, if you the onely night
Of women borne, were brought into this light
With privilege, to have the world at will,
To taste no woe, but prosper alwaies still?
Or if some god had made you such behest,
To live in joy, in solace and in rest?
You had just cause to fare thus as you doe,
And chafe, for that he from his word doth goe,
And hath done what he can not justifie:
But if so be, as truth will resistie:
Under one law this publike wit all live,
You draw with us, your breath for to repaire;
I say to you (gravely in tragick stile)
You ought to be more patient the while;
To take all this in better woorth (I say)
Let reason rule, and stand for small pay.
And to knit up in few words, Trophimus
Of this discourse the summe; I reason thus:
A man you are, (that is as much to say)
A creature, more prompt and subject ay
To sudden change, and from the pitch of blis,
To lie in pit, where bale and sorow is,
Than others all: and not unwort hily:
For why, most weake by his owne nature, he Will needs himselfe in his best matters wrap,
Above his reach, secure of after-clap:
And then anon, he falling from on high,
Beares downe with him all good things that were nigh:
But as for you, the goods which here so fore
O Trophimus you lost, exceeded not, no more Than those mishaps which you this day susteine
Excesive be, but keepe with in a meane:*

Hence forth therefore, you ought to beare the rest Indifferently, and you shall finde it best.

Howbeit, although the condition and estate of mens affaires stand in these tearmes, yet some there be, who for want of sound judgement and good discretion, are grown to that blockish stupiditie, or vaine overweening of themselves, that after they be once a little raised up, and advanced, either in regard of excessive wealth, and store of gold and silver under their hands, or by reason of some great offer, or for other preidence and preeminence of high place which they hold in the common-weale; or else by occasion of honours and glorious titles which they have have acquired, doe menace, wrong and insult over their inferiors, never considering the uncertainty and inconstance of mutable fortune, nor how quickly that which was aloft may be flung downe; and contrariwise, how soone that which lieth below on the ground, may be extolled and lifted up on high by the sudden mutations and changes of fortune: to seeke for any certaintie therefore in that which is by nature uncertaine and variable, is the part of those that judge not aright of things:

*For as the wheele doth turne, one part we see
Of folly high and low in course to bee.*

But to attaine unto this tranquillitie of spirit, void of all griefe and anguish, the most soveraigne powerfull, and effectuall medicine, is reason, and by the meanes thereof, a prepared estate and resolution against all the changes and alterations of this life: neither is it sufficient for a man onely to acknowledge himselfe to be by nature borne mortall; but also that he is allotted unto a mortall and transitorie life, and tied as it were unto such affaires as soone doe change from their present estate unto the contrarie: for this also is most certaine, that as mens bodies be mortall and fraile, so their fortunes also, their passions and affections be fitting and momentanic; yea, and in one word, all that belongeth unto them is transitorie; which it is not possible for him to avoid and escape, who is himselfe by nature mortall: but as Pindarus said:

*With masie weights of strong necessitye,
Of hell so darke to bottome forced are we.*

Verie well therefore said Demetrius Phalerus, whereas Euripides the Poet wrote thus:

*No worldly wealth is firme and sure,
But for a day it doth endure.*

Also:

*How small things may our state quite overthrow!
It fallett out (as every man doth know)
That even one day is able downe to cast
Some things from height, and others raise as fast.*

All the rest (quoth he) was excellently by him written, but farre better it had bene, if he had named, not one day, but the minute, moment, and very point of an houre:

*For earthly fruits and mortall mens estate
Turne round about in one and selfe same rate,
Some live, waxe strong and prosper day by day,
Whiles others are cast downe and fade away.*

And Pindarus in another place

*What is it for to be but one?
Nay what is it to be just none?
And verily a man is made
To be the dreame even of a shade.*

nath declared the vanitie of mans life, by using an Hyperbole or excessive maner of an over-reaching speech, both passing wittily, and also to the purpose most significantly. For what is there more weake & feeble than a shadow? but to come in with the fantastickall dreame of a shadow; surely it is not possible that any other man should expresse the thing that he meant, more lively & in fitter termes. And verily, Cranior in good correspondence hereunto, when he comforteth Hippocles for the untimely death of his children, useth these words among the rest: These are the rules (quoth he) that all the schoole thorowout of ancient Philosophie doth deliver and teach; wherein, if there be any point besides, that we can not admit and approve, yet this at leastwise is most undoubted true, that mans life is exceeding laborious and painfull: for say that in the owne nature it be not such; so it is, that by our owne selves it is brought to that corruption: besides, this uncerteine fortune haunteth and attendeth upon us as farre off, and even from our very cradle and swaddling bands, yea, and ever since our first entrance into this life accompanieth us, for no good in the world.

To say nothing, how in all things whatsoever that breed and budde, there is evermore some portion more or lesse of naughtinesse inbred and mingled therewith; for the very naturall seed (which at the first, when it is at best, is mortall) doth participate this primitive cause, whereupon proceed the untoward inclination and disposition of the minde, maladies, cares and sorrows; and from thence there creepe and grow upon us, all those farall calamities that befall to mortall men. But what is the reason that we are digressed hitherto? forsooth, to this end, that we we may know that it is no newes for any man to taste of miseries and calamities, but rather that we are all subject to the same: for (as Theophrastus saith) fortune never aimeth or levelleth at any certeine marke, but shooteth at random; taking much pleasure, and being very powerfull to turne a man out of that which he hath painfully gotten before, and to overthrow a supposed and reputed felicity, with all regard of any fore-set and prefixed time to worke this feat. These reasons, and many other such like, every one of us may easily consider and ponder within himselfe; yea & besides, lay thereto the sage speeches (which he is ay to heare and learne) of ancient and wife men: among whom, the chiefe and principall is that heavenly and divine Poet Homer, who saith thus:

More weake than man; there is no creature

*That from the earth reserveth nourture:
So long as limmes with strength he can advance,
And whilst the gods do lend him puissance,
He thinks no harme will ever him befall,
He casts no doubt, but hopes to outgoe all:
But let them once from heaven some sorrowes send,
Maugre the smart, he beares unto the end.*

Also:

*Such minds have men, who here on earth do live.
As Jupiter from heaven doth daily give.*

And in another place:

*Why aske you of my blood and parentage?
Sir Tydeus sonne, a knight magnanimous.
To leaves of trees much like is mans lineage:
Leaves some blown downe by minde outrageous Lie shed on ground, and others, numerous,
Bud fresh in wood, when pleasant spring doth call:
Mens houses so, some rise and others fall.*

Now that this similitude or comparison of tree-leaves fitly expressed and represented the transitorie vanitie of mans life, it appeareth evidently by those verses which he wrote in another place:

*You would not say that I were wise, if I did armour take
To fight with you, in wretched mens behalfe and for their sake,
Who much resemble leaves at first, faire in their fresh verdure,
So long as they of earthly fruits do feed for nourture;
And afterward be like to them, withered and dead againe,
When humour radicall is spent, and no strength doth remaine.*

Simonides the Lyricall Poet, when as Pausanias king of Lacedaemon (bearing himselfe high, and vaunting of his brave exploits) bad him (upon a time, by way of mockery) to give unto him some sage precept & good advertisement; (knowing full well the pride & over-weening spirit of the said prince) counselled him onely to call to minde, and remember: That he was but a man. Philip likewise, king of Macedon, hearing newes in one and the same day, of three severall happy successles: the first: That he had won the prize, at the great running of chariots drawn with horses, in the solemnitie of the Olympicke games: the second: How his lieutenant generally, Parmenio, had defeated the Dardaniens in battell: and the third: That his wife Olympias was delivered safe of a jolly sonne: lifted up his hands toward heaven, and said: O fortune, I beseech thee to send unto me in counterchange, some moderate adversitie: as knowing full well, that the bare spight and envie alwaies to great felicities. Semblably, Theramenes one of the thirty tyrants of Athens, at what time as the house wherein he supped with many others fell downe, and he alone escaped safe out of that dangerous ruine, when all others reputed him an happy man, cried out with a loud voice: O fortune, for what occasion of misfortune reservest thou me? and verily within few daies after, it hapned that his owne companions in government cast him in prison, and after much torture, put him to death. Moreover, it seemeth unto me, that the poet Homer delivereth singular praise in this matter of consolation, when hee bringeth in Achilles speaking of king Priamus (being come unto him for to ransom and redeeme the corps of his sonne Heclor) in this wise;

Come

A consolatorie oration sent to Apollonius

Come on therefore and heere sit downe, by me upon this throne,
Let be all plaints; for beare wet thus to weepe, so sigh and grone,
And though our griefe of heart be much, let us the same repressse,
For why? no teares will ought prevayle nor helpe us in distresse.
To live in paines and sorowes great men are predestinate
By gods above, and they alone dwell ay in blessed state, Exempt from cares and discomforts, for in the entrie still
Of Jove his house in heaven aloft, two turnes are standing still,
Wherout he doth among men deale such gifts as they containe,
In one good blessings are bestowed, in the other curse and paine:
Now he to whom great Jupiter vouchsafes of both to give,
Sometime in joy, and otherwhiles in heaviness shall live:
But if a man be onely from that cursed vessel freed,
With shame, with want, and penurie he is full liest bed,
He shall be sure upon the earth to wander and to stray,
In much disgrace with God and man untill his dying day.

The poet who came after him both in order of time, and also in credit and reputation, Hesiodus, although he taketh upon himselfe the honour to have beene a disciple of the Muses, having as well as the other included the miseries and calamities of mankind within one tun; writeth that Pandora in opening it, set them abroad in great quantitie, and spread them over all lands and seas, 20 saying in this manner:

No sooner then this woman tooke, the great lid from the tun,
With both her hands, but all abroad she scattered anon,
A world of plagues and miseries, thus mischiefs manifold
She wrought thereby to mortall men on earth both young and old:
Hope onely did remaine behind, and flew not all abroad,
But underneath the upmost brim and edge it still abode,
For why, before it could get forth, the lid she clapt to fast:
When other evils infinite were shoven from first to last:
Full was the earth of sundrie plagues, full was the feallike wife, Diseases then and maladies from day to day did rise
Among mankind, and those by night doe walke and creepe by stealth,
All secretly without cause knowne, and doe impeach mans health,
Uncala they come, in silence deepe they make not any noise,
For Jupiter in wisdom great, bereft them all of voice.

To these sayings and sentences the comicall poet according well, as touching those who torment themselves by occasion of such misfortunes when they happen, writeth thus,

If teares could cure and heale all our disease,
Or weeping stay at once our paine and griefe,
We would our gold exchange for teares, so ease
Our maladies, and so procure reliefe:
But (Master) now teares with them beare no sway,
Nor ought prevayle, for weepe we, or weepe not,
They hold their course, and still keepe on their way,
So that we see by plaints nothing is got;
What gaine we then? nought, for yet give me ease,
Griefe brings forth teares, as trees their fruite doe beare.

And Dyctis when he comforted Danaë, who sorrowed overmuch for the death of her sonne, spake unto her in this manner;

Thinke you that Pluto doth your teares regard,
And will for sighes and grones your sonne back send?
No, no, cease you to sob and weepe so hard,
Your neighbours ease marke rather and intend:
Harts ease will come, if that you call to minde,
How many men have died in dungeon deepe?
Or waxen old, bereft of children kind,

for the death of his sonne.

Or princely state and port who could nor keepe,
But fell to base degree; consider this,
And make right use, it will you helpe in this.

He giveth her counsell to consider the examples of those who have beene more or lesse unfortunate then herselfe, as if the comparing of their condition might serve her turne very well, the better to endure her owne calamitie. And heere to may a man very pertinently draw and applie the saying of Socrates, who was of opinion; that if we laid foorth all our adversities and misfortunes in one common heape, with this condition, that each one should carrie out of it an equal portion; most men would wish and be glad to take up their owne and goe away with all. The poet Antimachus also used the like induction, after that his wife whom he loved so entirely, was departed; for whereas her name was Lyde, he for his owne consolation in that sorrow of his, composed an Elegie or lamentable dittie, which he called Lyde: wherein he collected all the calamities and misfortunes which hapned in old time to great princes and kings, making his owne colour and griefe the lesse, by comparing it with other miseries more greivous: whereby it is apparent, that he who comforteth another, whose heart is afflicted with sorrow and anguish, (giving him to understand that his infortunie is common to more besides him, by laying before his face the semblable accidents which have befallen to others,) changeth in him the sense and opinion of his owne greivance, and imprinteth in him a certeine settled perswasion, that his infortune is nothing so great as he deemed it to be before.

20 Aeschylus likewise seemeth with very great reason to reprove those who imagine that death is naught, saying in this wise:

How wrongfully have men death in disdaine,
Of many evils the remedie soveraigne.

For in imitation of him, right well said he whosoever was the authour of this sentence:

Come death to cure my painfull malady,
The onely leech that bringeth remedy;
For hell is th' haven for worlds calamity,
And harbour sure in all extremity.

And verily, a great matter it is, to be able for to say boldly and with confidence:

How can he be a slave justlie,
Who careth not at all to die?

As also:

If death me helpe in my hard plighe,
No spirits nor ghosts shall me affright.

For what hurt is there in death? and what is it that should so trouble and molest us when we die? A strange case this is, & I can not see how it cometh to passe, that being so well knowne, so ordinarily, familiar & naturall unto us as it is, yet it should seeme so painfull & dolorous unto us. For what wonder is it, if that be slit or cut, which naturally is given to cleave? if that melt, which is apt to be molten? if that burne, which is subject to take fire? or if that perish & rot, which by nature is corruptible? and when is it that death is not in our selves? for (according as Heraclitus saith) quicke and dead is all one; to awake and to sleepe, is the same; in yong and olde, there is no difference; considering that these things turne one into another, and as one passeth, the other cometh in place: much after the maner of an imager or potter, who of one masse of clay, is able to give the forme and shape of living creatures, and to turne the same into a rude lump, as it was before; he can fashion it againe at his pleasure, and confound all together, as he list: thus it lieth in his power, to do and undoe, to make and marre, as often as he will, one after another, unceasingly; semblably, nature of the selfe-same matter, framed in times past our ancestors and grandsires, and consequently, afterwards brought forth our fathers; then she made us; and in proesse of time, will of us ingender others; and so proceed still to farther posterities; in such sort, that as the current (as it were) of our generation will never stay, so the streame also of our corruption will run on still, and be perpetuall; whether it be the river Acheron or Cocytus, as the Poets call them; whereof, the one signifyeth, privation of joy, & the other betokeneth lamentation. And even so, that first and principall cause which made us to live and see the light of the sunne, the same bringeth us to death and to the darkenesse of hell. And hereof we may see an evident demonstration and resemblance, by the very aire that compasseth us round about, which in alternative course and by turnes, representeth unto us the day, and afterwards the night; it induceth us to a similitude of life and death, of waking and sleeping: and therefore, by good right is life called, a fatall debt, which we must duely satisfie, and be acquit of: for our forefathers entred into it first; and we are to repay it willingly, without grumbling, sighing and groaning, whensoever the creditor calleth for it; unless we would be reputed unthankfull and unjust. And verily, I beleeve that nature seeing the uncertainty and shortnesse of our life, would that the end thereof and the prefixed houre of death should be hidden from us, for that shee knew it good & expedient for us so to be; for if it had bene fore-knownen of us, some (no doubt) would have languished and fallen away before, with griefe and sorrow; dead they would have bene before their death came. Consider now the troubles and sorrowes of this life; how many cares and crosses it is subject unto: certes, if wee went about to reckon and number them, wee would condemne it as most unliappie, yea, we would verifie and approvee that strong opinion 10 which some have held: That it were farre better for a man to die than to live; and therefore said the Poet Simonides:

*Full feeble is all humane puissance:
Vaine is our care and painfull vigilance:
Mans life is even a short passage,
Paine upon paine is his arrivage:
And then comes death that spareth none,
So fierce, so cruel, without pardone:
Over our heads is doth depend,
And threats alikethose that doe spend
Their yeeres in vertue and goodnesse,
As in all sinne and wickednesse.*

Likewise Pindarus:

*For blessing one which men obtaine,
The gods ordaine them curses twaine.
And those they can not wisely beare,
Foolles as they be, and will not beare.*

Or thus:

*They can not reach to life immortal,
Nor yet endure that which is mortall.*

And Sophocles:

*Of mortall men when one is dead,
Doth thine heart groane, and eie reares head;
Not knowing once what future gaine
May come to him, devoid of paine?*

As for Euripides, thus he saith:

*In all thy knowledge, canst thou find
The true condition of mankind?
I thinke well, No: For whence should come Such knowledge deepe, to all or some?
Give eare, and thou shalt learne of me
The skill thereof, in veritie:
All men ordain'd are once to die,
The debt is due, and paid must be:
But no man know's if morrow next,
Unto his daies shall be annex:
And whither fortune bend's her way,
Who can fore-see, and justly say?*

If it be so then, that the condition of mans life is such indeed as these great clearks have delivered and described unto us; is it not more reason to repute them blessed and happy, who are freed 50 from that servitude which they were subject to therein, than to deplore and lament their estate, as the most part of men doe, through follie and ignorance? Wise Socrates said, that death resembled for all the world, either a most deepe and sound sleepe, or a voyage farre remote into forraigne parts, in which a man is long absent from his native countrey; or else thirdly, an utter abolition and finall dissolution both of soule and bodie. Now take which of these three you will, according to him, there is no harme at all in death: for thus he discoursed through them well, and beginning at the first, in this wise he reasoneth: If death (quoth he) be a kinde of sleepe, and those that sleepe feele no ill; we must needs confesse likewise, that the dead have no sence at all of harme: neither is it necessarie to goe in hand to proove, that the deepest sleepe is also the sweetest, and most pleasant; for the thing it selfe is plaine and evident to all the world. To saie nothing of Homer's testimony, who speaking of sleepe writeth thus:

*Most sweetly doth a man sleepe in his bed,
When least he wakes, and seemes most to be dead.*

The same he iterateth in many places; and namely once in this wise:

*With pleasant sleepe she there did meet,
Deaths brother germain, you may meet.*

And againe:

10 *Death and sleepe are sister and brother,
Both twines resembling one another.*

Where by the way, he lively declareth their similitude, and calling them twins; for that brothers and sisters twines, for the most part be very like: and in another place besides, he calleth death a brazen sleepe; giving us thereby to understand, how senselesse death is: neither seemeth he unelegantly and besides the purpose, whosoever he was, to have expressed as much in this verse when he said:

*That sleeper (who doth them well advise)
Of death are pettie mysteries.*

20 And in very deed, sleepe doth represent (as it were) a preamble, inducement, or first profession toward death: in like manner also the cynick philosopher Diogenes said very wisely to this point, for being surprised and overtaken with a dead sleepe, a little before he yeelded up the ghost, when the physician wakened him, and demanded what extraordinary symptome or grievous accident was befallen unto him? None (quoth he) onely one brother is come before another, to wit, sleepe before death: and thus much of the first resemblance.

Now if death be like unto a farre journey or long pilgrimage, yet even so, there is no evil at all therein, but rather good, which is cleane contrary: for to be in servitude no longer unto the flesh, nor enthrall'd to the passions thereof; which seizing upon the soule, doe impeach the same, and fill it with all follies and mortall vanities, is no doubt a great blessednesse and felicitie: for as Plato saith: The body bringeth upon us an infinit number of troubles and hindrances about the necessarie maintenance of it selfe; and in case there be any maladies besides, they divert and turne us cleane away from the inquisition and contemplation of the truth; and in stead thereof, pester and stuffe us full of wanton loves, of lusts, feares, foolish fantasies, imaginations and vanities of all sorts; insomuch, as it is most true which is commonly saide: That from the bodie there commeth no goodnesse nor wisedome at all. For what else bringeth upon us warres, seditions, battels and fights, but the bodie and the greedie appetites and lusts proceeding from it; for to say a truth, from whence arise all warres, but from the covetous desire of money, and having more goods? neither are we driven to purchase and gather still; but onely for to entertaine the bodie, and serve the turne thereof; and whiles we are amused & 30 ploied thereabout, we have no time to studie Philosophie: finally (which is the worst and very extremitie of all) in case we find some leisure to follow our booke, and enter into the studie and contemplation of things, this body of ours at all times & in every place is ready to interrupt and put us out; it troubleth, it impeacheth and so disquieteth us, that impossible it is to attaine unto the perfect fight and knowledge of the truth; whereby it is apparent and manifest, that if ever we would cleerely and purely know any thing, we ought to be sequestred and delivered from this bodie; and by the eyes onely of the mind, contemplate & view things as they besten shall we have that which we desire and wish; then shall we attaine to that which we say we love, to wit, wisedome, even when we are dead, as reason teacheth us, and not so long as we remaine alive: for if it cannot be, that together with the bodie we should know any thing purely; one of these 50 two things must of necessitie ensue, that either never at all, or else after death we should attaine unto that knowledge; for then and not before, the soule shall be apart, and separate from the bodie; and during our life time, so much neerer shall we be unto this knowledge, by how much lesse we participate with the body, and have little or nothing to doe therewith, no more than very necessitie doth require; nor be filled with the corrupt nature thereof, but pure and neat from all such contagion, untill such time as God himselfe free us quite from it; and then being fully cleered and delivered from all fleshly and bodily follies, we shall converse with them and such like pure intelligences, seeing evidently of our selves all that which is pure and sincere, to wit,

As also this:

Now dead are they who neuer thought,
That life or death were simply ought:
But all their care was for to dy
And live, as they should, honestly.

Right excellent also are those verses of Euripides, as touching them who endure long maladies:

I hate all those by meat and drink,
Who to prolong their daies doe think:
By Magick arte and sorcery,
The course of death who turne awry.
Where as they should be glad and faine,
When as they see it is but vaine
Of earth to live upon the face,
For younger then to quit the place.

As for Merope in pronouncing these manlike and magnanimous words, she mooveth the whole theater to this consideration of her speeches, when she saith;

I am not th'only mother left,
Who of faire children am bereft;
Nor yet a widow am I alone,
Who my deere husband have for gone:
For others infinite there bee,
Who have felt like calamitee.

Unto this, a man may very aptly adjoine these verses also:

What is become of that magnificence?
Where is king Cræsus with his opulence?
Or Xerxes, he whose monstrous worke it was,
By bridge, the firth of Hellespont to pass?
To Pluto now they are for ever gon,
To howles of most deepe oblivion.

Their goods, and their wealth, together with their bodies are perished; howbeit, beleeve me, some will say; many are mooved perforce to weepe and lament, when they see a young person die before due time; and yet I assure you, this hastie and untimely death admitteth so readie consolation, that even the meanest and most vulgar comicall poets have seene into the thing, and devised good meanes, and effectfull reasons of comfort: for consider what one of them saith in this case, to him that mourned and lamented for the unripe and unseasonable death of a friend of his, in these words:

If thou hadst knowne for certaine, that thy friend
Who now is dead, should have bene blessed ay,
Throughout that course of life which was behind,
In case the gods had said his dying day:
His death had bene untimely, I would say,
But if long life, should bring him griefes incurable,
To him haply was death, than now more favorable.

Seeing then uncertaine it is whether the issue and end of this life will be expedient unto a mans and whether he shall be delivered and excused thereby from greater evils, or no; we ought not to take ones death so heavilie, as if we had utterly lost all those things which we hoped for, and promised our selves by his life to enjoy; and therefore me thinks that Amphiaras in a certaine tragedy of a poet, did not impertinently and without good purpose, comfort the mother of Archemorus, who took it to the heart, and grieved excessively, that her sonne a young infant died so long before the ordinarie time: for thus he saith unto her:

No man there is of womans body born,
But in his daies much travell he doth beare:
Children some die the parents long before,
And are by them enterred: then they reare
And get young babes, for those that buried were:
Lastly, themselves into the graves doe fall,
This is the course, this is the end of all.

Yet men for them doe weepe and sorrow make,
Whose bodies they on biers to earth doe send,
Although in truth a way direct they take,
As eares of corne full ripe, which downward bend,
As some begin, so others make an end.
Why should men grieve and sigh at natures lore?
What must, shall be, thinke it not hard therefore.

In summe, every man ought both in meditation within himselfe, and in earnest discourse also with others, to hold this for certaine; that the longest life is not best, but rather the most vertuous: for neither he that plaith most upon a lute or citterne, is commended for the cunningest musician; no more than he who pleadeth longest, is held the most eloquent orator; nor he that fitteth continually at the helme, is praised for the best pilot; but they that doe best, deserve the greatest commendation: for we are not to measure goodnesse by the length of time, but by vertue, by convenient proportion and measure of all words and deeds: for this is that amiable beauntie which is esteemed happie in this world, and pleasing to the gods: which is the reason that the poets have left unto us in writing, that the most excellent worthies or demie gods, and such (as by their saying) were begotten by gods, changed this their mortal life, and departed before they were old: for even * he * Amphiaras.

Who was of mightie Jupiter, and Phæbus loved best,
Permitted was not long to live, and in old age to rest.

For this we alwaies see, that ordinarily the maturitie of yeeres, and the same well employed, is preferred before old age and long life: for thus we repute those trees and plants best, which in least time beare most fruit; as also those living creatures which in little space yeeld greatest profit and commodity to mans life: furthermore, little difference you shall finde betweene short time and long, in comparison of eternitie; for that a thousand, yea and ten thousand yeeres according to monides, are no more than a very prick, or rather the smallest indivisible portion of a prick, in respect of that which is infinit. We reade in histories that there be certaine living creatures about the land of Pontus, whose life is comprised within the compasse of one day; for in the morning they are bred, by noone they are in their vigor and at best, and in the evening they be old, and end their lives: would not these creatures thinke you, if they had the soule of man, and that use of reason which we have, feele the very same passions that we doe, if the like accidents befell unto them? certes, those that died before noone, would minister occasion of mourning and weeping; but such as continued all day long, should be reputed happy. Well, our life should be measured by vertue, and not by continuance of time; so that we are to esteem such exclamations as these, foolish and full of vanitie: Oh, great pittie, that he was taken waie so young; it ought not to have bene that he should die yet: and who is he that dare say? This or that ought? But many things else have bene, are, and shall be done hereafter, which some man might say, ought not to have beene done: howbeit, come we are not into this life for to prescribe lawes, but rather to obey those lawes which are decreed and set down already by the gods, who governe the world, and the ordinances of destinie and divine providence.

But to proceed, those who so much deplore & lament the dead, do they it for love of themselves, or for their sake who are departed? if in regard of their own selves, for that they find how they are deprived of some pleasure or profit, or els disappointed of support in their old age, which they hoped to receive by those who are departed: surely this were but a small occasion, & no honest pretence of lamentation; for that it seemeth they bewaile not the dead persons, but the losse of those commodities which they expected from them: but in case they grieve in the behalf of those that be gone out of this world, soone wil they shake off their sorrow, if they be perfwaded and beleeve, that after death they feele no ill; & obey they wil that ancient & wise sentence, which reacheth us to extend as much as we can all good things, but to draw in and restraîne those that be so ill: now if sorrow is to be counted good, we ought to augment and encrease the same as much as possibly we can; but if we acknowledge it (as it is indeed) to be naught, we are to thorten & diminish it, as much as we may, yea, & to abolish it quite, if it lie in our power: and that this may be easily effected, it appeereth by the precedent, of such a consolation as this: We reade that a certaine ancient Philosopher went upon a time to visit queene Atthis, who mourned & lamented much for a sonne of hers lately departed this life; & to her he used these or such like words: Madam, at what time as Jupiter dealt among the petie gods, goddes, & other heavenly wights, certaine honors and dignities, it chanced that dame Sorrow, was not present among the rest: but after that the distribution and dole was made, she also came in place and presented her selfe, craving of Jupiter, her part of honor as well as the other: Jupiter being thus driven to his shifts, for that he had divided and given away all before, not having any thing else to bestow, gave unto her the honor which is done unto those that be departed this life, to wit, teares, plaints, and lamentations: as other petie gods and goddesses therefore, love those who honor them and none else; even so (good lady). Sorrow (if you make not much of her, and give her divine honor) will not come neere unto you; but in case you worship and honor her dutifully with those prerogatives which be allotted unto her, to wit, weeping, wailing, and lamentations, she will affect and love you, she will haunt you, yea, she will alway minister matter unto you, that she may be continually honored by you. This device of the Philosopher, wonderfully wrought with the woman, and persuaded her in such sort, as she staid her plaints, gave over her weeping, and cast off all her sorrow.

In one word, a man may deale in this wife with one that is in sorrow, and demand of him: Whether art thou minded one day to cease this mourning, and make an end of piteous lamentation? or to persist still in afflicting and tormenting thy selfe as long as thou livest? for if thou continue all thy lifetime in this dolorous anguish, thou wilt procure and bring upon thy selfe perfect miserie & infelicitie in the highest degree, through thy effeminate softnesse and feebleness of heart; but if thou meanest at the length to change this fit, and to lay all mourning aside, why dost not thou beginne betimes, and resolve out of hand, to be delivered from this miserie at once? for looke what reasons and meanes thou art to use hereafter, for to be freed from these paines and perplexities; by the helpe of the same thou maiest presently be quit of this unhappy plight and state wherein thou art. And as it fareth in our bodies, the sooner that wee ridde away the crasse indispositions and malaises thereof, the better it is for us; even so it is in the difficulties and passions of the soule: that therefore, which thou art minded and disposed to yeeld unto long time, give forthwith unto reason, unto literature and knowledge; discharge thy selfe (I say, and that with speed) of these calamities which now environ and compass thee round about. But haply you will say, I never thought that this would have befallen unto me, neither did I so much as doubt any such thing: yea, but you ought to cast doubts afore-hand; you should long time before have considered and meditated of the vanitie, weakenesse and instability of mans affaires; by which meanes you had not bene surpris'd as you are, nor taken so unprovoked, as by some sudden incursion of enemies. Very well and wisely therefore it seemeth, that noble Theſeus in Euripides, was prepared and armed against all such accidents of fortune, when he thus said:

*According as a wife man once me taught,
I did in minde all wiferies forecast;
And namely, how I might be overcaught
With bitter spight; and not to sit so fast
In native soile, but forc't to lie at last:
Untimely death of wife, of child, of friend,
How soone might hap, full crasse unto my minde.
In summe, I did misfortunes manifolde Esiſsoones propoſe and set before mine eyes,
To th' end that I acquainted thus of olde
With such fore-casts, might soone learne to deſpiſe,
And ſet nought by aduerſe calamities:
For no miſchance, or fortune overt'hwart,
Could now be ſtrange, and nip me to the hart.*

But those who are effeminate, bale-minded, and not exercised before-hand in such premeditations, never plucke up their spirits, nor let their mindes to deliberate and consult as touching any honest or profitable course; but suffer themselves to breake out into extremities and miseries remediless, afflicting and punishing their harmelesse bodies, and as Alcena was wont to say, forcing them to be sicke with them for companie, which ailed nought before. And therefore Plato (in my conceit) gave a very wise admonition: That in such casualties and mischances as these, we should be quiet; aswell, for that it is uncerteine whether it be good or ill for them whose death we seeme to lament; as also, because there can no good ensue unto us by such pensiveness and sorrow: for this is certeine: That as sage consultation in a mans selfe (as touching that which is hapned already) doth remove sorrow; so griefe impeacheth wise counsell, which would would have a man to employ and accommodate all his affaires and occurrences the best way he can; like as in playing at the tables, to dispose so of his cast and chance whatsoever, as may most serve to win the game.

If the our hap therefore, to stumble and catch a fall, by the crooked aspect of aduerse fortune, we must not doe as little children, who laying their hands upon that part which is hurt, fall a pulling or setting up a crie; but apply our minds presently to seeke for remedie; to set that upright, which is fallen; to rectifie that which is out of frame, by helpe of good medicines; and in one word, to put away all moanes and lamentations.

Certes, it is reported, that he (whosoever he was) that set downe lawes and statutes to the Egyptians, ordeined expressly: That whensoever they were disposed to mourne and lament, they should be araid in womans apparell; as giving them thereby to understand, that to weepe and waile, was but a feminine and servile passion, nothing at all befitting grave persons, well descended, or honestly brought up: for (to say a trueth) to weepe and waile thus, is meete womanish, and bewaith a base and abject minde: and like as women ordinarily be more prone and forward thereto than men; so Barbarians rather than Greeks; and the woofe sort of people are given thereto more than the better: also, if you goe thorow all barbarous nations, you shall not finde those who are most haughtie-minded and magnanimous, or cary any generositie of spirit in them, such as be the Almans or Gaules addicted hereunto; but Aegyptians, Syrians, Lydians, and such other; for some of these (by report) use to go downe into hollow caves within the ground, and there hide themselves for many daies together, and not so much as see the light of the sunne, because (forsooth) the dead partie whom they mourne for, is deprived thereof. In which regard, Ion the Tragicall Poet having (as it should seeme) heard of such fooleries, bringeth in upon the stage, a woman speaking in this wise:

*Come forth am I, now at the last,
Your nurse and childrens governeſſe,
Out of deepe caves, where some daies paſt,
I kept in balefull heavineſſe.*

Others there be also of these Barbarians, who cut away some parts, and dismember themselves, lit their owne noses, crop their eares, misuse & disfigure the rest of their bodies, thinking to gratifie the dead in doing thus, if they seeme to exceed all measure, & that moderation which is according to nature. There are besides, who reply upon us and say: That they thinke we ought not to waile and lament for every kind of death, but onely in regard of those that die before their time; for that they have not as yet tasted of those things which are esteemed blessings in this life, to wit, the joys of marriage, the benefit of literature and learning, the perfection of yeeres, the management of common weale, honors and dignities; for these be the points that they stand upon, and grieve most who lose their friends or children by untimely death, for that they be disappointed and frustrate of their hopes before the time; ignorant altogether that this hastie and over speedie death, in regard of humane nature, differeth nothing at all from others: for like as in the returne to our common native country, which is necessarily imposed upon all, and from which no man is exempted, some march before, others follow after, and all at length meet at one and the same place; even so in traveling this journey of fatall destinie, those that arrive late thither, gaine no more advantage than they who are thither come betime: now if any untimely or hastie death were naught simply, that of little babes and infants that sucke the breast, and cannot speake, or rather such as be newly borne were woofe; and yet their death we beare verie well and patiently, whereas we take their departure more heavily, and to the heart, who are grown to some good yeeres, and all through the vanitie of our foolish hopes; where-by we imagine and promise to our selves assuredly, that those who have proceeded thus farre, be past the woofe, and are like to continue thus, in a good and certaine estate. If then the prefixed terme of mans life were the end of twentie yeeres, certes, him that came to be fiftene yeeres old we would not judge unripe for death, but thinke that he had attained to a competent age; and as for him who had accomplished the full time of twentie yeeres, or approached neere thereto we would account him absolute happy, as having performed a most blessed and perfect life: but if the course of our life reached out to two hundred yeeres, he who chanced to die at one hundred yeeres end, would be thought by us to have died too soone; and no doubt his untimely death we would bewaile and lament. By these reasons therefore, and those which heretofore we have alledged, it is apparent, that even the death which we call untimely, soone admitteth consolation, and a man may beare it patiently; for this is certaine, that Trullus would have wept lesse; yea even Priamus himselfe, shed fewer teares, in case he had died sooner; at what time as the kingdome of Troy flourished, or whiles himselfe was in that wealthy estate; for which he lamented so much; which a man may evidently gather by the words which he gave to his sonne Hector, when he admonished and exhorted him to retire from the combat which he had with Achilles in these verses:

Returne my sonne within these wals that thou from death maist save
The Trojan men and women both, let not Achilles have
Of thee that honour, as thy life so sweet to take away,
By victorie in single fight, and hast thy dying day:
Have pittie yet my sonne of me, thy wofull aged sire,
Ever that my wits and senses faile, whom Jupiter in ire
Will else one day at the end of this my old and wretched yeeres, Consume with miserable death, out-worne and spent with teeres.
As having many objects seene, of sorrow and hearts grieve;
My sonnes cut short by edge of sword, who should be my reliefe;
My daughters trait d'by haire of head, and ravisht in my sight;
My pallace rae'd, their chambers sacket, wherein I tooke delight:
And sucking babes from mothers breasts pluckt, and their braines dislit out Against the stones of pavment hard, lie sprawling all about:
When enemy with sword in hand, in heat of bloody heart
Shall hurvocke make: and then my selfe at last must play my part:
Whom when some one by dint of sword, or lance of dart from farr,
Hath quite bereft of vitall breath, the hungry dogs shall erre
About my corpes, and at my gates hale it and drag along, Gnawing the flesh of hoarie head, and gristled chin among,
Mingling besides the privie parts of me a man so old,
Unkindly laine, a spectacle most pitious to behold.
Thou shalt be aged father too, and pluckt from head above
His haire milke-white, but all these words, did Hector nothing move.

Seeing then, so many examples of this matter presented unto your eyes, you are to thinke and consider with your selfe, that death doth deliver and preserve many men from great & grievous calamities, into which without all doubt they should have fallen, if they had lived longer: But for to avoid prolixitie, I will omit the rest, & my selfe, with those that are related already, as being sufficient to proove & shew, that we ought not to breake out beside nature, and beyond measure into vaine sorrowes and needlesse lamentations, which bewray nothing else but base and feeble minds. Crantor the philosopher was wont to say: That to suffer adversitie causelesse, was no small easement to all sinister accidents of fortune: but I would rather say: That innocencie is the greatest and most soveraigne medicine to take away the sense of all dolour in adversitie: moreover, the love and affection that we beare unto one who is departed, consisteth not in afflicting and punishing our selves; but in doing good unto him so beloved of us: now the profit and pleasure that we are able to performe for them who are gone out of this world, is the honour that we give unto them by celebrating their good memorials; for no good man deserveth to be mourned and bewailed; but rather to be celebrated with praise and commendation: He is not woorthy of sorrow and lamentation, but of an honorable and glorious remembrance; he requirerh not teares as testimonials of griefe and dolour; but honest offerings, and civill oblations: if it be true, that he who is gone out of this world, doth partake a more divine and heavenly condition of life, as being delivered from the servitude of this bodie, and the infinit cares perplexities, and calamities which they must needs endure, who abide in this mortall life, untill such time as they have runne their race, and performed the prefixed course of this life, which nature hath not granted unto us for to be perpetual, but according to the lawes of fatall destiny hath given to every one in severall proportion. Such therefore as be wise and well minded, ought not in sorrow and griefe for their friends departed, to passe beyond the bounds and limits of nature, and in vaine plaints and barbarous lamentations forget a meane, and never know to make an end; expecting that which hath befallen to many before them, who have bene so far gone in heaviness and melancholie, that before they had done lamenting, they have finished their daies, and ere they could lay off the mourning habit for the funerals of others, they have bene ready themselves to be carried forth to their unhappy sepulture: in so much as the sorrowes which they

they entertained for the death of another, and the calamities proceeding from their owne folly, have bene buried together with them; so as a man might very well and truly say of them as Homer did:

While they their plaints and sorrowes made,
Darke night over-spread them with her shade.

And therefore in such case we are estoones thus to speake unto our selves, and reason in this manner: What? shall we make an end once? or rather never cease so long as we live? but still keepe a weeping and wailing as we do? for I assure you, to thinke that sorrow should never end, were a point of extreame folly, considering that often times we see even those, who of all others take on and fare most impatiently in their fits of griefe and heaviness, become (in proceesse of time) so well appeased, that even at those tombs and monuments where they piteously cried out and knocke their breasts, they meet afterwards solemnly to make magnificent feasts, with musick, minstrellie, and all the meanes of mirth that might be devised. It is the propertie therefore of a mad man and one bereft of his wits, to resolve and set downe with himselfe to dwell evermore in sorrow, and not to give it over: but if men thinke and reckon, that it will cease at length and passe away, by occasion of some thing that may occurre, let them call this withall, that space of time, will (after a sort) doe it: for that which once is done, can not by God himselfe be undone: and therefore that which now is hapned contrary to our hope and expectation, is a sufficient prooffe & demonstration of that which is wont to befall unto many others by the same meanes.

How then? is not this a thing that we are able to comprehend by learning and discourse of reason in nature? to wit:

The earth is full, and sea likewise,
Of sundrie evils and miseries.

As also:

Such mischiefs ay, and strange calamities,
Are daily one after another sent
To mortall men by fatall destinies;
The skie is selfe is not thereof exempt.

For not onely in these daies, but time out of minde, many men (and those of the wiser sort) have deplored the miseries of mankind, reputed life it selfe to be nothing els but punishment; and the verie beginning of mans birth and nativitie, to be no better than woe and miserie. And Aristotle saith: That even Silenus, when he was caught and taken captive, pronounced as much unto king Midas. But forasmuch as this matter maketh so well to our purpose, it were best to set downe the very words of the said Philosopher; for in his booke entituled Eudemus or Of the soule, thus he saith: Therefore (quoth he) O right excellent and of all men most fortunate, as we esteeme the dead to be blessed and happy, so we thinke that to make a lie or speake evil of them, is meer impietie, and an intolerable abuse offered unto them, as being now translated into a far better and more excellent condition than before: which opinion and custome in our countrey is so ancient and of such antiquitie, that no man living knoweth either the time when it first began, or the first authour thereof, who brought it in: but from all eternitie this custome hath bene among us observed for a law. Moreover, you know full well the old said law, that from time to time hath run currant in every mans mouth: And what is that? quoth he: then the other presently inferred this answer, and said: That simple it was best, not to be borne at all, and to die better than to live: and hereto have accorded and given testimonie, the very gods themselves, and namely, unto king Midas, who having in chase and hunting (upon a time) taken Silenus, demanded of him what was best for man? and what it was that a man should wish for and chuse above all things in the world? at the first he would make no answer, but kept silence, and gave not so much as a word, untill such time as Midas importuned and urged him by all means; so as at length (seeing himselfe compelled even against his will) he brake out into this speech, and said unto him: O generation of finall continuance! O feed of laborious and painfull destinie! O issue of fortune, wretched and miserable! why force you me to say that unto you, which it were better for you to be ignorant of? for that your life is lesse dolorous and irkelome, when it hath no knowledge at all of her owne calamities; but so it is, that men by no meanes can have that which simply is best, nor be partakers of that which is most excellent: for best it had bene for all men and women both, never to have bene borne at all; the next to it, and indeed the principall and chiefe of all those things that may be effected, (how ever in order it falleth out to be second) as to die immediately after one is borne. So that it appeareth plainly, that Silenus judged and pronounced the condition of the dead to be better than of the living. For the proofe of which conclusion, ten thousand sentences and examples there be, and ten thousand more upon the head of them, which may be alledged: but needlesse it were, to discourse farther of this point, and make more words thereof. Well then: we ought not to lament the death of yong folke, in this regard, that they be deprived of those blessings and benefites which men doe enjoy by long life: for uncereme it is (as we have shewed often times before) whether they be deprived of good things or delivered from bad; considering that in mans life there be faire more sorrowes than joies; and those (as few as they be) we get with much paines, great travell, and many cares; whereas calamities and evils come easily unto us; inso much (as some men say) they be round and united close, and following aptly one upon another; whereas good things be separate and disjointed, inso much as hardly they meet together at the very end of mans life: and therefore it seemeth that we forget our selves; for as Euripides saith:

Not onely worldly goods are not

Preper to us when they are got,

but not any thing els whatsoever; and therefore of all such things we are thus to say:

The gods have all in rightfull propertie,

And under them, as will we tenants be,

To hold ana use the faine, some more some lesse,

Untill they please us quite to dispossesse.

We ought not therefore to be grieved and discontented, if they redemand of us that which they have lent and put into our hands, onely for a little while; for even the banquers themselves (as we were wont oftentimes to say) are not displeased or offended when they be called unto or constrained to render and give up those stocks of money that have bene committed unto them, if they be honest men, and well minded: for a man may by good right say unto those who are unwilling to redeliver the same: Hast thou forgotten that thou didst receive these monies to repay againe? And the very same may be applied unto all mortall men: for we have our life at Gods hands, who upon a fatal necessity, have lent and left the same unto us; neither is there any time fore-set or prefixed, within which we ought to yeeld the same; no more than the foresaid banquers are limited to some appointed day, on which they are bound to deliver up those stocks of money which be put into their hands; but unknownen and uncerteine it is when they shall be called unto, for to render the same to the owners. He therefore who is exceeding much displeased, & angrie, when he perceiveth himselfe readie to die; or when his children have changed this life; is it not evident that he hath forgotten, both that himselfe is a man, and also that he begot children mortall? for surely it is no part of a man whose understanding is cleere and entire, to be ignorant in this point, namely that man is a mortall creature, or that he is borne upon this condition, once to die: and therefore if dame Niope, according as fables recount unto us, had bene alwaies furnished with this opinion and letled resolution; That

The floure of age she should not ate

Enjoy, nor children see alive;

About her fresh in number many,

To keepe her ever company:

Nor sweet sun-shine continuallie

Behold, untill that she must die.

she would never have fared so, and fallen into such despair, as to desire to be out of the world, for the unsupportable burden of her calamitie, and even to conjure the gods for to fetch her away, and plunge her into most horrible destructions. Two rules and precepts there are written in the temple of Apollo, at Delfos, which of all others be most necessarie for mans life: the one is; Know thy selfe; and the other; Too much of nothing: for of these twaine depend all other lessons, and these two accord and found very well together; for it seemeth that the one doth declare the other, and containe the force and efficacie one of the other; for in this rule; Know thy selfe, is comprised; Nothing too much: likewise in this, a man doth comprehend the knowledge of himselfe: and therefore Ten the poet speaking of these sentences, saith thus;

Know thy selfe; a word but short,

Implics a worke not quickly done,

Of all the gods and heavenly fort

None skils thereof but heavenly Jove alone.

And Pindarus writeth in this wise:

This sentence brieve: Nothing excessively, Wise men have prints & alwaies exceedingly.

Whoever therefore setteth alwaies before the eyes of his minde these two precepts, and holdeth them in such reverence as the oracles of Apollo deserve, he shall be able to apply them easily unto all the affaires and occurrents of humane life, and to beare all things modestly as it becometh, both having a regard to his owne nature, and also endeavouring neither to mount up too high with pride and vain-glorie, for any happy fortune that may befall, nor yet be dejected and cast downe beyond measure, to mourning and lamentation upon infirmities of fortune, or rather of the minde, or by reason of that inbred feare of death imprinted deeply in our hearts for want of knowledge and good consideration of that which is ordinary, and customably hapneth in mans life, either through necessity, or according to the decree of fatall destinie. No-table is that precept of the Pythagoreans:

What part thou hast of griefe and woe, which unto man is sent,

By hand of God, take well in woorth, and shew no discontent.

And the tragicall poet Aeschylus said very well:

Wise men and vertuous in all woe and distresse,

Against God will not murmur more or lesse.

As also Euripides:

The man who yeelds unto necessity,

Well skilled is in true divinitie:

And such we count, and not unworthily

To beare themselves among men most wisely.

And in another place:

Who knows the way, what ever doth befall

With patience meekely to suffer all;

In my conceit, he may be thought right well,

In vertue and wisdom all men to excell.

But contrariwise, most men in the world complaine and grumble at every thing; and whatsoever falleth out crosse and contrary to their hope and expectation, they imagine the same to proceed alwaies from the malignitie of fortune and the gods; which is the reason that in all accidents they weepe, waile, and lament; yea, and they blame their owne froward and adverse fortune: unto whom we may very well and with great reason reply in this manner:

No God it is, nor heavenly wight,

That works thy woe, and all this plight.

but even thine owne selfe, thy folly and error proceeding from ignorance: and upon this false persuasion and erroneous opinion it is, that these men complaine of all sorts of death; for if any of their friends chaunce to die in a forreine country, they fetch a deepe sigh in his behalfe, and cry out saying:

Alas poore wretch, woe's me for thee, that neither father shine,

Nor mother deere shall present be, to close thy sight-lesse eien.

Dieth he in his owne native soile, and in the presence of father and mother? they mourne and lament, for that being taken out of their hands, he hath left unto them nothing else behind, but a deepe impression of griefe, in seeing him die before their eyes: Is it his hap to depart out of this world in silence, and without giving any charge of ought concerning him or them? then they cry out againe, and breake forth into these words; as he did in Homer:

Alas the while, that no wise speech and lesson thoume gave,

Which while my breath and life doth last, I should remember have.

Again, if he delivered any words unto them at the houre of his death, they will evermore have the same in their mouthes to kindle anew and refresh their sorow: went he suddenly, and never bad his friends farewell, when he departed? they lament and say: That he was ravished away and forcibly taken from them: if he languished, and was long in dying, then they fall a complaining, and give out, that he consumed and pined away, enduring much paine before hee died: to be short, every occasion & circumstance whatsoever, is enough to stirre up their griefe, and minister matter to mainteine sorrowfull plaints. And who be they who have mooved and brought in all these querries and lamentations, but Poets, and even Homer himselfe, most of all other, who is the chiefe and prince of the rest, who in this manner writeth:

Like as a father, in the fire of wofull funerals,

Burning

*Burning the bones of his young sonne, soone after his espousals, Sheds many teares for griefe of minde, and weepeth bitterly:
The mother likewise (tender heart) bewailes him piteously.
Thus he by his untimely death, both parents miserable, Afflicts with sorrowes manifold, and woes inexplicable:*

But all this while it is not certaine whether it be well and rightly done, to make this sorrow; for see what followeth afterwards:

He was their only sonne, and borne to them in their olde age, Sole heire of all, and so to enjoy a goodly herit age.

And who knoweth, or is able to say, whether God in his heavenly providence and fatherly care of mankind, hath taken some out of the world by untimely death, foreseeing the calamities and miseries which otherwise would have happened unto them? and therefore we ought to thinke that nothing is befallen them which may be supposed odious or abominable:

*For nothing grievous thought may be,
Which cometh by necessity.*

Nothing (I say) that hapneth to man, either by primitive cause immediately, or by consequence, as well in this regard, that often times most kinds of death preserve men from more grievous adversities, and excuse them for greater miseries; as also for that it is expedient for some, never to have bene borne, and for others, to die in their very birth; for some, a little after they be entered into this life, and for others againe, when they are in their flower, and grown to the verie height and vigor of their age: all which sorts of death, in what manner soever they come, men are to take in good part, knowing that whatsoever proceedeth from fatall destinie, can not possibly be avoided; and besides, reason would, that being well taught and instructed, they should consider and premeditate with themselves, how those whom we thinke to have bene deprived of their life before their full maturitie, go before us but a little while; for even the longest life that is, can be esteemed but short, and no more than the very minute and point of time, in comparison of infinit eternitie: also, that many of them who mourned and lamented most, within a while have gone after those whom they bewailed, and gained nothing by their long sorrow; onely they have in vaine afflicted and tormented themselves: whereas, seeing the time of our pilgrimage here in this life is so exceeding short, we should not consume our selves with heavinesse and sadnesse, nor in most unhappie sorrow and miserable paines, even to the punishing of our poore bodies with injurious misusage; but endeavour and strive to take a better and more humane course of life, in conversing civilly with those persons who are not ready to be pensive with us, and fit to stirre up our sorrow and griefe after a flattering sort; but rather with such as are willing & meet to take away or diminish our heavinesse, with some generous and grave kinde of consolation: and we ought to have ever in minde these verses in Homer, which Heſtor by way of comfort delivered unto his wife Andromache, in this wise:

*Unhappy wight, do not my heart vexe and sollicit still,
For no man shorten shall my daies, before the heavenly will:
And this (I say) Andromache, that farall destinie,
No person good or bad, once borne, avoid can possibly.*

And of this fatall destinie the same Poet speaketh thus in another place:

*No sooner out of mothers wombe, are babes brought forth to light,
But destinie hath spun the thread for every mortall wight.*

These and such like reasons, if we would conceive and imprint before-hand in our mindes, we should be free from this foolish heavinesse, and delivered from all melancholy; and namely, considering how short is the terme of our life betwene birth and death, which we ought therefore to spare and make much of, that we may passe the same in tranquillitie, and not interrupt it with carking cares and dolefull dumps, but laying aside the marks and habits of heavinesse, have a regard both to cheerish our owne bodies, and also to procure and promote the welfare and good of those who live with us. Moreover, it will not be amisse to call to minde and remember those arguments and reasons, which by great likelihood wee have sometime used to our kinnefolke and friends, when they were afflicted with like calamities, when as by way of consolation we exhorted and perswaded them to beare the common accidents of this life with a common course of patience, and humane cases, humanely. Neither must we shew our selves so far short and faultie, as to have bene sufficiently furnished for to appeale the sorrow of others, and not be able by the remembrance of such comforts, to do our selves good: we ought therefore presently ly to cure the anguish of our heart with the soveraign remedies and medicinable drogues (as it were) of reason; and so much the sooner, by how much better we may admit delay in any thing els than in discharging the heart of griefe and melancholie: for whereas the common proverbe and by-word in every mans mouth, pronounceth thus much:

Who loves delays, and his time for to slacke, Lives by the losse, and shall no sorrowes lacke.

Much more damage (I suppose) he shall receive, who deferreth and putteth off from day to day to be discharged of the grievous and adverse passions of the minde. A man therefore is to turne his eies toward those worthy personages who have shewed themselves magnanimous and 10 of great generosities in bearing the death of their children: as for example, Anaxagoras the Clazomenian, Pericles and Demosthenes of Athens, Dion the Syracusan, and king Antigonus, besides many others, both in these daies and also in times past: of whom, Anaxagoras (as we read in historie) having heard of his sonnes death by one who brought him newes thereof, even at what time as he was disputing in naturall philosophie, and discoursing among his scholars and disciples, paused a while, and staied the course of his speech, and said no more but thus unto those who were about him: Well I wist that I begat my sonne to be a mortall man. And Pericles who for his passing eloquence and excellent wisdom, was furnamed Olympius, that is to say, divine and heavenly; when tidings came to him that his two sonnes Paralus and Xanthippus had both changed this life, behaved himselfe in this manner as Protagoras reporteth of him in these words: When his two sonnes (quoth he) both young and beautifull, died within eight 20 daies, one after the other; he never shewed any sad countenance or heavie cheere, but tooke their death most patiently: for in truth he was a man at all times furnished with tranquillitie of spirit, whereby he daily received great frute and commoditie; not onely in respect of this happinesse, that he never tasted of hearts griefe; but also in that he was better reputed among the people; for every man seeing him thus stoutly to take this losse and other the like crosses, esteemed him valiant, magnanimous, and of better courage than himselfe; the one being privie to his owne heart, how he was wont to be troubled and afflicted in such accidents: As for Pericles I say, immediately after the report of both his sons departure out of this world, he ware a chaplet of Floures nevertheless upon his head, after the manner of his country, put on a white 30 robe, made a solemne oration to the people, propounded good and sage counsels to the Athenians, & incited them to war. Semblably Xenophon one of the followers & familiars of Socrates; when he offered sacrifice one day unto the gods, being advertised by certaine messengers returned from the battell, that his sonne Gryllus was slaine in fight; presently put off the garland which was upon his head, and demanded of them the manner of his death; and when they related unto him that he bare himselfe valiantly in the field, and fighting manfully lost his life, after he had the killing of many enemies; he tooke no longer pause for to repress the passion of his mind by the discourse of reason, but after a little while, set the coronet of flowers againe upon his head, and performed the solemnitie of sacrifice; saying unto those who had brought those tidings; I never praied unto the gods that my sonne should be either immortal, or long lived, 40 for who knoweth whether this might be expedient or no? but this rather was my praier, that they would vouchsafe him the grace to be a good man, and to love and serve his countrey well, the which is now come to passe accordingly. Dion likewise the Syracusan, when he was set one day in consultation, and devising with his friends, hearing a great noise within his house, and a loud outcry, demanded what it was? and when he heard the mischaunce that hapned; to wit, that a sonne of his was fallen from the top of the house, and dead with the fall; without any shew or signe at all of astonishment or trouble of mind, he commanded that the breathlesse corps should be delivered unto women, for to be interred according to the manner of the countrey; and as for himselfe, he held on and continued the speech that hee had begun unto his friends. Demosthenes also the orator is reported to have followed his steps; after he had buried 50 his onely and entirely beloved daughter, concerning whom, Aeschines thinking in reprochfull wise to challenge her father, said thus: This man within a seven night after his daughter was departed, before that he had mourned or performed the due obsequies according to the accustomed manner; being crowned with a chaplet of flowers, and putting on white robes, sacrificed an ox unto the gods, and thus unnaturally he made no reckoning of her that was dead, his onely daughter, and the that first called him father, wicked wretch that he is: this Rhetorician thus intending to accuse and reproch Demosthenes, used this manner of speech, never thinking that in blaming him after this manner he praised him, namely, in that hee rejected and cast behind him all mourning, and shewed that he regarded the love unto his native countrey, more than the naturall affection and compassion to those of his owne blood. As for king Anrigonus, when he heard of the death of his sonne Alcyonem, who was slaine in a battell, he beheld the messengers of these wofull tidings, with a constant and undaunted countenance; but after he had mused a while with silence, and held down his head, he uttered these words: O Alcyonem, thou hast lost thy life later than I looked for, ventring thy selfe to resolutely as thou hast done among thine enemies, without any care of thine owne safetie, or respect of my admonitions. These noble personages, there is no man but doth admire and highly regard for their constance & magnanimitie; but when it cometh to the point and trial indeed, they cannot imitate them through the weakenesse and imbecillitie of mind, which proceedeth of ignorance, and want of good instructions: howbeit, there be many examples of those who have right nobly and virtuously caried themselves in the death and losse of their friends and neere kinsmen which we may reade in histories, as well Greeke as Latin; but those that I have rehearsed already may suffice (I suppose) to moove you for to lay away this most irksome mourning, and vaine sorrow that you take, which booteth not, nor can serve to any good: for that young men of excellent vertue, who die in their youth, are in the grace and favour of the gods, for being taken away in their best time, I have already shewed heerebefore, and now also will I addressse my selfe in this place as briefly, as possibly I can to discourse, giving testimonie of the truth to this notable wise sentence of Menander:

*To whom the gods vouchsafe their love and grace,
He lives not long but soone hath runne his race.*

But peradventure (my most loving and right deere friend) you may reply in this manner upon me: Namely, that young Apollonius your sonne, enjoied the world at will, and had all things to his hearts desire; yea, and more besittng it was, that you should have departed out of this life, and bene entered by him, who was now in the flower of his age, which had bene more answerable to our nature, and according to the course of humanitie. True it is I confesse, but haply not agreeable to that heavenly providence and government of this universall world: and verily in regard of him who is now in a blessed estate, it was not naturall for him to remaine in this life longer than the terme prefixed and limited unto him; but after he had honestly performed the course of his time, it was new full and requisite for him to take the way for to returne unto his destinie that called for him to come unto her: but you will say, that he died an untimely death; true, and so much the happier he is, in that he hath felt no more miseries of this life: for as Empidius said very well:

*That which by name of life we call,

Certes, this sonne of yours (I must needs say) is soone gone, and in the very best of his yeeres and flower of his age, a young man in all points entire and perfect, a fresh bachelor, affected, esteemed and well reputed of all those who kept him companie, loving to his father, kinde to his mother, affectionate to his kinsfolke and friends, studious of good literature, and (to say all in a word) a lover of all men; respecting with reverence (no lesse than fathers) those friends, who were elder than himselfe, making much of his equals and familiars, honoring those who were his teachers; to strangers as well as to citizens most civill and courteous; gracious and pleasant to all; generally beloved, as well for his sweet attractive countenance, as his lovely affabilitie. All this (I confesse) is most true; but you ought to consider and take this withall: That he is translated before us in very good time out of this mortall and transitorie life into everlasting eternitie, carrying with him the generall praise and blessed acclamation of all men for his pietie and observance toward you, as also for your fatherly regard of him; and departed he is as from some banquet, before he is fallen into drunkenesse and follie, which hee could not have eschewed, but it would have ensued upon olde age: and if the saying of ancient Poets and Philosophers be true, as it seemeth verily to be, namely: That good men and those that devoutly serve God, whensoever they die, have honour and preferment in the other world, and a place allotted them apart, where their soules abide and converse; surely you are greatly to hope very well, that your sonne is canonized and placed in the number of those blessed saints; concerning the state of which happie wights deceased, Pindarus the Lyricke Poet, writeth in his canticles after this manner:

*When we have here the shade night,
The shining sunne to them gives light:
The meadowes by their citie side*

With

*With roses red are beautified,
Shaded with trees which please the sense,
With golden fruits and sweet incense:
Some, horses ride for exercise,
Disporting in most comely wise;
Others delight in harmonic,
In musike and in symphonie.
They live where plenty everie houre
Of all delights doth freshly flowe;
Where altars of the gods do smoke
In every coast with sweet perfume,
Of odors all most redolent,
Burning in fire faire resplendent,
Which is mainteind continually:

And a little after he proceedeth to another lamentable dittie, wherein speaking of the soule, he uttereth these words:

*Happie is their condition,
Whom death from all vexation
Exempted hath: all bodies die
Perforce, there is no remedie:
The soule, of perperitie
The image, from divinitie
Onely deriv'd, doth live alway,
And is not knowne for to decay:
Whiles limmes to wake and worke are prest,
She takes her sleepe and quiet rest,
And doth by many dreames present
To those who sleepe, * her owne judgement,
As well of things which her displease,
As of such as do her well please.*

Or thus:

\ the due judgement,
As well for vertuous deeds well done,
As for foule facts which be misdone.*

And as for that divine Philosopher Plato, he hath disputed much, and alledged many reasons in his * treatise of the soule, as touching the immortalitie thereof, like as in his books of policie, in the dialogue intituled Menon, in that also which beareth the name of Gorgias, and in divers places of many others: But as concerning those discourses which he hath expressly made in his dialogue, I will give you an extract thereof apart by it selfe, according to your request; and for this present I will deliver those points which are to the purpose, and expedient to the matter in hand, to wit, what Socrates said to Callicles the Athenian, a familiar friend and scholar of Gorgias the Rhetorician. Thus therefore saith Socrates in Plato: Give care then, and listen unto a most elegant speech, which you (I suppose) will thinke to be a meere fable or tale, but I esteeme an undoubted truth, and as a true report I will relate it unto you: So it was, that (according to the narration of Homer) Jupiter, Neptune and Pluto, parted betweene themselves, the empire which fell unto them from their father: now this law there was concerning men, during the reigne of Saturne (which also stood in force time out of minde, and remaineth even at this day among the gods) That looke what man soever lead a just & holy life, after his death he should take his way directly to certain fortunate islands, there to remain in blisse & happinesse, freed from all misery and infelicitie; but contrariwise, he that lived unjustly, without feare and reverence of the gods, should goe to a certaine prison of justice and punishment, named Tartarus, that is to say, Hell: now the judges who sat judiciously, and gave their doome of such persons, as well in Saturnes daies, as in the beginning also of the reigne of Jupiter, were those men alive, who gave sentence and judgement of other men living, even upon that very day wherein they were to depart this life: by reason whereof there passed many judgements, not good, until such time as Plato & other procurators or superintendents of those fortunate Isles came and made report unto Jupiter, that

there were thither sent such persons as were not worthy. Unto whom Jupiter made this answer: I will take order from henceforth, and provide that it shall be so no more: for the cause of this disorder and abuse in judgement is this; that they who are to be tried, come clad and arrayed unto the barre, for to receive their doome, whiles they are yet living; yea, & many of them haply having sithie soules, are apparelled (as it were) with faire and beautifull bodies, with nobilitie of birth and parentage, yea, and adorned with riches; and whiles they stand before the tribunal to be judged, many there be who come to depose and give testimonie in their behalfe, that they lived well: the judges therefore (being dazzeled and amazed with these witnesss and depositions, being themselves also likewise arrayed) do give sentence, having before, their minds, their eyes, eares, teeth, and whole bodie covered; no marvell therefore if these be impediments to impeach sound and sincere judgement, to wit, as well their owne vesture, as the raiment of the judges. First and foremost therefore, good heed would be had, that men may know no more before hand the houre of their death; for now they foresee the terme and end of life: whereupon let Promethus have first in charge, that from henceforth men may have no fore-knowledge of their dying day; and then all judgements hereafter shall passe indifferently of them that be all naked. For which purpose it were requisite that they be all first dead, as well the parties in question, as the judges themselves; so that they come to heare causes and sit in judgement with their soules onely, upon the soules likewise of those who are departed; even so soone as they are separated from the bodies, being destitute now and forlorne of all kinsfolke and friends to assist them, as having left behind them upon earth, all the vesture and ornaments which they were wont to have; by which meanes, the judgement of them may passe more just and right: which I knowing well enough, before you were acquainted therewith, have ordained mine owne founes to be judges; namely for Asia two, Minos and Rhadamanthus; and one for Europe, to wit, Æacus: These therefore after they be dead, shall sit in judgement within a meadow, at a quarefour or crosse-way, whereof the one leadeth to the fortunate isles, the other to hell: Rhadamanthus shall determine of them in Asia; Æacus of those in Europe; and as for Minos I will grant unto him a preeminence in judgement above the rest; in case there happen some matter unknowne to one of the other two, and escape their censure, he may upon weighing and examining their opinions, give his definitive sentence, and so it shall be determined by a most sincere and just doome, whether way each one shall goe. This is that O Calicles which I have heard, and beleeve to be most true; whereout I gather this conclusion in the end; that death is no other thing than the separation of the soule from the body. Thus you see (o Apollonius my most deere friend) what I have collected with great care and diligence, to compose for you sake a consolatorie oration or discourse, which I take to be most necessarie for you, as well to assuage and rid away your present griefe, to appeale likewise, and cause to cease this heavinesse and mourning that you make, which of all things is most unpleasant and troublesome; as also to comptre within it that praise and honour which (me thought) I owed as due unto the memoriall of your sonne Apollonius, of all others exceedingly beloved of the gods: which honour in my conceit is a thing most convenient and acceptable unto those, who by happie memorie, and everlasting glorie are consecrated to immortalitie. You shall doe your part therefore, and verie wisely, if you obey those reasons which are therein contained; you shall gratifie your sonne likewise, and doe him a great pleasure, in case you take up in time and returne from this vaine affliction (wherewith you punish and undoe both bodie and mind) unto your accustomed, ordinarie and naturall course of life: for like as whiles he lived with us he was nothing well appaied, and tooke no contentment to see either father or mother sadde and desolate; even so now, when he converseth and solaceth himselfe in all joy with the gods, doubtlesse he cannot like well of this state wherein you are. Therefore plucke up your heart, and take courage like a man of worth, and magnanimitie, and one that loveth his children well: releafe your selfe first, and then the mother of the young gentleman together with his kinsfolke and friends from this kind of miserie, and take to a more quiet & peaceable manner of life, which will be both to your sonne departed, and to all of us (who have regard of your person, as it becometh us) more agreeable.

A CONSOLATORIE LETTER, OR DISCOURSE SENT UNTO HIS OWNE WIFE, AS TOUCHING THE DEATH OF HER AND HIS DAUGHTER.

The Summarie.

Plutarck being from home, and farre absent, received newes concerning the death of a little daughter of his, a girle about two yeeres old, named Timoxene, a childe of a gentle nature, and of great hope: but fearing that his wife would apprehend such a losse, too neere unto her heart; he comforteth her in this letter, and by giving testimonie unto her of vertue and constancie sheweth at the death of other children, of hers more forward in age than she was; he exhorteth her likewise to patience and moderation in this newe occurrence and trial of hers; condemning by sundry reasons the excessive sorrow, and unjoynt by fasson of many fond mothers, perceiving withall, the inconveniences, that such excessive heavinesse doth wrought after it. Then continuing his consolation of her, he declareth with what care we ought to regard infants and children as well before, as during and after life; how happily they be, who can content themselves and rest in the will and pleasure of God, that the blessings past, ought to dulce and mitigate the calamities present, to stay us also that we proceed not to that degree and height of importunite, as to make account onely of the misadventures and discommodities hapning in this our life. Which done, he answereth to certaine objections which his wife might propound and set on foot; and therewith delivereth his owne advice as touching the incorruption and immortalitye of mans soule (after he had made a medley of divers opinions which the ancient Philosophers held, as touching that point); and in the end concludeth: That it is better and more expedient to die betimes, than late: which position of his, he confirmeth by an ordinance precisely observed in his owne country, which expressly forbiddeth to mourne and lament for those who departed this life in their childhood.

A CONSOLATORIE LETTER or Discourse, sent unto his owne wife, as touching the death of her and his daughter.

PLUTARCH unto his wife; Greeting.

The messenger whom you sent of purpose, to bring me word as touching the death of our little daughter, went out of his way (as I suppose) and so missed of me, as he journeyed toward Athens; howbeit, when I was arrived at Tenagra, I heard that he had changed this life. Now, as concerning the funerals and enterring of her, I am verily perswaded, that you have already taken sufficient order, so as that the thing is not to doe; and I pray God, that you have performed that dutie in such sort, that neither for the present, nor the time to come, it worke you any grievance & displeasure: but if haply you have put off any such complements (which you were willing enough of your selfe to accomplish) untill you knew my minde and pleasure, thinking that in so doing, you should with better will and more patiently beare this adverse accident; then I pray you let the same be performed without all curiositie and superstition; and yet I must needs say, you are as little given that way as any woman that I know: this onely I would admonish you, deare heart, that in this case, you shew (both in regard of your selfe and also of me) a constancie and tranquillitie of minde: for mine owne part, I conceive and measure in mine owne heart, this losse, according to the nature and greatnesse thereof, and so I esteeme of it accordingly; but if I should finde, that you tooke it impatiently, this would be much more grievous unto me, and wound my heart more, than the calamitie it selfe that causeth it; and yet am not I begotten and borne either of an oake or a rocke; whereof you can beare me good witnesse, knowing that wee both together have reared many of our children at home in house, even with our owne hands; and how I loved this girle most tenderly, both for that you were very desirous (after foure sonnes, one after another in a row) to beare a daughter, as also for that in regard of that fancie, I tooke occasion to give her your name: now, besides that naturall fatherly affection, which men commonly have toward little babes, there was one particular propertie that gave an edge thereto, and caused me to love her above the rest; and that was a speciall grace that she had, to make joy and pleasure, and the same without any mixture at all of curstnesse or forwardnesse, and nothing given to whining and complaint; for the was of a wonderfull kinde and gentle nature, loving she was againe to those that loved her, and marvellous desirous to gratifie and pleasure others; in which regards, she both delighted me, and also yeelded no small testimonie of rare debonairetie that nature had endued her withall; for shee would make pretie meanes to her nourise, and seeme (as it were) to intreat her to give the breast or papp, not onely to other infants, like her selfe, her play feres, but also to little babies and puppets, and such like gauds as little ones take joy in, and wherewith they use to play; as if upon a singular courtesie and humanitie shee could finde in her heart to communicate and distribute from her owne table, even the best things that shee had, among them that did her any pleasure. But I see no reason (sweet wife) why these lovely qualities and such like, wherein we tooke contentment and joy in her life time, should disquiet and trouble us now, after her death, when we either thinke or make relation of them: and I feare againe, lest by our dolour and griefe, we abandon and put cleane away all the remembrance thereof, like as Clymene desired to do, when she said:

I hate the bowe's sight of Corneli tree:

as avoiding alwaies and trembling at the remembrance and commemoration of her sonne, which did no other good but renew her griefe and dolour; for naturally we seeke to flee all that troubleth and offendeth us. We ought therefore so to demean our selves, that as whiles she lived, we had nothing in the world more sweet to embrace, more pleasant to see, or delectable to heare than our daughter; so the cogitation of her, may still abide and live with us all our life time, having by many degrees our joy multiplied more than our heavinesse augmented: if it be meet and fit that the reasons and arguments which wee have often times delivered to others, should profit us when time and occasion requireth, and not lie still and idle for any good wee have by them, nor challenge and accuse us, for that in stead of joies past, we bring upon our selves many more griefs by farre. They that have come unto us, report thus much of you, and that with great admiration of your vertue, that you never put on mourning weed, nor so much as changed your robe, & that by no meanes you could be brought to disfigure your selfe or any of your waiting maidens and women about you, nor offer any outrage or injurie to them in this behalfe; neither did you set out her funerals with any sumptuous panegyricall pompe, as if it had bene some solemne feast, but performed every thing soberly and civilly, after a still manner, accompanied onely with our kinsfolke and friends. But my selfe verily made no great wonder (that you who never tooke pride and pleasure to be seene, either in theater or in publike procession, but rather alwaies esteemed all such magnificence so vaine, and sumptuousness superfluous, even in those things that tended to delight) have observed the most safe way of plainnesse and simplicitie, in these occasions of sorrow and sadnesse. For a vertuous and chaste matrone ought not onely to keepe herselfe pure and inviolate in Bacchanall feasts; but also to thinke thus with herselfe, that the turbulent stormes of sorrow, and passionate motions of anguish had no lesse need of continencie to resist and withstand, nor the naturall love and affection of mothers to their children, as many thinke, but the intemperance of the mind. For we allow and grant unto this naturall kindnesse, a certaine affection to bewaile, to reverence, to wish for, so long after, and to beare in minde those that are departed; but the excessive and insatiable desire of lamentations, which forceth men and women to loud out-cries, to knocke, beat, and mangle their owne bodies, is no lesse unseemely and shamefull, than incontinence in pleasures: howbeit, it seemeth by good right to deserve excuse and pardon, for that in this undecencie, there is griefe griefe and bitternesse of sorrow adjoined, whereas in the other, pleasure and delight: for what is more absurd and senselesse, than to seeme for to take away excesse of laughter and mirth; but contrariwise to give head unto streames of teares which proceed from one fountain, and to suffer folke to give themselves over to weeping and lamentation as much as they will; as also that which some use to doe, namely, to chide and rebuke their wives for some sweet perfumes, odoriferous pomanders, or purple garments, which they are desirous to have; and in the meane while permit them, to teare their haire in time of mourning, to shave their heads, to put on blacke, to sit unseemely upon the bare ground, or in ashes, and in most painfull manner to crie out upon God and man; yea and that which of all others is worst, when their wives chastise excessively, or punish unjustly their servants, to come betwene and staie their hands; but when they rigorously and cruelly torment themselves, to let them alone and neglect them in those crosse accidents, which contrariwise had need of facilitie and humanitie? But betwene us twaine, sweet heart, there was never any need of such fraie or combat, and I suppose there will never be. For to speake of that frugalitie which is seene in plaine and simple apparell, or of sobrietie in ordinary diet, and tending of the bodie; never was there any philosopher yet conversing with us in our house, whom you put not downe and stricke into an extraordinary amaze, nor so much as a citizen whom you caused not to admire (as a strange and wonderfull sight, whether it were in publicke sacrifices, or in frequent theaters, and solemne processions) your rare simplicitie: seemably, heerefore you shewed great constancie upon the like commotion and accident at the death of your eldest sonne; and againe when that gentle and beautiful Chiron departed from us untimely, in the prime of his yeeres; and I remember very well that certaine strangers who journeyed with me along from the sea side, (at what time as word was brought of my sonnes death) came home with others to my house, who seeing all things there settled, nothing out of order, but all silent and quiet (as they themselves afterward made report) began to thinke that the said newes was false, and no such calamitie had hapned; so wisely had you composed all matters within house, when as it was, there was good occasion given that might have excited some disorder and confusion; and yet this sonne you were nuse unto your selfe, and gave it suck at your owne pappes; yea, and endured the painfull incision of your breast, by reason of a cancerous hard tumour that came by a contusion. Oh, the generosities of a vertuous dame, and behold the kindnesse of a mother toward her children! whereas you shall see many other mothers to receive their young babes at the hands of their nurses, to dandle & play withall forsooth, in mirth & pastime; but afterwards the same women (if their infants chance to die) give themselves over to al vain mourning, & bootlesse sorrow, which proceedeth not doubtlesse from good will indeed; (for surely heartie affection is reasonable, honest and considerate) but rather from a foolish opinion mingled with a little naturall kindnesse; and this is it that engendreth savage, furious, & implacable sorrows. And verily Aelope (as it should seeme) was not ignorant hereof, for he reporteth this narration: That when Jupiter made a dole or distribution of honors among the gods and goddes; Sorrow came afterwards and made sute likewise to be honored, and so he bestowed upon her, teares, plaints, and lamentations; but for them onely who are willing thereto, and ready to give her intertainment. And I assure you, this they commonly doe at the very beginning; for everie one of his owne accord bringeth in and admitteth sorrow unto him, who (after she is once entertained, and in processe of time well settled, so that she is become domestickall and familiar) will not be driven out of dores nor be gone, if a man would never so faine; and therefore resistance must be made against her, even at the verie gate, neither ought we to abandon our hold, and quit the fort, renting our garments, tearing or shearing our haire, or doing other such things, as ordinarily happen every day; causing a man to be confused, shamefull, and discouraged, making his heart bale, abject and shut up, that he cannot enlarge it, but remaine poore and timorous; bringing him to this passe, that he dare not be merrie, supposing it altogether unlawfull to laugh, to come abroad and see the sunne light, so to converse with men, or to eat or drinke in companie; into such a captivitie is he brought, through sorrow and melancholie: upon this inconvenience after it hath once gotten head, there followeth the neglect of the bodie, no care of annointing or bathing, and generally a restlesse and contempt of all things belonging to this life; whereas contrariwise and by good reason, when the mind is sicke or amisse, it should be helped and sustained by the strength of an able and cheerefull body: for a great part of the soules griefe is allaid, and the edge thereof as it were dulled, when the bodie is fresh and disposed to alacritie, like as the waves of the sea be laid even, during a calme and faire weather: but contrariwise, if by reason that the bodie be

evill entreated, and not regarded with good diet and choisekeeping, it become dried, rough, and hard, in such sort, as from it there breathe no sweet and comfortable exhalations unto the soule, but all smokie and bitter vapors of dolour, griefe, and sadnesse annoy her; then is it no easie matter for men (be they never so willing and desirous) to recover themselves, but that their soules being thus seized upon by so grievous passions, will be afflicted and tormented still. But that which is most dangerous and dreadfull in this case, I never feared in your behalfe, (so wut) That foolish women should come & visit you, and then fall a weeping, lamenting, and crying with you; a thing (I may say to you) that is enough to whet sorrow, and awaken it if it were asleepe, not suffering it either by it selfe, or by meanes of helpe and succour from another; to passe, slide, & vanish away; for I know verie well what adoe you had, & into what a conflict you entred about the sister of Theon, when you would have assisted her & resisted other women who came into her with great cries & loud lamentations, as if they brought fire with them, in al haste to maintaine & encrease that which was kindled already. True it is indeed, that when a friends or neighbors house is seene on fire, every man runneth as fast as he can to helpe for to quench the same; but when they see their soules burning in griefe and sorrow, they contrariwise bring more fewel & matter still to augment or keepe the said fire: also if a man be diseased in his eies, he is not permitted to handle or touch them with his hands, especially if they be bloud-moorten, and possessed with any inflammation; whereas he who sits mourning and sorrowing at home in his house, offereth and presenteth himselfe to the first commor, and to every one that is willing to irritate, flite, and provoke his passion, (as it were a flood or streame that is let out and set a running) in so much as where before the grievance did but itch or smart a little, it now begins to shoot, to ake, to be fell and angrie, so that it becometh a great and dangerous maladic in the end: but I am verily perswaded (I say) that you know how to preserve your selfe from these extremities. Now over and besides, endeavour to reduce and call againe to mind the time when as we had not this daughter, namely, when she was as yet unborn; how we had no cause then to complaine of fortune; then, see you joine (as it were with one tenon) this present, with that which is past, setting the case as if we were returned againe to the same state wherein we were before: for it will appeere (my good wife) that we are discontented that ever she was borne, in case we make thew that we were in better condition before her birth, than afterwards; nor that I wish we should abolish out of our remembrance the two yeeres space between her nativite and decease, but rather count and reckon it among other our pleasures and blessings, as during which time, we had the fruition of joy, mirth, and pastime, and not to esteeme that good which was but little and endured a small while, our great infortunitie; nor yet seeme unthankfull to fortune, for the favour which she hath done unto us, because she added not thereto that length of life which we hoped and expected. Certes to rest contented alwaies with the gods; to thinke and speake of them reverently as it becometh; not to complaine of fortune, but to take in good woorth whatsoever it pleaseth her to send, bringeth evermore a faire and pleasant fruite: but he who in these cases, putteth out of his remembrance the good things that he hath, transporting and turning his thoughts and cogitations from obscure and troublesome occurrents, unto those which be cleere and replendent; if he doe not by this meanes utterly extinguish his sorrow, yet at leastwise by mingling and tempering it with the contrary, he shall be able to diminish or else make it more feeble: for like as a sweet odor and fragrant ointment delighteth and refresheth alwaies the sense of smelling, and besides is a remedie against stinking favours; even so the cogitation of these benefits which men have otherwise received, serveth as a most necessarie and present succour in time of adversitie unto as many as refuse not to remember and call to minde their joies passed, and who never at all for any accident whatsoever complaine of fortune; which we ought not to doe in reason and honestie, unless we would seeme to accuse and blame this life which we enjoy, for some crosse or accident; as if we cast away a booke if it have but one blot or blot in it, being otherwise written throughout most cleane and faire; for you have heard it oftentimes said; that the beatitude of those who are departed, dependeth upon the right and found discourses of our understanding, and the same tending to one constant disposition; as also; that the changes and alterations of fortune beare no great sway, to inferre much declination or casualitie in our life: but if we also as the common sort, must be ruled and governed by externall things without us, if we reckon and count the chaunces and casualties of fortune, and admit for judges of our felicitie our miserie, the base and vulgar sort of people; yet take you no heed to those teares, plaints, and moanes that men or women make who come to visit you at this present, who also (upon a foolish custome & as it were of course) have them ready at command for every every one; but rather consider this with your selfe; how happie you are reputed, even by those who come unto you, who would gladly and with all their hearts be like unto you, in regard of those children whom you have, the house and family which you keepe, & the life that you leade; for it were an evill thing to see others desire to be in your estate and condition for all the sorrow which now afflicteth us, and your selfe in the meane time complaining and taking in ill part the same, and not to be so happy and blessed, as to find and feele (even by this crosse that now pincheth you, for the losse of one infant) what joy you should take, and how thankfull you ought to be for those who remaine alive with you: for heerein you should resemble very well, those Criticks, who collect and gather together all the lame and defective verses of Homer, which are 10 but few in number; and in the meane time, passe over an infinite sort of others, which were by him most excellently made. In this maner (I say) you did, if you would search narrowly, and examine every particular mishap in this life, and finde fault therewith; but all good blessings in grose, let go by, and never once respect the same; which to doe, were much like unto the practise of those covetous misers, worldlings and peni-fathers, who cake and care, punish both bodie and minde, until they have gathered a great deale of good together, and then enjoy no benefit or use thereof; but if they chance to forgo any of it, they keepe a piteous wailing and wofull lamentation.

Now if haply you have compassion and pitie of the poore girle, in that she went out of this world a maiden unmarried, and before that the bare any children; you ought rather on the contrarye side, to reioice and take delight in your selfe above others, for that you have not failed of these blessings, nor bene disappointed either of the one or the other: for who would holde and mainteine; that these things should be great to those who be deprived of them; and but small to them, who have and enjoy the same? As for the childe, who doubtlesse is gone into a place where the feeleth no paine, surely she requireth not at our hands that we should afflict & grieve our selves for her sake: for what harme is there befallen unto us by her, if she her selfe now feele no hurt? And as for the losses of great things indeed, surely they yeeld no sence at all of dolor, when they are come once to this point, that there is no more need of them, or care made for the. But verily, thy daughter Timoxena is bereft, not of great matters, but of small things; for in truth, she had no knowledge at all, but of such, neither delighted she in any, but in such: seeing 30 then, that she had no perceivance nor thought of those things, how can she properly and truly be said to be deprived thereof?

Moreover, as touching that which you heard of others, who are wont to perswade many of the vulgar sort, saying: That the soule once separate from the bodie, is dissolved, and feeleth no paine or dolor at all: I am assured, that you yeeld no credit and beliefe to such positions; as well in regard of those reasons and instructions which you have received by tradition from our ancestors, as also of those sacred and symbolical mysteries of Bacchus, which we know wel enough, who are of that religious confraternitie, and professed therein. Being grounded therefore in this principle, and holding it firmly for an undoubted truth: That our soule is incorruptible and immortal; you are to thinke, that it fareth with it, as it doth with little birds that are caught 40 by the fowler alive, and came into mens hands: for if it have bene kept and nourished daintily a long time within the bodie, so that it be inured to be gentle and familiar unto this life, to wit, by the management of sundry affaires and long custome, it returneth thither againe, and reentreteth a second time (after many generations) into the bodie; it never taketh rest nor ceaseth, but is in-wrapped within the affections of the flesh, and entangled with the adventures of the world, and calamities incident to our nature: for I would not have you to thinke that olde age is to be blamed and reproched for riuels and wrinkles, nor in regard of hoarie white haies, ne yet for the imbecillitie and feeblenesse of the body; but the worst and most odious thing in it is this: That it cauleth the soule to take corruption by the remembrance of those things whereof it had experience whiles it staid therein, and was too much addicted and affectionate unto it, whereby 50 it bendeth and boweth, yea, and reteineth that forme or figure which it tooke of the bodie, by being so long devoted thereto; whereas that which is taken away in youth, pretendeth a better estate and condition, as being framed to a gentler habit, more soft, tractable and lesse compact, putting on now a naturall rectitude, much like as fire, which being quenched, if it be kindled againe, burneth out, and recovereth vigor incontinently: which is the cause that it is faire better

Be times to yeeld up vitall breath,

And come to passe the gates of death, before that the soule have taken too deepe an imbibition or liking of terrene things here below;

and ere it be made soft and tender with the love of the bodie, and (as it were) by certeine medicines and forcible charmes united and incorporate into it. The truth hereof may appeare yet better, by the fashions and ancient customes of this countrey; for our citizens (when their children die yong) neither offer mortuaries, nor performe any sacrifices & ceremonies for them, as others are wont to do for the dead: the reason is, because they have no part of earth nor earthly ly affections; neither doe they keepe about their tombs and sepulchres, nor lay forth the dead corps abroad to be seene of men, nor sit neere unto their bodies: for our lawes and statutes doe not permit and suffer any mourning at all for those that so depart in their minoritie, as being a custome not holy and religious; for that wee are to thinke they passe into a better place and happier condition. Which ordinances and customes, since it is more dangerous not to give credit unto, than beleue, let us carie and demaie ourselues according as they command, for outward order; as for within, all ought to be more pure, wile and uncorrupt.

HOW IT COMMETH, 20 THAT THE DIVINE IUSTICE DEFERRETH OTHER-WHILES THE PUNISHMENT OF WICKED PERSONS,

quickly and continually their misdeeds. In the second part, they debate a certeine question depending of the precedent objection, to wit, Wherefore children be chastised for the sinnes of their fathers and ancestors? and there was a certeine Philosopher named Timon, who handled this matter taxing after an oblique manner, the iustice of God, which Plutarch maintaineth and defendeth, shewing by diuers reasons, that whatsoeuer Timon had alledged, was meere false; and that God did so inuie at all unto those children, in withdrawing his grace and fauour from them, and chastising them so, together with their parents, finding them likewise culpable for their part. But in this place, our author answereth not sufficiently and to the purpose; as being ignorant of originall sinne, and the vniversal corruption of Adams children, which enwrappeth them all in the same condemnation, although some are farther gone in sinfull life, according as they be grown to more yeeres, and so augment their punishment; so much as we may well marvell at this, that a poore Pagan hath so farre proceeded in this point of Theologie; and Christians haue so much greater occasion to looke unto themselves, in the mid of this light which directeth them, considering how thin man could see so cleere in darkenisse, which appeareth sufficiently in the end of this discourse; where he intermedleth certaine fables as touching the state of our soules after they be parted from the bodies.

HOW IT COMMETH, THAT the diuine iustice deferreth otherwhiles the punishment of wicked persons.

After that Epicurus had made this speech (ô Cynius) and before that any one of us had answered him, by that time that we were come to the end of the gallerie or walking place, he went his way out of our sight, and so departed; and we wondering much at this strange fashion of the man, stood still a pretie while in silence, looking one upon another, and so we betooke our selves to our walking againe, as before: then Patrocleas began first to mooue speech and conference, saying in this manner: How now my masters! if you thinke so good, let us discusse this question, and make answer in his absence, to those reasons which he hath alledged, as well as if he were present in place: hereupon Timon tooke occasion to speake, and said: Certes it were not well done of us, to let him escape so without revenge, who hath left his dart sticking in us; for captain Brasidas (as it appeareth in the Chronicles) being wounded with the shot of a javelin, drew it out of his bodie his owne selfe, and therewith smote his enemy who had hurt him, so as he killed him outright: as for us, we need not so greatly to be revenged of those who have let sic among us, some rash, foolish and false speeches; for it will be sufficient, to shake the same off, and send them backe againe, before our opinion take holde thereof. And what was it, I pray you (quoth I) of all that which he delivered, that moved you most? for the man handled many things confusedly together, and nothing at all in good order, but kept a prating and babling against the providence of God, facing and inveighing most bitterly and in reprochfull teames, as if he had bene in a fit of anger and rage. Then Patrocleas: That which he uttered as touching the long delay and slacknesse of diuine iustice in punishing the wicked, in my conceit was a great objection and troubled me much, and to say a truth, their reasons and words which he delivered have imprinted in me a new opinion, so as now I am become a novice, and to begin againe to learne. True it is that long since I was discontented in my heart to heare Euripides speake in this wise;

He putteth off from day to day,
Gods nature is, thus to delay.

For it were not meet and decent, that God should be slow in any action whatsoever, and least of all in punishing sinners; who are themselves nothing loathfull, nor make delay in perpetrating wicked deeds, but are caried most speedily and with exceeding violence of their passions, pickt forward to do wrong and mischief. And verily when punishment ensueth hard after injury and violence committed; there is nothing as (Theoclydes saith) that so soone stoppeth up the passage against those who are most prone and ready to runne into all kinde of wickednesse; for there is no delay of payment that so much enfeebleth the hope, and breaketh the heart of a man wronged and offended, nor causeth him to be so insolent and audacious, who is disposed dispos'd to mischief, as the deferring of justice and punishment: whereas contrariwise the corrections, & chastisements, that follow immediately upon leud acts, and mee with the malefactours betimes, are a meanes both to repress all future outrage in offenders, and also to comfort and pacifie the heart of those who are wronged. For mine owne part the saying of Bias troubleth me many times, as often as I thinke upon it, for thus he spake unto a notorious wicked man: I doubt not but thou shalt one day smart for this geere, and pay for thy leudnesse; but I feare I shall never live to see it. For what good unto the Messenians being slaine before, did the punishment of Aristocrates, who having betray'd them in the battell of Cypres, was not detected and discovered for his treason in twentie yeeres after, during which time, he was alwaies king of Arcadia, and being at the last convicted for the said treacherie, suffred punishment for his delicts? meane while, those whom he had caused to be massacred, were not in the world to see it. Or what comfort and consolation received the Orchomenians, who lost their children, kinsfolke, and friends, through the treason of Lyciscus, by the maladic which long after seized upon him, eating & consuming all his bodie? who ever as he dipped and bathed his feet in theriver water, kept a weeping and cursing, that he thus rotted and was eaten away, for the treachery which most wickedly he had committed? And at Athens the childrens children of those poore wretches who were killed within the privileged place of sanctuarie, could never see the vengeance of the gods which afterwards fell upon those bloudie and sacrilegious caittifes, whose dead bodies and bones being excommunicate, were banished, and cast out beyond the confines of their native country. And therefore me thinks Euripides is very absurd, when to divert men from wickednesse he useth such words as these:

*Justice (feare not) will not thee overtake,
To pierce thy heart, or deepe wound ever make
In liuer thine; nor any mortall might Besides, though leud he be, and doe no right.
But slow she goes, and slent to impeach
And chastise such, if ever them she reach.*

For I assure you, it is not like, that wicked & ungracious persons use any other perswasions, but even the very same to incite, move and encourage themselves to enterprise any leud and wicked acts, as making this account and reckoning, that iniustice will quickly yeeld her frute ripe in due time, and the same evermore certaine: whereas punishment commeth late and long after the pleasure and fruition of the said wickednesse. When Parocleus has discoursed in this wise, Olympicus tooke the matter in hand and said unto him: Marke moreover (o Parocleus) what inconvenience and absurditie followeth upon this slownesse of diuine justice, and prolonging the punishment of malefactours? for it causeth unbeliefe in men, and namely, that they are not perswaded that it is by the providence of God that such be punished; & the calamitie that cometh upon wicked ones, not presently upon every sinful act that they have committed, but long time after, is reputed by them infelicitie, and they call it their fortune, and not their punishments; whereupon it commeth to passe, that they have no benefit thereby, nor be any whit better, for howsoever they grieve and be discontented at the accidents which befall unto them, yet they never repent for the leud acts they have before committed. And like as in punishment among us, a little pinch, stripe, or lash given unto one for a fault or error, presently upon the doing thereof, doth correct the partie, and reduce him to his dutie; whereas the wrings, scourgings, knocks, and foudning thumps, which come a good while after, seeme to be given upon some occasion beside, and for another cause rather than to teach; and therefore well may they put him to paine and griefe, but instruction they yeeld none; even so naughtinesse rebuked and repressed, by some present chastisement, every time that it trespasseth and transgresseth, howsoever it be painfull at first, yet in the end it bethinketh it selfe, learneth to be humbled, and to feare God as a severe iusticier, who hath an eie upon the deeds and passions of men, for to punish them incontinently, and without delay; whereas this justice and revenge which commeth so slowly, and with a soft pace (as Euripides saith) upon the wicked and ungodly persons, by reason of the long intermission, the inconstant and wandering incertitude, and the confused disorder resembling chance and adventure more than the desseigne of any providence: in so much as I cannot conceive or see what profit can be in these grindstones (as they call them) of the gods, which are so long a grinding; especially, seeing that the judgement and punishment of sinners is thereby oblcured, and the feare of sinne made slight, and of no reckoning, upon the delivertie of these words, I began to studie and muse with my selfe: then Timon: Would you (quoth he)

he) that I should cleere this doubt once for all, and so make an end of this disputation? or permit him first to dispute and reason against these oppositions? And what need is there (answered I) to come in with a third wave for to overflow and drowne at once our speech and discourse, if he be not able to refute the former objections, nor to escape and avoid the chalenges already made. First and foremost therefore to begin at the head, and (as the manner is, to say) at the goddesse Vesta, (for the reverent regard and religious that the Academick philosophers profess to have unto God, as an heavenly father) we utterly disclaime, and refuse to speake of the Deitie, as if we knew for certaintie what it is: for it were a greater presumption in us who are but mortall men, to enterprise any set speech or discourse as touching gods or demi-gods, than for one who is altogether ignorant in long, to dispute of musick, or for them who never were in campe, nor saw so much as a battell fought, to put themselves forward to discourse of armes and warfare; taking upon us, (unskilfull as we are, and void of art) a fantastickall knowledge, grounded onely upon some light opinion, and conjecture of our owne, as if we were right cunning workemen and artificers: for it is not his part, who is not studied in the arte of Physick, to gesse at the reason and consideration that the physician or chirurgian had, why he made incision no sooner in his patient, but staid long ere he proceeded thereto? or wherefore he bathed him not yesterday, but to day? semblably, it is neither easie nor safe for a mortall man to speake otherwise of the gods, than of those who knew well enough the due time and opportunitie to minister a meeter and convenient medicine, unto vice and sinne; and exhibit punishment to every trespassse, as an appropriate drouge, or confection to cure and heale ech maladic; notwithstanding that the same measure and quantitie be not common to all delinquents, nor one onely time and the same, is alwaies meet therefore. Now that the physicke or medicine of the soule, which is called Right and Justice, is one of the greatest sciences that are; Pindarus himselfe besides an infinit number of others, beareth witness; when he calleth the Lord and governour of the world, to wit, God, a most excellent and perfect artificer, as being the author and creator of justice, unto whom it appertaineth to define and determine, when, in what manner, and how far forth, it is meet and reasonable to chastise and punish each offender. Plato likewise saith: That Amos the sonne of Jupiter (was in this science) the disciple of his father; giving us heereby to understand, that it is not possible for one to carie himselfe well in the execution of justice, nor to judge a right of him that doth as he ought; unless he have before learned that science, and be thoroughly skilfull therein. Furthermore, the positive lawes which men have established, seeme not alwaies to be grounded upon reason, or to found and accord in all respects with absolute equitie and justice; but some of their ordinances be such, as in outward appearance may be thought ridiculous, and worthy of mockerie; as for example. At Lacedaemon the high controllers called Ephori, so soone as they be entalled in their magistracie, cause proclamation to be published by sound of trumper, that no man should weare mynstaches, or nourish the haire on their upper lips; also that willingly every man should obey the lawes, to the end that they might not be hard or grievous unto them. The Romans also, when they enfranchise any slave, and make him free; cast upon their bodies a little small rodde or wand: likewise when they draw their last wils or testaments, institute some for their heires, whom it pleaseth them, but to others they leaveth their goods to sell; a thing that carrieth no sense nor reason with it. But yet more absurd and unreasonable is that statute of Solons making, wherein it was provided: That what citizen soever, in a civil sedition, ranged not himselfe to a side, nor tooke part with one or other faction, should be noted with infamie, and disabled for being capable of any honorable dignitie. In one word, a man may alledge an infinit number of absurdities besides, contained in the civil lawes; who neither knoweth the reason of the lawgiver that wrot them, nor the cause why they were set downe. If then it be so difficult to conceive and understand the reasons which have mooved men thus to doe, is it any marvell that we are ignorant of the cause, why God chastiseth one man sooner and another later? howbeit, this that I have said, is not for any pretence of starting backe and running away, but rather for to crave leave and pardon, to the end that our speech having an eie thereto, (as unto an haven and place of refuge) might be the more hardie, with boldnesse to range forth still in probabilities, to the matter in doubt and question: But I would have you to consider first, that (according to the saying of Plato) God having set himselfe before the eies of the whole world, as a perfect pattern and example of all goodnesse, doth unto as many as can follow and imitate his divinitie, infuse humane vertue, which is in some sort conformable and like unto him; for the generall nature of this universall world, being at the first a confused and disordered Chaos, obtained this principle with ranke weeds; wherein also there be many wilde beasts, many rivers, and by consequence, great store of muddie and mire: but contrariwise, an expert husband, and one who hath good judgement, and can discern the difference of things, knoweth these and all such signes, to be token a fertile and plentiful soile; even so great wits and haucie spirits, doe produce and put forth at the first, many strange, absurd, and leud pranks, which we not able to endure, thinke, that the roughnesse & offensive prick thereof, ought immediately to be cropt off and cut away: but he who can judge better (considering what proceedeth from thence good and generous) attendeth and expecteth with patience, the age and season, which is cooperative with vertue and reason, against which time, the strong nature in such, is for to bring forth and yeeld her proper and peculiar fruite. And thus much may suffice of this matter.

But to proceed forward: Thinke you not that some of the Greeks have done well and wisely, to make a transcript of a law in Egypt, which commaundeth; that in case a woman who is arraigned and convicted of a capital crime, for which in justice she ought to die, be with child, she should be kept in prison untill she were delivered? Yes verily, they all answered? Well then (quoth I) Set case there be some one who hath no children conceived in his wombe to bring forth, but breedeth some good counsell in his head, or conceiveth a great enterprise in his minde, which he is to bring to light, and effect in time, either by discovering an hidden mischief, or setting abroad an expedient and profitable counsell, or inventing some matter of necessarie consequence: Thinke you not that he did better, who deferred the execution of such an ones punishment & stay untill the utilitie that might grow by him were seene, than he who inconsiderately & in all haste proceeded to take revenge, & prevent the opportunitie of such a benefit? Certes, for mine owne part, I am full y of that minde: and even we no lesse, answered Patrocleus. Well then (quoth I) it must needs be so; for marke thus much: If Dionysius had beene punished for his usurped rule, in the beginning of his tyrannie; there should not one Grecian have remained inhabitant in Sicilie, for the Carthaginians would have held the same and driven them out outlike as it must needs have befallen to the citie Apollonia, to Anactonium, and the Cherfonsie or ordemic island Lenaxia, if Pericles had suffered punishment at first, and not a long time after, as he did. And I suppose verily that the punishment and revenge of Cassander was put off and prolonged of purpose, untill by that meanes the citie of Thebes was fully reedified and peopled againe. And many of those mercenary soldiers and strangers, who seized and held this temple wherein we are, during the time of the sacred warre, passed under the conduct of Timoleon into Sicilie, who after they had defeated in battell, the Carthaginians, and withall suppressed & abolished sundrie tyrannies, they came to a wretched end, wicked wretches as they were. For God in great wisdom and providence, otherwhiles maketh use of some wicked persons, as of butchers and common executioners, to torment and punish others, as wicked as they or worse, whom afterwards he destroyeth; and thus in mine opinion he dealeth with most part of tyrants. For like as the gall of the wild beast Hyana, and the rendles or rennet of the Sea-calf, as also other parts of venomous beasts and serpents, have one medicinable propertie or other, good to heale sundry maladies of men; even so God seeing some people to have need of birte and bridle, and to be chastised for their enormities, sendeth unto them some inhumane tyrant, or a rigorous and inexorable lord to whip and scourge them, and never giveth over to afflict and vex them, untill he have purged and cleered them of that maladic wherewith they were infected. Thus was Phalaris the tyrant a medicine to the Agrigentines: thus Marium was sent as a remedie to cure the Romanes: as for the Sicyonians, even god himselfe Apollo foretold them by oracle: That their citie had need of certaine officers to whippe and scourge them, at what time as they would perforce take from the Cleoneans, a certain yong boy named Teletus, who was crowned in the solemnities of the Pythian games, pretending that he was their citizen, and borne among them, whom they haled and pulled in such sort, as they dismembered him: But these Sicyonians met afterwards with Orthogoras that tyrannized over them; and when he was gone, they were plagued also with Myron and Clithenes, and their favorites, who held them in so short, that they kept them from all outrages, and staid their insolent follies: whereas the Cleoneans, who had not the like purgative medicine to cure them, were subverted and through their misdeameanor come to nothing. Marke well therefore that which Homer in one place saith:

It is sonne he was, and in all kind of valour did surmount

His father farre, who was (to say a truth) of base account.

And yet this sonne of Copreus never performed (in all his life) any memorable act, beseeeming a man of woorth and honour: whereas the offspring of Sisyphus, the race of Antolycus, and the posteritie of Phlegyas flourished in glorie, and all maner of vertue among great kings and princes. At Athenes likewise, Pericles descended from an house excommunicate and accursed: And so at Rome Pompeius surnamed Magnus, that is, the Great, had for his father one Strabo, a man whom the people of Rome so hated, that when he was dead, they threw his corps out of the biere wherein it was caried forth to buriall, and trampled it under their feet. What absurditie then were it, if as the husbandman never cutteth up or stocketh the thorne or bush, before he hath gathered the tender sprouts and buds thereof: nor they of Libya burne the boughes of the plant Ledrom, untill they have gotten the aromaticall gumme or liquor out of it called Ladanum; even so God never plucketh up by the roote, the race of any noble and roiall familie (wicked and wretched though they be) before it hath yeelded some good and profitable fruite: for it had bene farre better and more expedient for the men of Phocis, that ten thousand beefs and as many horses of Spitus had died; that the Delphians likewise had lost much more gold and silver by farre, than that either Ulysses or Aesculapius should not have bene borne; or others in like case, whose parents being wicked and vicious, were themselves honest and very profitable to the commonwealth. Are we not then to thinke, that it were far better to punish in due time and maner convenient, than to proceed unto revenge hastily and out of hand? Like as that was of Callippus the Athenian, who making semblance or friendship unto Dion, stabbed him at once with his dagger, and was himselfe afterwards killed with the same, by his friends? as also that other of Mitius the Argive, who was murdered in a certaine commotion and civill broile: for it hapned so, that in a frequent assembly of the people, gathered together in the market place, for to beholde a follenne shew, a statue of brasse fell upon the murderer of Mitius, and killed him outright. And you have heard (I am sure) of Patrocleus (have you not?) what befell unto Bessus the Pconian, and Ariston the Oetecian, two colonels of mercenary and forren souldiers? No verily (quoth he) but I would gladly know: This Ariston (quoth I) having stollen and caried away out of this temple, certaine jewels and costly furniture of queene Eriphyle, which of long time had there bene kept safe, by the grant and permission of the tyrants who ruled this citie, caried them as a present to his wife; but his sonne being on a time (upon some occasion) displeased and angrie with his mother, set fire on the house, and burnt it with all that was within it. As for Bessus, who had murdered his owne father, he continued a good while not detected, untill such time, as being one day at supper with certaine of his friends that were strangers, with the head of his speare he pierced and cast downe a swallowe neast, and so killed the yong birds within it: and when those that stood by, seemed (as good reason there was) to say unto him: How cometh this to passe, good sir? and what aile you, that you have committed so leud and horrible an act? Why (quoth he againe) doe these birds crie aloud and beare false witnesse against me, testifying that I have murdered mine owne father? hee had no sooner let fall this word, but those who were present tooke holde thereof, and wondering much thereat, went directly to the king, and gave information of him; who made so diligent inquisition, that the thing upon examination was discovered, and Bessus (for his part) punished accordingly for a parricide. Thus much (I say) have we related, that it may be held as a confessed truth and supposition, that wicked men otherwhiles have some delay of their punishment: as for the rest, you are to thinke that you ought to hearken unto Hesiodus the Poet, who saith not as Plato did, that the punishment of sinne doth follow sinne hard at the heeles, but is of the same time and age, as borne and bred in one place with it, and springing out of the very same roote and stocke: for these be his words in one place:

*Bad counsell who deviseth first,
Unto himselfe shall finde it worst.*

And in another:

*Who doth for others mischief frame,
To his owne heart contrives the same.*

The venomous flies Cantharides are said to containe in themselves a certaine remedie, made and compounded by a contrarietie or antipathie in nature, which serveth for their owne counterpoison; but wickednesse ingendering within it selfe (I wot not what) displeasure and punishment, not after a sinfull act is committed, but even at the very instant of committing, it beginneth to suffer the paine due to the offence: neither is there a malefactor, but when he seeth others like himselfe punished in their bodies, beareth forth his owne crosse; whereas mischiefous wickednesse frameth of her selfe, the engines of her owne torment, as being a wonderfull artisan of a miserable life, which (together with shame and reproch) hath in it lamentable calamities, many terrible frights, fearefull perturbations and passions of the spirit, remorse of conscience, desperate repentance, and continuall troubles and unquietnesse. But some men there be, who for all the world resemble little children, that beholding many times in the theater, leaud and naughtie persons arraid in cloth of golde, rich mantles, and robes of purple, adorned also with crownes upon their heads, when they either dance or play their parts upon the stage, have them in great admiration, as reputing them right happie, untill such time as they see them how they be either pricked and pierced with goads, or sending flames of fire out of those gorgeous, costly and sumptuous vestments. For to say a truth, many wicked persons, who dwell in stately houses, are descended from noble parentage, sit in high places of authoritie, beare great dignities and glorious titles, are not knownen (for the most part) what plagues and punishments they suffer, before they be seene to have their throats cut, or their necks broken, by being cast downe headlong from on high; which a man is not to reame punishments simply, but rather the small end and accomplishment thereof. For like as Herodicus of Selymbria, being fallen into an incurable phthisicke or consumption, by the ulcer of his lungs, was the first man (as Plato saith) who in the cure of the said disease, joined with other Physicke, bodily exercise, and in so doing, drew out and prolonged death, both to himselfe and to all others who were likewise infected with that maladie; even so may we say, that wicked persons (as many as seeme to have escaped a present plague, and the stroke of punishment out of hand) suffer in truth, the paine due for their sinfull acts, not in the end onely and a great time after, but susteine the same a longer time: so that the vengeance taken for their sinfull life is nothing slower, but much more produced and drawn out to the length; neither be they punished at the last in their olde age, but they waxe olde rather in punishment, which they have endured all their life. Now when I speake of long time, I meane it in regard of our selves; for in respect of the gods, the whole race of mans life (how long soever it be thought) is a matter of nothing, or no more than the very moment and point of the instant. For say, that a malefactor should suffer the space of thirtie yeres for some hainous fact that he hath committed, it is all one, as if a man should stretch him upon the racke, or hang him upon a gibbet in the evening toward night, and not in the morning betimes; especially, seeing that such an one (all the while that he lieth) remaineth close and fast shut up (as it were) in a strong prison or cage, out of which he hath no meanes to make an escape and get away. Now if in the meane while they make many fealts, manage sundry matters, and enterprife diuers things; if they give presents and largesses abroad; and say they give themselves to their disports and pleasures; it is even as much, and all one, as when malefactours (during the time they be in prison) should play at dice or cockall game, having continually over head the rope hanging, which must strangle them: for otherwise, we might as well say, that prisoners condemned to die, suffer no punishment all the whiles they lie in hard and colde yrons, nor untill the executioner come and strike the head from the shoulders; or that he who by sentence of the judges hath drunke the deadly potion of hemlocke, is not punished, because he walketh still, and goeth up and downe alive, waiting untill his legs become heauie, before the generall colde and congelation surprise him, and extinguish both sense and vitall spirits, in case it were so, that we esteeme and call by the name of punishment, nothing but the last point and extremity thereof; letting passe and making no reckoning at all of the passions, feares, painfull pangues, expectation of death, pricks and sorrowes of a penitent conscience, wherewith every wicked person is troubled and tormented: for this were as much as to say, that the fish which hath swallowed downe the hooke, is not caught, untill we see the said fish cut in pieces, or broiled, roasted and sodden by the cooke. Certes every naughty person is presently become prisoner unto iustice, so soone as he hath once committed a sinfull act, and swallowed the hooke together with the bait of sweetnesse and pleasure, which he taketh in leaudnesse and wrongfull doing; but when remorse of conscience imprinted in him, doth pricke, he feeleth the very torments of hell, and can not rest;

But as in case the Tunny fish doth swiftly crosse the waves,

And trauerses still while tempest lasts, so be with anguish raves.

For this audacious rashnesse and violent insolence (proper unto vice) is verie puissant, forward, and readie at hand, to the effecting and execution of sinfull acts; but afterwards, when the passion (like unto a winde) is laied, and begins to faile, it becommeth weake, base and feeble, subject to an infinite number of feares and superstitions; in such sort, as that Strophorus the Poet seemeth to have deuised the dreame of queene Chytemnestra, very conformable to the truth, and answerable to our daily experience, when he bringeth her in, speaking in this manner:

Me

*Me thought I saw a dragon come apace,
Whose creft aloft on head with bloud was stein'd;
With that anon there did appeare in place
Plithenides: he king, who that time reignd.*

For the visions by night in dreames, the fantastical apparitions in the day time, the answers of oracles, the prodigious signes from heaven, and in one word, whatsoever men think to be done immediately by the will and finger of God, are wont to strike great troubles and horrors into such persons so affected, and whose consciences are burdened with the guilt and priuie of sinne. Thus the report goeth of Apollodorus, that he dreamed upon a time, how he saw himselfe first slayed by the Scythians, then cut as small as flesh to the pot, and so boiled; he thought also that his heart spake softly fro out of the cauldron, and uttered these words: I am the cause of all these thy evils; and againe, he imagined in his sleepe, that his own daughters, all burning on a light flaming fire, ran round about him in a circle. Semblably Hipparchus the sonne of Pisistratus, a little before his death, dreamed that Peneus out of a certaine viall sprinkled bloud upon his face. The familiar friends likewise of king Ptolomaeus, surnamed Ceramus, that is to say, Lightning, thought verily in a dreame that they saw Seleucus accuse and indite him judicially before wilde wolves, and greedie geires that were his judges, where he dealt and distributed a great quantitie of flesh among his enemies. Pausanias also at Bizantium, sent for Cleonice, a virgin and gentlewoman free borne, of a worshipfull house; intending perforce to lie with her all night, and abuse her body; but being halfe a sleepe when she came to his bed, he awakened in a fright, and suspecting that some enemies were about to surprise him, killed her outright; wherupon ever after he dreamt ordinarily, that he saw her, and heard her pronounce this speech:

To judgement seat, approach thou neere I say, Wrong dealing is to men most hurtfull ay.

Now when this vision as it should seeme ceased not to appeere unto him night by night; he embarked and sailed into Heracles, to a place where the spirits and ghosts of those that are departed be raised and called up, where after he had offered certaine propitiatorie sacrifices, and powdered forth funerall effusions, which they use to call upon the tombes of the dead; he wrought so effectually, that the ghost of Cleonice appeared; and then the said unto him, that so soone as he was arrived at Lacedaemon, he should have repole and an end of all his troubles: and so in very truth, no sooner was he thither come, but he ended his life and died. If therefore the soule had no sense after it is departed out of the bodie, but commeth to nothing; and that death were the final end and expiration aswell of thankfull recompenses, as of painfull punishments, a man might say of wicked persons who are quickly punished, and die soone after that they have committed any misdeeds; that God dealeth very gently and mildly with them: For if continuance of time, and long life bringeth to wicked persons no other harme; yet a man may at leastwise say thus much of them, that having knowne by prooffe, and found by experience, that iniustice is an unfruitfull, barren, and thanklesse thing, bringing forth no good thing at all, nor ought that deserueth to be esteemed after many travels and much paines taken with it; yet the verie feeling and remorse of conscience for their sinnes, disquieteth and troubleth the mind, and turneth it upside downe. Thus we reade of king Lysimachus, that being forced through extreme thirst, he delivered his owne person, and his whole armie into the hands of the Getes; and when being their prisoner, hee had drunke and quenched his thirst, he said thus: O what a miserie is this, and wretched case of mine, that for so short and transitorie a pleasure, I have deprived my selfe of so great a kingdom, and all my roiall estate. True it is, that of all things it is an exceeding hard matter to resist the necessitie of a naturall passion; but when as a man for covetousnesse of money, or desire of glorie, authoritie, & credit among his countymen and fellow-citizens, or for fleshly pleasures, falleth to commit a foule, wicked, and execrable fact, and then afterwards in time, when as the ardent thirst and furious heat of his passion is past, seeing that there so abide and continue with him, the filthy, shamefull, and perilous perturbations onely of iniustice and sinfulness; but nothing at all that is profitable, necessarie, or delightfull; is it not very likely and probable, that he shall eiesoones, and oftentimes recall into this thought, and consideration? how being seduced and caried away by the meanes of vain-glory, or dishonest pleasures, (things base, vile, and illiberal) he hath perverted and overthrowen the most beautiful and excellent gifts that men have, to wit, right, equitie, iustice, and pietie; and in stead thereof, hath siled and polluted his life, with shame, trouble, and danger? For like as Simonides was wont to say in mirth: That he found one coffer of silver and money alwaies full; but that other

of favors, thanks, and benefits, evermore empty; even so wicked men, when they come to examine and peruse aright the vice that is in themselves, they finde it presently (for one pleasure which is accompanied with a little vaine and glosing delight) void altogether and destitute of hope; but fully replenished with feares, cares, anxieties, the unpleasant remembrance of misdemeanors past, suspicion of future events, and distrust for the present: much after the manner as we do heare Iso in the theaters, repenting of those foule facts which she had committed, and speaking these words upon the stage:

*How should I now, my friends and ladies deere Begin to keepe the house of Athamas,
Since that all whiles that I have lived here, Nought hath bene done by me that decent was?*

Or thus:

*How may I keepe, ô ladies deere alas;
The house againe of my lord Athamas,
As who therein had not committed ought
Of those leud parts which I have done and wrought.*

For semblably it is meet that the minde and soule of every sinfull and wicked person should imitate and discourse of this point in it selfe after this maner: After what sort should I forget and put out of remembrance the unjust and leud parts which I have committed? how should I cast off the remorse of conscience from me? and from henceforth begin to turne over a new leafe, & lead another life: for surely with those in whom wickednesse beareth sway, & is predominant, there is nothing assured, nothing firme & constant, nothing sincere and sound; unless haply we will say and maintaine that wicked persons and unjust, were some Sages and wise philosophers. But we are to thinke, that where avarice reigneth & excessive concupiscence, and love of pleasure, or where extreme envie dwelleth, accompanied with spight and malice; there if you mark and looke well about, you shall finde superstition lying hidden among, sloth and unwillingnesse to labour, feare of death, lightnesse and quicke mutabilitie in changing of minde and affection, together with vaine glory proceeding of arrogance: those who blame them, they feare, such as praise them, they dread and suspect; as knowing well how they are injured and wronged by their deceitfull semblance, and yet be the greatest enemies of the wicked, for that they commend so readily, and with affection, those whom they suppose, and take to be honest: for in vice and sinne (like as in bad iron) the hardnesse is but weak and rotten, & the stiffnesse also brittle & easie to be broken: and therefore wicked men (learning in proceesse of time, better to know themselves what they are) after they come once to the full consideration thereof, are displeased, and discontented, they hate themselves, and detest their owne leud life: for it is not likely that if a naughty person otherwise (though not in the highest degree, who hath regard to deliver again a pawne or piece of money left in his hands to keepe; who is ready to be suretie for his familiar friend, & upon a braverie and glorious minde, hath given largesses, and is prest to maintaine & defend his countrey, yea, and to augment and advance the good estate thereof) soone repent and immediately be grieved for that which he hath done, by reason that his mind is so mutable, or his will so apt to be seduced by an opinion or conceit of his: considering that even some of those who have had the honor to be received by the whole bodie of the people in open theater, with great applause and clapping of hands, incontinently fall to sigh to themselves, and groane againe, so soone as avarice returneth secretly, in place of glorious ambition: those that kill and sacrifice men to usurpe and set up their tyrannies, or to maintaine and compass some conspiracies, as Apollodorus did; circumvent and defraud their friends of their goods and monies, which was the practise of Glaucus, the sonne of Epicydes, should never repent their misdeeds, nor grow into a detestation of themselves, nor yet be displeased with that they have done: For mine owne part, I am of this opinion (if it be lawfull so to say) That all those who commit such impieties and misdemeanors, have no need either of God or man to punish them; for their owne life onely being so corrupt, and wholly depraved and troubled with all kind of wickednesse, is sufficient unto plague and torment them to the full: But consider (quoth I) whether this discourse seeme not already to proceed farther, and be drawn out longer than the time will permit. Then Timon answered: It may well so be, if peradventure we regard the length and prolixitie of that which followeth and remaineth to be discussed; as for my selfe, I am now ready to rise as it were out of an ambush, and to come as a fresh and new champion with my last doubt and question, forasmuch as me thinks, we have debated enough already upon the former: for this would I have have you to thinke, that although we are silent and say nothing, yet we complaine as Empidius did, who boldly challenged and reproched the gods, for that

*The parents sinne, and their iniquitie,
They turne on children and posteritie.*

For say that themselves, who have committed a fault, were punished, then is there no more need to chastise others, who have not offended, considering it were no reason at all to punish twise for one fault the delinquents themselves: or be it so, that through negligence they having omitted the punishment of wicked persons and offenders, they would long after make them to pay for it who are innocent; surely they doe not well, by this injustice to make amends for the said negligence. Like as it is reported of Aesope, who in times past came hither to this city, being sent from king Croesus with a great summe of golde, for to sacrifice unto god Apollo in magnificent wife, yea, and to distribute among all the citizens of Delphus, * some pounds a piece: but it was fustined so, that he fell out with the inhabitants of the city upon some occasion, and was exceedingly angry with them, inasmuch as he performed in deed the sacrifice accordingly, but the rest of the money which he should have dealt among the people, he sent backe againe to the city of Sardis, as if the Delphians had not bene worthy to enjoy the kings liberality; whereupon they taking great indignation, laied sacriledge to his charge, for detaining (in such sort) that sacred money; and in truth, after they had condemned him thereof, they pitched him downe headlong from that high rocke, which they call Hyampia: for which act of theirs, god Apollo was so highly displeased, that he sent upon their land sterility and barrennesse, besides many and sundry strange and unknown diseases among them, so as they were constrained in the end, to goe about in all the publicke feasts and generall assemblies of the Greeks, of purpose, to make proclamation by sound of trumpet: That whosoever hee was (kinsman or friend of Aesope) that would require satisfaction for his death, should come forth, and exact what penaltie he would desire: and thus they ceased not continually to call upon them; untill at length, and namely, in the third generation after, there presented himselfe a certaine Samian, named Idmon, who was nothing at all of kin to Aesope, but onely one of their posteritie, who at the first had bought him for a slave in open market, within the isle of Samos; and the Delphians having in some measure made satisfaction and recompense unto him, were immediately delivered from their calamities: and it is said, that from that time forward, the execution of sacrilegious persons, was translated from the foresaid rocke Hyampia, unto the cliffe of Nauplia. And verily, even those, who of all others most admire Alexander the Great & celebrate his memorial, of which nuber we also confesse our selves to be, can in no wise approve that which he did unto the Branchides, when he rased their citie to the very ground, & put all the inhabitants thereof to the sword, without respect either of age or of sex, for that their ancestours in olde time had betrayed and delivered up by treason, the temple of Miletum. And Agathocles the tyrant of Syracusa, who laughed and scoffed at the men of Corphu: for when they demanded of him the occasion why hee forraied their isle, made them this answer: Because (quoth hee) your forefathers in times past, received and entertained Ulysses. Semblably, when the islanders of Ithaca made complaint unto him of his souldiers, for driving away their sheepe: Why? (quoth he) your king, when he came one time into our island, not onely tooke away our sheepe, but also put out the eie even of our shepheard. Thinke you not then that Apollo dealt more absurdly and unjustly than all these, in destroying the Phenecotes at this day, in stopping up the mouth of that bottomlesse pit that was wont to receive and soake up all the waters which now doe overflow their whole countrey; because that a thousand yeeres agoe (by report) Hercules having taken away from the Delphians, that sacred trefect, from which the oracles were delivered, brought the fame to the citie Pheneum? And as for the Sybarites, he answered them directly: That their miseries should then cease, when they had appeased the ire of Juno Lencadia, by three lundry mortalities. Certes, long agoe it is not, since that the Locrians desisted and gave oversending every yere their daughters, virgins, unto Troie,

*Who there went bare-foot, and did serve all day from morne to night,
In habit of poore wretched slaves,
In no apparell dight;
No coife, no cule, nor honest veile, were they allow'd to weare
In decent wise for womanhood,*

though aged now they were:
 Resembling such as neuer rest,
 but Pallas temple sweepe,
 And sacred altar daily cleanse,
 where they do alway keepe.

and all for the lasciuious wantonnesse and incontinence of Ajax. How can this be either just or reasonable, considering that we blame the very Thracians, for that (as the report goes) they use still (even at this day) to beat their wives in revenge of Orpheus death? Neither do we commend the barbarous people, inhabiting along the river Po, who (as it is said) do yet mourne and weare blacke, for Phaeton his fall. Yet (in my conceit) it is a thing rather sottish and ridiculous, that whereas the men who lived in Phaeton his time, made no regard of his ruine: those that came five (yea, and ten) ages after his wofull calamitie, should begin to change their raiment for his sake, and bewaile his death: for surely, herein there is nothing at all to be noted, but meere folly, no harme, no danger or absurditie (otherwise) doth it containe. But what reason is it, that the wrath and judgement of the gods, hidden (upon a sudden) at the very time of some hainous fact committed (as the proprietie is of some rivers) should breake out, and shew it selfe afterwards, upon others, yea, and end with some extreame calamities? He had no sooner paused awhile, and staid the current of his speech: but I doubting whereto his words would tend, and fearing lest he should proceed to utter more absurdities and greater follies, presently made this reply upon him: And thinke you, sir, indeed, that all is true that you have said? What if all (quoth he) be not true, but some part thereof only, thinke you not yet, that the same difficultie in the question still remaineth? Even so peradventure (quoth I) it fareth with those who are in an extreame burning fever, who whether they have more or lesse clothes upon them, feelee euermore within them the same excessive heat of the ague; yet for to comfort and refresh them a little, and to give them some ease, it is thought good to diminish their clothes, and take off some of them. But if you are not so disposed, let it alone, you may do your pleasure; howbeit, this one thing I will say unto you, that the most part of these examples resemble fables and fictions, devised for pleasure: Call to mind therefore and remembrance, the feast celebrated of late in their honour, who sometime received the gods into their houses, and gave them intertainment; also that beautiful & honorable portion set by apart, which by the voice of an herald was published expressly to be for the posterity descended from Pindarus, and record with your selfe how honorable and pleasant a thing this seemeth unto you, And who is there (quoth he) that would not take pleasure to see this preeminence and preference of honour so naturall, so plaine, and so ancient, after the maner of the old Greeks, unless he be such an one, as (according to the same Pindarus)

Whole heart all black of metall forgiu
 And by cold flame, made stiffe and hardened is.

I omit (quoth I) to speake of the like solemne commendation published in Sparta, which ensued ordinarily after the Lesbian song, or canticle in the honor and memoriall of that ancient Terpander: for it seemeth, that there is the same reason of them both: But you who are of the race of Opulites, and thinke your selfe woorthy to be preferred before all others, nor Bacotians onely, but Phocæans also; and that in regard of your stock-father Daiphantus, have assisted and seconded me, when I maintained before the Lycormians and Satilaions (who claimed the priuledge and honor of wearing coronets due by our lawes and statutes unto the progenie of Hercules) That such dignities and prerogatives ought inuolably to be preserved and kept for those indeed who descend in right line from Hercules, in regard of his beneficiall demerites which in times past he heaped upon the Greeks, and yet during his life, was not thought woorthy of reward and recompence: You have (quoth he) revived the memorie of a most pleasant question to be debated, and the same marvelous well beleeving the profession of Philosophie: But I pray you my very good friend (quoth I unto him,) forbear this vehemence and acculatorie humour of yours, and be not angry, if haply you seee that some because they be borne of leud and wicked parents, are punished; or else doe not reioyce so much, nor be ready to praise, in case you see nobilitie also of birth to be so highly honored: for if we stand upon this point, and dare avow, that recompence of vertue ought by right and reason to continue in the line and posteritie; we are by good consequence to make this account, that punishment likewise should not stay and cease together with misdeeds committed, but reciprocally fall upon those that are descended of misdoers and malefactors: for he who willingly seeth the progenie of Cimon, honoured at Athens, and contrariwise is offended and displeased in his heart, to see the race of Lachares, or Ariston banished & driven out of the cities (he I say) seemeth to be too soft, tender, and passing effeminate, or rather to speake more properly, over-contentious and quarrelsome, even against the gods, complaining and murmuring of the one side; if the children, & childrens children of an impious & wicked person do prosper in the world: and contrariwise is no lesse given to blame and find fault, if he doe see the posterity of wicked and ungracious men to be held under, plagued, or altogether destroyed from the face of the earth; accusing the gods if the children of a naughtie man be afflicted even as much as if they had honest persons to their parents: But as for these reasons alledged, make you this reckoning, that they be bulwarks and rampars for you, opposed against such bitter & sharpe accusers as these be. But now taking in hand again the end (as it were) of a clew of thread, or a bottom of yeare, to direct us as in a darke place, and where there be many cranks, turnings and windings to and fro (I meane the matter of gods secret judgements) let us conduct and guide our selves gently and warily, according to that which is most likely & probable, considering that even of those things which we daily manage, and doe our selves, we are not able to set downe an undoubted certaintie: as for example; who can yeeld a found reason, wherefore we cause and bid the children of those parents who died either of the phthisick and consumption of the lungs, or of the drop sicke, to sit with their feet drenched in water, until the dead corps be fully burned in the funeral fire? For an opinion there is, that by this meanes the said maladies shall not passe unto them as hereditarie, nor take hold of their bodies: as also, what the cause should be, that if a goat hold in her mouth the herbe called Fryngites, that is to say, Sea-holly, the whole flocke will stand still, untill such time as the goat-herd come and take the said herbe out of her mouth: Other hidden properties there be, which by secret influences and passages from one to another, worke strange effects, and incredible, as well speedily, as in longer tract of time: and in very truth, we wonder more at the intermission and stay of time betwene, than we doe of the distance of place, and yet there is greater occasion to marvell thereat: as namely, that a pestilent maladic which began in Aethiopia, should raigne in the citie of Athens, and fill every street and corner thereof, in such sort, as Pericles died, and Thucydides was sicke thereof, than that when the Phocæans and Sybarits had committed some hainous sins, the punishment therefore should fall upon their children, & go through their posteritie? For surely these powers and hidden properties have certaine relations and correspondences from the last to the first; the cause whereof, although it be unknowne to us, yet it ceaseth not secretly to bring forth her proper effects. But there seemeth to be verie apparent reason of justice, that publicke vengeance from above should fall upon cities many a yeere after; for that a citie is one entire thing, and a continued body as it were, like unto a living creature, which goeth not beside or out of it selfe for any mutations of ages, nor in tract and continuance of time, changing first into one, and then into another by succession, but is alwaies uniforme and like it selfe, receiving euermore, and taking upon it, all the thanks for well doing, or the blame for misdeeds, of whatsoever it doth or hath done in common, so long as the societie that linketh & holdeth it together maintaineth her unitie: for to make many, yea & innumerable cities of one, by dividing it according to space of time, were as much as to go about to make of one man many, because he is now become old, who before was a yong youth, & in times past also a very stripling or springall: or else to speake more properly, this resembleth the devices of Epicharmus, wherupon was invented that maner of Sophisters arguing, which they call the Croissant argument; for thus they reason: He that long since borrowed or tooke up money, now oweth it not, because he is no more himselfe, but become another: & he that yesterday was invited to a feast, cometh this day as an unbidden guest, considering that he is now another man. And verily, diuers ages make greater difference in each one of us, than they do commonly in cities and States: for he that had seene the citie of Athens thirtie yeeres agoe, and came to visit it at this day, would know it to be altogether the very same that then it was; inasmuch as the manners, customes, motions, games, pastimes, serious affaires, favours of the people, their pleasures, displeasures and anger at this present, resemble wholly those in ancient time: whereas if a man be any long time out of sight, hardly his very familiar friend shall be able to know him, his countenance will be so much changed; and as touching his maners and behaviour, which alter and change so soone upon every occasion, by reason of all sorts of labour, travell, accidents and lawes, there is such varietie and so great alteration, that even he who is ordinarily acquainted and conversant with him, would marvell to see the strangeness and novelty thereof; and yet the man is held and reputed still the same, from his nativitie unto his dying day: and in like case, a citie remaineth alwaies one and the selfe same; in which respect we deeme it great reason, that it should participate aswell the blame and reproch of ancestours, as enjoy their glorie and punishment, unlesse we make no care to cast all things in the river of Heracitus, into which (by report) no one thing entreteth twise, for that it hath a propertie to alter all things and change their nature. Now it be so, that a citie is an united and continued thing in it selfe, we are to thinke no lesse of a race and progenie, which dependeth upon one and the same stocke, producing and bringing forth a certaine power and communication of qualities, and the same doth reach and extend to all those who descend from it: neither is the thing ingendred of the same nature that a piece of worke is, wrought by art, which incontinently is separate from the workeman, for that it is made by him, and not of him; whereas contrariwise, that which is naturally engendred, is formed of the very substance of that which ingendred it, in such sort as it doth carie about it some part thereof, which by good right deserueth either to be punished or to be honoured even in it selfe. And were it not, that I might be thought to jest & speake in game and not in good earnest, I would aue and pronounce assuredly, that the Athenians offered more wrong and abuse unto the brazen statue of Cassander, which they caused to be defaced and melted; and likewise the dead corps of Dionysius suffered more iniurie at the hands of the Syracusians, which after his death they caused to be carried out of their confines, than if they had proceeded in rigor of justice against their offspring and posterity; for the said image of Cassander did not participate one whit of his nature; and the soule of Dionysius was departed a good while before out of his bodie: whereas Nisem, Apollocrates, Anipater, Philip & all such other, descended from vicious & wicked parents, retained still the chiefe and principall part which is in them inbred, and remained not quiet, idle and doing nothing, but such as whereby they live and are nourished, whereby they negotiate, reason and discourse: neither ought it to seeme strange and incredible, that being of their issue, they should likewise retein their qualities and inclinations. In summe, I say and asseuer, that like as in Physicke, whatsoever is helofome and profitable, the same is also iust; and worthy were he to be laughed at and mocked, that calleth him unjust, who for the Satiara or disease of the huckle-bone, would cauterize the thumbe; or when the liver is impolluted, scarifie the bellie; and if kine or oxen be tender and soft in the clees, anoint the extremities and tips of their hornes; even so he deserueth to be scorned and reprov'd as a man of a shallow conceit, who in chastisement of vice, esteemeth any other thing iust, than that which may cure and heale the same; or who is offended and angry, if a medicine be applied, or a course of Physicke used into some parts for curing others; as they do who open a veine for to heale the inflammation of the eies: such an one (I say) seemeth to see and perceive no further than his owne outward senses leade him, and remembereth not well, that a schoolemaster often times in whipping one of his scholars, keepeth all the rest in awe and good order; and a great captaine and generall of the field, in pitting to death for exemplarie justice, one souldier in every ten, reformeth all besides, and reduceth them to their dutie; and even so there happen not onely to one part by another, but also to one soule by another, certaine dispositions, aswell to worke and impairing, as to better and amendment, yea, and much more than to one body by the meanes of another; for that there, to wit, in a bodie, there must (by all likelihood) be one impression and the same alteration; but here, the soule (which often times is led and caried away by imagination, either to be confident, or distrustfull and timorous) fareth better or worse accordingly. And as I was going forward to speake, Olympicus interrupting my speech: By these words of yours (quoth he) you seeme to set downe as a supposall, a subject matter of great consequence and discourse, to wit, the immortallitie of the soule, as if it remained still after the separation from the body: Yea mary (quoth he) & even this have I inferred by that which you do now grant, or rather have granted heretofore; for our discourse hath bene from the beginning profecuted to this presupposed point: That God dealeth & distributeth to every of us according as we have deserved. And how (quoth he) doth this follow necessarily, that in case God doth behold all humane affaires, & dispose of every particular thing here upon earth, the soules therefore should become either immortal & incorruptible, or els continue in their entire estate long after death? O good sir (quoth I) be content; is God (thinke you) so base minded, or imploied in so small & trifling matters, and having so little to do, that (when we have no diuine thing in us, nor ought that in any sort resembleth him, or is firme and durable, but that we continually decay, fade and perith like unto the leaves of trees (as Homer saith) and that in a small time) he should all on a sudden make so great account of us (like to those women, who cherish and keepe the gardens (as they say) of Adonis within brittle pots and pannes of earth) as to make our soules, for one day to flourish and looke greene greene within our fleshly body, which is not capable of any strong root of life, and then within a while after, suffer them to be extinguished and to die upon the least occasion in the world? But if you please, let us passe other gods, and consider wee a little this our God onely, him I meane, who is honoured and invocated in this place, namely, whether hee (knowing that the soules of the dead are presently exhale and vanished away to nothing, like unto a vapour or smoake, breathing forth of our bodies) doth ordeine incontinently oblations to be offered, and propitiatorie sacrifices to be made for the departed? and whether he demand not great honors, worship and veneration in the memoriall of the dead? or whether hee doth it to abuse and deceive those that beleve accordingly? For I assure you, for my part I will never graunt that the soule dieth, but remaineth still after death, unlesse some one or other (as by report Hercules did in old time) come first and take away the propheticall stooke or resect of Pythius, and destroy the oracle for ever rendering any more answers, as it hath delivered even unto these our daies, such as by report was given in old time to Corax the Naxian in these words:

Impieie great it is for to belevee,

That soules doe die, and not for ever live.

Then Patroclus: What prophetic (quoth he) was this? and who was that Corax? for surely the thing it selfe, & that very name, be both of them strange and unknown to me: That cannot be (quoth I) but thinke better of the matter; for it is long of me who have used his surname in Read of his proper name; for I mean him who slew Archilochus in battel, whose name indeed was Calondas, but men surnamed him Corax: This man was at the first rejected by the prophetesse Pythia, as a murderer who had killed a worthy personage consecrated & devoted unto the Muses; but afterwards having used certaine humble prayers & requests, together with divers allegations of excuse, pretending to justify his fact, in the end he was enjoined by the oracle, to go to the house & habitation of Tettix, & there by certaine expiatorie sacrifices & oblations, to appeale & pacifie the ghost of Archilochus; now this house of Tettix was the cape or promontory Tenarus; for it is said, that Tettix the Cadian, arriving with his fleet in times past, at the head of Tenarus there built a citie, & inhabited it, nere unto the place where the manner was to conjure spirits, & raise the ghosts of those that were departed: The semblable answer being made to those of Sparta, namely, that they should make meanes to pacifie the soule of Paufanias, they sent as farre as into Italy for sacrificers exorcists, who had the skill to conjure spirits, & they with their sacrifices chased his ghost out of the temple: This is one reason therefore (quoth I) that doth confirme and prove, that both the world is governed by the providence of God, and also, that the soules of men do continue after death: neither is it possible that we should admit the one, & denie the other: If it be so then that the soule of man hath a subsistence & being after death; it is more probable & foundeth to greater reason, that it should then either taste of paine for punishment, or enjoy honor for reward: for during this life here upon earth, it is in continuall combat in manner of a champion; but after all combats performed & finished, then she receiveth according to her deserts. Now as touching those honors or punishments which it receiveth in that other world, lone by her selfe, and separate from the bodie, the same concern and touch us nothing, who remaine alive; for either we know them not, or give no beleife thereto; but such as be either conferred or inflicted upon their children or posteritie, for that they be apparant and evident to the world, those doe containe and curbe wicked men, that they doe not execute their malicious desseignes: And considering that there is no punishment more ignominious, or that commeth neerer to the quicke, and toucheth the heart more, than for men to see their offspring, or those that depend upon them, afflicted for their sake & punished for their faults; & that the soule of a wicked person, enemy to God and to all good lawes, seeth after his death, not his images & statues, or any ensignes of honor overthrowne, but his owne children, his friends & kinsfolk ruinate, undone & persecuted with great miseries & tribulations, suffering grievous punishment for it; there is no man I thinke, but would chuse rather to forgoe all the honors of Jupiter, if he might have them, than to become againe either unjust or intemperate & lascivious. And for the better testimonie & truth hereof, I could relate unto you a narration which was delivered unto me not long since, but that I am afraid you will take it for a fabuolous tale, devised to make sport: In regard whereof I hold it better to alledge unto you nothing but substantiall reasons, and arguments grounded upon very good likelihood and probability. Not so (quoth Olympicus) in any case; but rehearse unto us the narration which you speake of: And when others also requested the same at my hands: Suffer me yet first (quoth I) to set abroad those reasons which carie some good shew of truth, and then afterwards, if you thinke well of it, I will recite the fable also, if so be it is a fable: As for Bion when he saith, that God in punishing the children of wicked men and sinners for their fathers, is much more ridiculous than the physician, who for the maladie of father or grandfire, goeth about to minister medicine unto the child or nephew; surely this comparison faultereth herein, that things be partly semblable, and in part diuers and unlike; for if one be cured of a disease by medicinable means, this doth not by and by heale the maladie or indisposition of another: For neuer was there man yet being sicke of a fever, or troubled with bleered and impostumate eyes, became cured by seeing an ointment applied, or a salve laid unto another: But contrariwise, the punishment or execution of justice upon malefactors, is for this cause done publicly before all the world, that justice being ministered with reason and discretion, should effect thus much, namely to keepe in, and retaine some by the chastisement and correction of others: But that point wherein the foresaid comparison of Bion answereth to our matter in question, himselfe neuer understood; for many times it falleth out, that a man being fallen sicke of a dangerous disease, howbeit not incurable, yet through his intemperance and disorder afterwards, suffereth his bodie to grow into greater weaknesse and decay, untill at last he dieth: whereupon his sonne after him being not actually surprised with the same disease, but onely disposed thereto, a learned physician, some trustie friend, or an expert annointer, and master of exercises, perceiving so much, or rather indeed a kind friend and gentle master & governor, who hath a careful eye over him, taketh him in hand, bringeth him to an exquisite maner of austere diet, cutteth off all superfluity of viands, deintie cares, & bancketing dishes, debaureth him of unseasonable drinkings, and the company of women, purgeth him continually with soveraigne medicines, keepeth his bodie downe by ordinarie labour and exercise, and so doth dissipate and dispatch the first beginning and small inclination to a dangerous disease, in not permitting it to have head & to grow forward to any greatnesse: And is not this an usual practise among us to admonish those who are borne of sickly and diseased parents, to take good heed unto themselves, and not to neglect their indisposition, but betimes and even at the very first to endeavor for to remoove and rid away the root of such inbred maladies, which they bring with them into the world? for surely it is an easie matter to expell and drive out, yea and to conquer and overcome the same, by prevention in due time: Yes verily answered they all. Well then (quoth I) we commit too absurditie, nor doe any ridiculous thing, but that which is right, necessarie and profitable, when we ordeine and prescribe for the children of those who are subject to the falling sicknesse, to madnesse, phrenesie and the gout, exercises of the bodie, diets, regiments of life, and medicines appropriate for those maladies, not when they are sicke thereof, but by way of precaution, to prevent that they should not fall into them: for the bodie ingendred of a corrupt and diseased bodie, neither needeth nor deserveth any punishment, but physicke rather by good medicines and careful attendance; which diligence and heedfull regard, if any one upon wantonnesse, nicetie and delicacie doe call chastisement, because it depriveth a man of pleasures and delights, or haply inferreth some pricke of dolour and paine, let him goe as he is, we passe not for him. Now if it be expedient to cure and medicine carefully one bodie issued and descended from another that is corrupt, is it meete and convenient to let go the resemblance of an hereditarie vice, which beginneth to bud and sprout in a young man, to stay and suffer it (I say) to grow on still, burgen and spread into all affections, untill it appeare in the view of the whole world? for as Pindarus saith:

*The foolish heart doth bring forth from within,
Her hidden fruit, corrupt and full of sin.*

And thinke you not that in this point God is wiser than the Poet Hesiodus, who admonisheth us and giveth counsell in this wise:

*No child'en get, if thou be newly come From dolefull grave or heavey funeral:
But spare not when thou art returned home
From solemne feast of Gods celestiall.*

as if he would induce men to beget their children, when they be jocund, fresh and merry, for that the generation of them received the impression, not of vertue and vice onely, but also of joy, sadness, & all other qualities: howbeit, this is not a worke of humane wisdom (as Hesiodus supposeth) but of God himselfe, to discern & foreknow perfectly either the conformities or the diversities of mens natures, drawn from their progenitors, before such time as they breake forth into some great enormities, whereby their passions & affections be discovered what they are: for the young whelps of beares, wolves, apes & such like creatures, shew presently their natural inclination, on, even whilst they be very young, because it is not disguised or masked with any thing; but the nature of man casting it selfe, and setting upon maners, customes, opinions & lawes, concealeth often times the ill that it hath, but doth imitate & counterfeit that which is good and honest; in such sort as it may be thought either to have done away cleane all the staine, blemish & imperfection of vices inbred with it, or els to have hidden it a long time, being covered with the vail of craft & subtiltie, so as we are not able, or at leastwise have much adoe to perceive their malice, by the sting, bit & pricke of every several vice. And to say a truth, herein are we mightily deceived; that we thinke men are become unjust then only and not before; when they do injurie; or disloyalty, when they play some insolent and loose part; cowardly minded, when they run out of the field; as if a man should have the coeurt, that the sting in a scorpion was then bred & not before, when he gave the first pricke; or the poison in vipers was ingendred then only, when they bit or stung; which surely were great simplicitie and meere childishnesse: for a wicked person becometh not then such an one, even when he appeareth so, and not before; but hee hath the rudiments and beginnings of vice and naughtinesse imprinted in himselfe, but hee sheweth and utteth the same, when he hath meanes, fit occasion, good opportunitie, and might answerable to his minde; like as the thiefe spieth his time to robbe, and the tyrant to violate and breake the lawes. But God, who is not ignorant of the nature and inclination of every one, as who searcheth more into the secrets of the heart and minde than into the body, never waiteth and staileth untill violence be performed by strength of hand; impudencie bewrayed by malepart speech; or intemperance and wantonnesse perpetrated by the naturall members and privie parts, ere he punish: for he is not revenged of an unrighteous man, for any harme and wrong that he hath received by him; nor angry with a thiefe or robber, for any forcible violence which he hath done unto him; neyer hateth an adulterer, because he hath suffered abuse or injurie by his meanes; but many times he chastiseth by way of medicine, a person that committeth adulterie; a covetous wretch and a breaker of the lawes; whereby otherwhiles he riddeth them of their vice, and preventeth in them (as it were) the falling sicknesse before the fit surpriseth them. Wee were ere while offended and displeased, that wicked persons were over-late and too slowly punished; and now discontented we are, & complaine, for that God doth repress & chastise the evill habit and vicious disposition of some, before the act committed; never considering and knowing, that full often a future mischiefe is worse and more to be feared, than the present; and that which is secret and hidden, more dangerous than that which is open and apparent. Neither are we able to comprehend and conceive by reason, the causes wherefore it is better otherwhiles to tolerate and suffer some persons to be quiet, who have offended and transgressed already; and to prevent or stay others, before they have executed that which they intend: like as (in very truth) wee know not the reason, why medicines and physickal drogues (being not meet for some who are sicke) be good and holmes for others, though they are not actually diseased; yet haply in a more dangerous estate than the former. Hereupon it is, that the gods turne not upon the children and posterity, all the faults of their fathers and ancestours: for if it happen, that of a bad father there descend a good sonne, like as a sickly and crasse man may beget a sound, strong and healthfull childe, such an one is exempt from the paine and punishment of the whole house and race, as being translated out of a vicious familie, and adopted into another: but, that a young sonne (who shall conform himselfe to the hereditarie vice of his parents) is liable to the punishment of their sinfull life, as well as he his bound to pay their debts by right of succession and inheritance. For Antigonus was not punished for the finnes of his father Demetrius; nor (to speake of laud persons) Philem for Angas; ne yet Neslor for Nilem his fake; who albeit they were descended from most wicked fathers, yet they proved themselves right honest: but all such, as whose nature loved, embraced and practised that which came unto them by descent and parentage; in those (I say) diuine justice is wont to persecute and punish that which resembleth vice and sinne: for like as the werts, blacke moales, spots and freckles of fathers, not appearing as at all upon their owne childrens skinn, begin afterwards to put forth and shew themselves in their nephews, to wit, the children of their sonnes and daughters: And there was a Grecian woman, who having brought forth a blacke infant, and being troubled therefore, and judicially accused for adultrie, as if shee had bene conceived by a blacke-moore, shee pleaded and was found to have bene herselfe descended from an Aethiopian, in the fourth degree removed: As also it is known for certaine, that of the children of Pytho the Nisibian who was descended from the race and line of those old Spartans, who were the first lords and founders of Thebes, the youngest, and he that died not long since, had upon his body the print and forme of a speare, the very true and naturall marke of that ancient line; so long and after the revolution of so many yeeres; there sprang and came up againe as it were out of the deepe, this resemblance of the stocke and kinred: even so it falleth out many times, that the first generations and descent, doe hide and after a sort drowne those qualities and affections of the minde which are affected and appropriate to some kinred; but afterwards, at one time or other, put them forth, and drive them outward to appeare in those that follow, and the same doe represent that which is proper to each race, as well in vertue as vice. Now when I had finished this speech, I held my peace; and with that Olympicus smiled and said: Wee would not haue you to thinke (quoth he) that we commend you, as having sufficiently proved your discourse by demonstration, lest we might seeme to have forgotten or to neglect the tale or narration which you promised to relate unto us: Mary then will we give our sentence and opinion thereof, when we shall likewise have heard the same. Thus therefore I began againe to enter into speech, and follow my intended purpose. There was one Thebesius, of the city of Soli in Cilicia, a great friend and familiar of Protagenes, who sometime here conuerſed with us, who having led his youthful daies very loosely, within a small time had wasted and consumed all his goods, whereby he was fallen for a certain space to extreme want and necessitie, which brought him also to a leud life, in so much as he proved a very badde man; and repenting his former follies and dispense, began to make shifts, and seeke all meanes to recover his state againe; much like unto those loose and lasciuious persons, who making no account of their lawfull and espoused wives, nor caring at all for them whiles they haue them; afterwards, when they haue cast them off, and put them away, seeing them wedded unto others, sollicite them to yeeld their bodies, & give the attempt to force and corrupt them most wickedly: Thus he forbore no leud, indirect, and shamefull practises, so they turned to his gaine and profit, and within a little while, he gat together not great store of goods, but procured to himselfe a bad name of wicked dealing, much shame, and infamie: But the thing that made him famous, and so much spoken of; was the answer delivered unto him from the oracle of Amphilocheus, for thither had he sent, as it should seeme, to know whether he should live the rest of his life better than he had done before: Now the oracle returned this answer: That it would be better with him after he was dead; which in some sort hapned unto him not long after: For being fallen from an high place with his head forward, without any limme broken, or wound made; onely with the fall, the breath went out of his body, and there he lay for dead; and three daies after, preparation being made for his funerals, caried forth he was to be buried; but behold all on a sudden, he revived, and quickly came to himselfe againe; whereupon there ensued such a change and alteration in his life, that it was wonderfull; for by the report and testimony of all the people of Cilicia, they never knew man of a better confidence in all his affaires and dealings, whiles he did negotiate and dwell among them; none more devout and religious to God-ward, none more fast and sure to his friends, none bitterer to his enemies, in so much, as they who were most inward with him, and had kept his company familiarly a long time, were very desirous & earnest with him, to know the cause of so strange and sudden alteration; as being perfected that so great amendment of life (so loose & dissolute as it was before) could not come by meere chance and casualtie, (as in truth it did,) according as himselfe made relation unto the said Protagenes, and other such familiar friends of his; men of good worth & reputation; for thus he reported unto them & said: That when the spirit was out of his bodie, he fared at the first (as he thought himselfe) like unto a pilot, flung out of his ship, and plunged into the bottome of the sea; so wonderfully was he astonished at this change; but afterwards when as by little & little he was raised up againe and recovered, so that he was ware that he drew his breath fully, and at libertie, he looked round about him, for his soule seemed as if it had bene one eie fully open; but he beheld nothing that he was wont to view, onely he thought that he saw planets and other starres of an huge bignesse, distant an infinit way a funder, and yet for multitude innumerable, casting from them a wonderfull light, with a colour admirable, and the same glittering and shining most resplendent, with a power and force incredible, in so such sort, as the said soule being gently and easily caried, as in a chariot, with this splendor and radiant light, as it were upon the sea in a calme, went quickly whether fover the world; but letting passe a great number of things woorthy there to be scene; he said that he beheld how the soules of those that were departed this life, as they rose up and ascended, resembled certaine small fire bubbles, and the aire gave way and place unto them as they mounted on high; but anon when these bubbles by little and little brast in funder, the soules came forth of them, and appeared in the forme and shape of men and women, very light and nimble, as discharged from

from all poise to beare them downe: howbeit, they did not move and bestir themselves all alike and after one sort; for some leaped with a wonderful agilitie, and mounted directly and plumb upright; others turned round about together like unto bobbins or spindles, one while up and another while downe, so as their motion was mixt and confused, and so linked together, that uneth for a good while and with much ado, they could be staid and severed afunder. As for these soules and spirits, many of them he knew not (as hee said) who they were; but taking knowledge of two or three among them who had bene of his olde acquaintance, he pressed forward to approach neere and to speake unto them: but they neither heard him speake, nor in deed were in their right senses; but being after a sort astonished and beside themselves, refused once to be either scene or felt, wandering and flying to and fro apart at the first; but afterwards, encountering and meeting with a number of others disposed like unto themselves, they closed and clung unto them, and thus linked and coupled together, they mooved here and there disorderly without discretion, and were caried every way to no purpose, uttering I wot not what voices, after a manner of yelling or a blacke-sanctus, not significant nor distinct, but as if they were cries mingled with lamentable plaints and dreadfull feare. Yet there were others to be scene aloft in the upmost region of the aire, jocund, gay and pleasant, so kinde also an courteous, that often times they would seeme to approach neere one unto another, turning away from those other that were tumultuous and disorderly; and as it should seeme, they shewed some discontentment, when they were thronged and huddled close together; but well appaied and much pleased, when they were enlarged and severed at their liberty. Among these (by his owne saying) he had a sight of a soule belonging to a kinsman and familiar friend of his, & yet he knew him not certainly, for that he died whiles himselfe was a very child; howbeit, the said soule comming toward him, saluted him in these termes: God save you Thebesius: whereat he marvelled much, and said unto him: I am not Thebesius, but my name is Ardeus: True in deed (quoth the other) before-time you were so called, but from henceforth * Thebesius shall be your name; for dead you are not yet, but by the providence of God and permission of Destinie, you are hither come, with the intellectuall part of the soule; and as for all the rest, you have left it behinde, sticking fast as an anchor to your bodie: and that you may now know this and evermore hereafter, take this for a certaine rule and token: That the spirits of those who are departed and dead indeed, yeeld no shadow from them; they neither wincke nor yet open their eies. Thebesius hearing these words, began to plucke up his spirits so much the more, for to consider and discourse with himselfe: looking therefore every way about him, he might perceive that there accompanied him a certaine shadowy and darke lineature, whereas the other soules shone round about, and were cleere and transparent within forth, howbeit, not all alike; for some yeelded from them pure colour, uniforme and equall, as doth the full moone when she is at the clearest; others had (as it were) scales or cicatrices, dispersed here and there by certaine distant spaces betwene; some againe, were wonderfull hideous and strange to see unto, all to be specked with blacke spots, like to serpents skinned; and others had light scarifications and obscure risings upon their visage. Now this kinsman of Thebesius (for 40 there is no danger at all to tearme soules by the names which men had whiles they were living) discoursed severally of each thing, saying: That Adrastia the daughter of Jupiter and Zeusire, was placed highest and above the rest, to punish and to be revenged of all sorts of crimes and heinous finnes; and that of wicked and finfull wretches, there was not one (great or small) who either by force or cunning could ever save himselfe and escape punishment: but one kinde of paine and punishment (for three sorts there be in all) belonged to this gaoler or executioner, and another to that; for there is one which is quicke and speedie, called pena: that is, Penaltie, and this taketh in hand the execution and chastisement of those, who immediately in this life (whiles they are in their bodies) be punished by the bodie, after a milde and gentle manner, leaving unpunished many light faults, which require onely some petie purgation; but such as require more ado to have their vices and finnes cured, God committeth them to be punished after death to a second tormentresse, named Dice, that is to say, Revenge; many those who are so laden with finnes, that they be altogether incurable, when Dice hath given over and thrust them from her, the third ministresse of Adrastia, which of all other is most cruell, and named Erimys runneth after, chasing and pursuing them as they wander and runne up and downe; these (I say) she courseth and hunteth with great miserie and much dolor, untill such time as she have overtaken them all and plunged them into a bottomlesse pit of darkenesse inenarrable and invisible. Now of these three sorts of punishments, the first which is executed by Pena, in this life resembleth bleth that which is used in some barbarous nations : for in Perſia, when any are by order of law and judicially to be punished, they take from them their copped caps or high pointed turbans, and other robes, which they plucke and pull haire by haire, yea, and whip them before their faces, and they themselves shedding teares and weeping, crie out piteously and beseech the officers to cease and give over; seembably, the punishments inflicted in this life in bodie or goods, are not exceeding sharpe nor come very nere to the quick, neither do they pierce & reach unto the vice and sinne it selfe, but the most part of them are imposed according to a bare opinion onely, and the judgement of outward naturall sense. But if it chance (quoth he) that any one escape hither unpunished, and who hath not bene well purged there before, him Dice taketh in hand all bare and naked as he is, with his soule discovered and open, as having nothing to hide, to palliate and maske his wickednesse, but lying bare and exposed to the view thoroughout, and on every side, she presenteth and sheweth him first to his parents, good and honest persons (if haply they were such) declaring how abominable he is, how dextenerate and unworthy of his parentage; but if they also were wicked, both he and they susteine so much more grievous punishment, whiles he is tormented in seeing them, and they likewise in beholding him how he is punished a long time, even untill every one of his crimes and finnes be dispatched and rid away with most dolorous and painful torments, surpassing in sharpnesse and greatnesse, all corporall griefs, by how much a true vision indeed is more powerfull and effectuell than a vaine dreame or fantastick illusion: whereupon, the wales, marks, scarres and cicatrices of sinne and vice remaine to be seene, in some more, in others lesse. But observe well (quoth he) and consider the diuers colours of these soules of all sorts; for this blackish and soule dusky hew, is properly the tincture of avarice and niggardie; that which is deepe red and fierie, betokeneth cruelty and malice; whereas, if it stand much upon blew, it is a signe that there, intemperance and loosenesse in the use of pleasures, hath remained a long time, and will be hardly scowred off, for that it is a vile vice: but the violet colour and sweetish withall, proceedeth from envie, a venomous and poisoned colour, resembling the inke that commeth from the cuttle fish, for in life, vice when the saile is altered and changed by passions, and withall doth turne the body, putteth forth sundry colours: but heere it is a signe that the purification of the soule is fully finished, when as all these tinctures are done away quite, whereby the soule may appear in her native hew, all fresh, neat, cleare and lightsome: for so long as any one of these colours remaineth, there will be evermore some recidivation and returne of passions and affections, bringing certaine tremblings, beatings as it were of the pulse, and a panting in some but weak and feeble, which quickly faileth, and is soone extinguished; and in other more strong, quick, and vehement: Now of these soules, some there be which after they have bene well and thoroughly chastised, and that sundry times, recover in the end a decent habitude and disposition; but others againe are such, as the vehemence of their ignorance, and the flattering shew of pleasures and lustfull desire, transporteth them into the bodies of brute beasts; for the feeblenesse and defect of their understanding, and their sloth and slacknesse to contemplate and discourse by reason, maketh them to incline and creepe to the active part of generation; but then they find and perceive themselves destitute of a lascivious organ or instrument, whereby they may be able to execute and have the fruition of their appetite, and therefore desire by the meanes of the bodie to enjoy the same: for as much as, here there is nothing at all but a bare shadow, and as one would say, a vaine dreame of pleasure, which never commeth to perfection and fullnesse. When hee had thus said, he brought and lead me away, most swiftly, an infinit way; howbeit, with ease and gently, upon the raies of the light, as if they had bene wings, unto a certaine place, where there was a huge wide chinke, tending downward still, and thither being come, he perceived that he was forlorne and forsaken of that powerfull spirit that conducted and brought him thither; where he saw that other soules also were in the same case; for being gathered and flocked together like a sort of birds, they flic downward round about this gaping chawne, but enter into it directly they durst not; now the said chinke resembled for all the world within, the caves of Bacchus, so so capissid and adorned they were with the verdure of great leaves and branches, together with all varietie of gaie flowers, from whence arose and breathed forth a sweet and milde exhalation, which yielded a delectable and pleasant favour, woonderfull odoriferous, with a most temperate aire, which no lesse affected them that smelled thereof, than the sent of wine contenteth those who love to drinke: in such sort as the soules feeding and feasting themselves with these fragrant odors, were very cheerefull, jocund, and merrie; so as round about the said place, there was nothing but pastime, joy, solace, mirth, laughing and singing, much after the manner of men men that reioice one with another, and take all the pleasure and delight that possibly they can. And he said moreover, that Bacchus by that way mounted up into the societie of the gods, and afterwards conducted Semele; and withall, that it was called, the place of Lethé, that is to saie, Oblivion: Whereupon he would not let Thespesius, though he were exceeding desirous to stay there, but drew him away perforce; instructing him thus much; and giving him to understand, that reason and the intelligible part of the minde is dissolved, and as it were melted and moistened by this pleasure; but the unreasonable part which favoureth of the bodie, being watered and incarnate therewith, reviveth the memorie of the bodie; and upon this remembrance, the growth and ariseth a lust and concupiscence, which haleth and draweth unto generation (for so he called it) to wit, a consent of the soule thereto, weighed downe and aggravated with overmuch moisture: Having therefore traversed another way as long as the other, he was ware that he saw a mightie standing boll, into which divers rivers seemed to fall and discharge themselves, whereof one was whiter than the some of the sea, or driven snow, another of purple hue or scarlet colour, like to that which appeereth in the raine bow; as for others, they seemed a farr off to have every one of them their distinct lustre, and several tincture: But when they approached neere unto them, the foresaid boll, after that the aire about was disuffled and vanished awaie, and the different colours of those rivers no more seene, left the more flourishing colour, except onely the white: Then he saw there three Dæmons or Angels, sitting together in triangular forme, medling and mixing the rivers together, with certaine measures. And this guid of Thespesius soule said moreover, that Orpheus came so farr when he went after his wife; but for that he kept not well in minde, that which he there saw, he had sowne one false tale among men; to wit: That the oracle at Delphi was common to Apollo, and the Night, (for there was no commerce or fellowship at all betwene the night and Apollo) But this oracle (quoth he) is common to the moone and the night, which hath no determinate and certaine place upon the earth, but is alwaies errant and wandering among men, by dreames and apparitions; which is the reason that dreames compounded and mingled as you see, of fallshood and truth, of varietie and simplicity, are spread and scattered over the world. But as touching the oracle of Apollo, neither have you seene it (quoth he) nor ever shalbe able to see; for the terrene substance or earthly part of the soule, is not permitted to arise & mount up on high, but bendeth downward, being fastened unto the bodie: And with that he approached at once neerer, endeavoring to shew him the shining light of the threefeet or three-footed stoole, which (as he said) from the bosome of the goddess Thetis, reached as farr as to the mount Parnissus: And having a great desire to see the same, yet he could not, his eies were so dazzled with the brightnesse thereof; howbeit, as he passed by, a loud and shrill voice he heard of a woman, who, among other things delivered in metre, uttered also as it should seeme by way of prophesie, the very time of his death: And the Dæmon said, it was the voice of Sibylla; for she being caried round in the globe and face of the moone, did foretell and sing what was to come; but being desirous to heare more, he was repelled and driven by the violence of the moone as it were with certaine whirle puffs, cleane a contrarie way; so he could heare and understand but few things, and those very short; namely the accident about the hill * Vesuvius, and how Dicæarchia should be consumed and burnt by casual fire, as also a clause or peece of a verse, as touching the emperor who then reigned, to this effect:

*A gracious prince he is, but yet must die,
And empire leave by force of maladie.*

After this they passed on forward to see the paines and torments of those who were punished; and there at first they beheld all things most piteous and horrible to see to; for Thespesius who doubted nothing lesse, mette in that place with many of his friends, kinsfolke, and familiar companions, who were in torment, and suffering dolorous paines, and infamous punishment, they moved themselves, lamenting, calling and crying unto him; at the last he had a sight of his owne father, rising out of a deepe pit, full he was of pricks, gashes, and wounds, and stretching forth his hands unto him, was (mauger his heart) forced to breake silence, yea and compelled by those who had the charge and superintendence of the said punishments, to confesse with a loud and audible voice, that he had bene a wicked murderer of certaine strangers, and guests whom he had lodged in his house; for perceiving that they had silver and gold about them, he had wrought their death by the meanes of poison: and albeit he had not bene detected thereof in his life time, whiles he was upon the earth, yet here was he convicted and had fastened already part of his punishment, and expected to endure the rest afterwards. Now Thespesius

sin durst not make sute nor intercede for his father, so afflicted he was and astonished; but desirous to withdraw himselfe and be gone, he lost the sight of that courteous and kind guide of his, which all this while had conducted him, and he saw him no more: but hee might perceive other horrible and hideous spirits, who enforced and constrained him to passe farther, as if it were necessarie that he should trauele still more ground: so he saw those who were notorious malefactours, in the view of every man (or who in this world had bene chastised) how their shadow was here tormented with lesse paine, and nothing like to others, as having bene feeble and imperfect in the reasonlesse part of the soule, and therefore subject to passions and affections; but such as were disguised and cloaked with an outward appearance and reputation of vertue abroad, and yet had lived covertly and secretly at home in wickednesse, certaine that were about to them, forced some of them to turne the inside outward, and with much paine and griefe to lay themselves open, to bend and bow, and discover their hypocritical hearts within, even against their owne nature, like unto the scolopenders of the sea, when they have swallowed downe an hooke, are wont to turne themselves outward: but others they flaid and displaid, discovering plainly and openly, how faulty, perverse and vicious they had bene within, as whose principall part of the reasonable soule, vice had possessed. He said moreover, that he saw other souls wound and enterlaced one within another, two, three and more together, like to vipers and other serpents, and these not forgetting their olde grudge and malicious ranker one against another, or upon remembrance of losses and wrongs susteined by others, fell to gnawing and deuouring each other. Also, that there were three parallel lakes ranged in equall distance one from the other; the one seething and boiling with golde, another of lead exceeding cold, and a third, most rough, consisting of yron: and that there were certaine spirits called Demons, which had the overlooking and charge of them; and these, like unto metall-founders or smithes, with certaine instruments either plunged in, or els drew out, soules. As for those who were given to filthy lucre, and by reason of insatiable avarice, committed wicked parts, those they let downe into the lake of melted golde, and when they were once set on a light fire, and made transparent by the strength of those flames within the said lake, then plunged they were into the other of lead; where after they were congealed and hardened in maner of haile, they transported them anew into the third lake of yron, where they became exceeding blacke and horrible, and being crackt and broken, by reason of their drinnesse and hardnesse, they changed their forme, and then at last (by his saying) they were thrown againe into the foresaid lake of gold, suffering by the meanes of these changes and mutations, intolerable paines. But those foules (quoth he) who made the greatest moane unto him, and seemed most miserably (of all others) to be tormented, were they, who thinking they were escaped and past their punishment, as who had suffered sufficiently for their deserts at the hands of vengeance, were taken againe, and put to fresh torments; and those they were, for whose finnes their children and others of their posteritie suffered punishment: for whensoever one of the foules of these children or nephewes in lineall descent, either met with them, or were brought unto them, the same fell into a fit of anger, crying out upon them, shewing the marks of the torments and paines that it susteined, reproching and hitting them in the teeth therefore; but the other making haste to flee and hide themselves, yet were not able so to doe; for incontinently the tormentors followed after and pursued them, who brought them backe againe to their punishment, crying out, and lamenting for nothing so much, as that they did foresee the torment which they were to suffer, as having experience thereof alreadye. Furthermore, he said that he saw some, and those in number many, either children or nephewes, hanging together fast, like bees or bats, murmuring and grumbling for anger, when they remembered and called to minde what sorowes and calamities they susteined for their sake. But the last thing that he saw, were the foules of such as entred into a second life and new natiuite, as being turned and transformed forcibly into other creatures of all sorts, by certaine workemen appointed therefore, who with tooles for the purpose and many a stroke, forged and framed some of their parts new, bent and wrestled others, tooke away and abolished a third sort; and all, that they might fort and be fuitable to other conditions and liues: among which he espied the soule of Nero afflicted already grievously enough otherwise, with many calamities, pierced thorow every part with spikes and nailes red hote with fire: and when the artificers afore said tooke it in hand to transforme it into the shape of a viper, of which kind (as Pindarus saith) the yong ones gnaweth thorow the bowels of the dam to come into the world, and to deuoure it, he said that all on a sudden there shone forth a great light, out of which there was heard a voice giving commandement that they should metamorphoze and transfigure it into the

the forme of another kinde of beast, more tame and gentle, forging a water creature of it, chanting about standing lakes and marishes; for that he had bene in some sort punished already for the finnes which hee had committed, and besides, some good time is due unto him from the gods, in that of all his subjects, he had exempted from taxe, tallage and tribute, the best nation and most beloved of the gods, to wit, the Greeks. Thus farre fourth, he said, he was once a spectator of these matters; but when he was upon his returne, he abid all the paines in the world, for very feare that he had; for there was a certaine woman, for vilage and starchy bignesse, admirable, who tooke holde on him, and said: Come hither, that thou maiest keepe in memorie all that thou hast seene, the better: wherewith she put forth unto him a little rod or wand all tierie, 10 such as painters or enamellers use, but there was another that staied her; and then he might perceive himselfe to be blown by a strong and violent winde with a trunke or pipe, so that in the turning of an hand he was within his owne bodie againe, and to began to looke up with his eyes in maner, out of his grave and sepulchre,

20 THAT BRUTE BEASTES HAVE USE OF REASON;

A discourse in maner of a dialogue, named GRYLLUS.

The Summarie.

They who have given out that man is a living creature endued with reason, have in few words expressed that which every one of wrought principally to consider in him: But for want of declaring what this word reason doth import, themselves for the most part have not well understood this definition, but as much as in them is, reduced the condition of men to a woofe estate, than that of brute beasts: For altho their bodies moved and governed by his immortall soule, hath many excellent advantages above beasts; yet if reason the guide of the soule have no other helpe than of her selfe, cries, it may be well and truly said, that man is the most miserable creature in the world: And heerein it is, that Philosophers destitute of the light of gods word, are become and so remaine farre short, as being ignorant of Adams fall, originall sinne, and the hereditarie source and spring of so many defects and imperfections which proceed from the understanding and the will, so much deprecate and corrupt in us by sinne, that when we are to range and reduce reason, to her true deuior and dutie in deed; namely, to know and serve God, according as he commandeth, she is stark blind, yea and a very enemy herselfe to this good grace which is offered unto her. By reason therefore, which maketh the difference betwene us and brute beasts, we are to understand the true knowledge of God, for to serve and glorifie him according to the tenour of his word all the daies of our life; this is called true religion, of which if man be destitute, according to the sentence of our Saviour: it becometh not him to have gained the whole world, if he lose his owne soule: as also; That it were better for a scandle to a man, and him by whom offence 40 committed, never to have bene borne, or at least wise soone exterminate and rooted out: Likewise, that whosoever is proud of himselfe, and forgetteth his God, is no more a man, but resembleth brute beasts, whose soule periseth together with the bodie. But to enter no farther into this Theologicall discourse we see in this present dialogue somewhat thereof: & that the intention of Plutarch was to shew that the intelligence and cogitation of God, is the onely true privilege prerogative and advantage which men have above beasts: howbeit, lest he hath this worke imperfect, even in that very point, which of all other is hardest, and impossible to be proved by him or his like: for what sound understanding, apprehension, or conceit could they have of God, who knew not at all the true God? So then, it may be said said that this parcell or remnant of the disputation, containeth a forme of proceffe against all Pagans and Atheists, to proove that brute beasts excell them, and be in more happie estate than they. As touching the discourse it selfe, to the end that it might not be odious, in case he had handled it as his owne invention, he helpeth himselfe with the fabulous tale of Circe, who transformed into beasts the companions of Ulysses. By which allegorie, the Philosophers and Poets implice and teach thus much, that worldly pleasure doth make all persons brutish, save onely the wise, who use & enjoy goods, honors, & delight: with a staied mind & spirit settled, & which never misseeth nor cometh short or wide of the mark that it shooteth at: He bringeth in therefore Ulysses, conferring by the leave and permission of Circe, with a Greeke named Gryllus, transmuted and turned into a swine: and the chiefe point of their disputation is this: Whether the life of man is better so be esteemed than that of beasts? Gryllus for to uphold and maintaine his cause, treateth of severall points principally: First of the vertue in generall; secondly of the valor and fortitude; in the third place of the temperance; and last of all, the wisdom of beasts; proving against Ulysses, and that by divers arguments set out and marked in order, that beasts have the start and vantage of men in all these points; and leaving the Reader to make the conclusion; he sheweth sufficiently, that if men have no other approach to rest upon, than a naturall habitude of an earthly vertue, and can assure the repose of their consciences upon nothing but upon humane valiance, temperance, and wisdom, they doe but goe in the companie of beasts, or rather come behind them. Thus you see why our author maketh Ulysses to enter into a discourse as touching the knowledge of God: But whether it were that his other affaires and occupations or the iniquitie of time hath deprived us of the rest, this treatise or dialogue hath bene cut off in that very place, where it deserved and required to be more thoroughly and lively prosecuted: And this which remaineth and is come unto our hands, may serve all men in good stead for their instruction and learning, not to glory and vaunt themselves, but in the mercy of him, who calleth them to a better life, wherein brute beasts, (created onely for our use, and for the present life, with which they perishe for ever) have no part nor portion at all.

THAT BRUTE BEASTES have use of reason.

The personages that discourse in this Dialogue,

ULYSSES, CIRCE, GRILLUS.

ULYSSES.

E thinks dame Circe that I have sufficiently conceived, and firmly imprinted these matters in my memorie. Now would I gladly aske the question, and know of you, whether among those men which be transformed into wolves and lions, you have any Greeks or no?

CIRCE.

Yes many have I, and those very many, deere heart Ulysses; but wherefore demand you this question?

ULYSSES.

Because I am perswaded, it will be greatly for mine honour among the Greeks, if by your gracious favour I may obtaine thus much, as at your hands to receive them men againe, and save them, strangers though they be, as well as my companions; nor so neglect their state, as to suffer them against nature to age & waxe old in the bodies of wilde beasts, leading a life so miserable, ignominious, and infamous.

CIRCE.

See the simplicitie of this man; he would through his folly, that his ambitious minde should procure damage and calamity not to himselfe onely and his friends, but also to those who are mere aliens, and nothing belonging to him?

ULYSSES.

I perceive very well (ô Circe) that you are about the tempering and brewing of another cup and potion of words, to bewitch me; for certainly you should make a very beast of me in deed, if I would suffer my selfe to be perswaded, that it were a detriment or losse to become a man againe of a brute beast.

CIRCE.

CIRCE.

Why? have you not already done woofe for your selfe than so, and committed greater absurdities? considering that letting goe a life immortall, and not subject to old age, which you might enjoy if you would make your abode and dwell with me; you will needs goe in all the halte to a woman mortall, and (as I dare well say) very aged by this time, and that through ten thousand dangers, which yet you must endure, promising your selfe, that you shall thereby be better regarded, more honored and renowned from hence forth, than now you are; and in the meane while you consider not that you seeke after a vaine felicitie, and the image or shadow onely for the thing indeed.

ULYSSES.

Well Circe, I am content that it be so as you say; for why should we so often contest and debate thus about the same still? But I pray you of all loves, unbinde and let loose these poore men for my sake, and give them me.

CIRCE.

Nay, that I will not, I sweare by Hecate: You shall not come so easily by them; for I tell you they be no meane persons, and of the common sort: But you were best to aske them first if they themselves be willing thereto or no? And if they answer nay? then, like a noble valiant gentleman as you are, deale with them effectually, and induce them thereto: But in case you cannot with all your reasons bring them to it, and that they be able to convince you by force of argument, let it suffice you that you have advised your selfe and your friends but badly.

ULYSSES.

Is it so indeed good lady? and are you about to mocke and make a foole of me? For how can they either yeeld or receive reason in conference, so long as they be asses, swine and lions, as they are.

CIRCE.

Goe to sir, most ambitious man that you are; let that never trouble you; for I will uphold them sufficient both to heare and understand whatsoever you shall alledge unto them, yea, and able to reason and discourse with you: Or rather, I passe not much if one of them for all his fellows shall both demand and answer: Lo heare is one, deale with him as it pleaseth you.

ULYSSES.

And by what name shall we call him, Circe? or who might he be, when he was a man?

CIRCE.

What matters that? and what maketh it to the disputation and question in hand? Howbeit, name him if you thinke good, Gryllus: And to the end that you should not thinke, that for to gratifie or doe me a pleasure, he may seeme to reason crosse and against your minde, I will for the time retire my selfe out of the place.

GRILLUS.

God save you Ulysses.

ULYSSES.

And you also gentle Gryllus.

GRILLUS.

What is your will with me, and what would you demand of me?

ULYSSES.

I wot well that you and the rest were sometimes men, and therefore I have great ruth and pite to see you all in this estate, but as good reason is, it grieveth me most for the Greeks, that they are fallen into this calamity: But so it is, that even now I requested Circe, to loosen as many of you as be willing thereto, and after she hath restored them to their auncient shape, to give them leave to goe with me.

GRILLUS.

Peace Ulysses, and say not a word more I beseech you; for we all have you in contempt now, seeing that you have bene taken and named all this whiles for a singular man, and seemed far to surpass all others in wisdom, whereas there is little or no cause thereof; in that you have bene afraid even of this, to change from the woofe to the better; and never considered, that as children abhorre the medicines and drogues that Physicians ordeine, and refuse to learne those sciences and disciplines, which of sickly, diseased and foolish, might make them more healthie, sound, & wife; even so you have rejected & cast behind you this oportunitie to be transformed and changed from one to another; and even still you tremble and dare not venture to keepe company companie and lie with Circe, for dread and feare, lest ere you be aware, she should make of you either a swine, or a wolfe; and you would persuade us, that whereas we live now in abundance, and enjoy the affluence of all good things, we should quit the same, and withall, abandon and forsake her who hath procured us this happinesse, and all to goe away with you, when we are become men againe; that is to say, the most wretched creatures in the world.

U L Y S S E S.

It seemeth Gryllus that the potion which you dranke at Circes hands, hath not onely matted the forme and fashion of your bodie, but also spoiled your wit and understanding; having intoxicated your braine, and filled your head with corrupt, strange, and monstrous opinions for ever; or els some pleasure that you have taken by the acquaintance of this body so long, hath so cleane bewitched you.

G R Y L L U S.

Nay iwis, good sir, it is neither so nor so, if it please you o king of the Cephallenians; but if you be disposed to argue with reason, rather than to wrangle with opprobrious termes, we will soone bring you to another opinion, and proove by sound arguments, upon the experience which we have of the one life and the other, that there is great reason why we should love and embrace this present state above the former.

U L Y S S E S.

For mine owne part I am readie to give you the hearing.

G R Y L L U S.

And I as willing likewise to deliver my minde: But first and foremost, begin I will to speake of virtues, upon which I see you stand so much, and in regard whereof, you woondrously please your selves, as who would be thought in justice, in wisdom, in magnanimitie and other virtues, to excell and farre surpass all brute beasts: Answer me therefore I beseech you, the wisest man of all other, to this point: For I have heard say, that upon a time you made relation unto Circe of the Cyclopes country, how the soile there is naturally so good and fertile, that without plowing, sowing, or planting at all, it bringeth forth of it selfe all sorts of fruit: Tell me I say, whether you esteeme better of it (so fruitfull as it is) or of Ithaca a rough and mountaine region, good onely for to breed goats in, and which hardly and with great labour yeeldeth unto those that till it, (small store (God wot) of poore and leane frutes, which will not quit for the cost and paines? But take heed it grieve you not to answer contrarie to your minde, for the love that you beare unto your native country.

U L Y S S E S.

I love verily (for I must not lie) yea, and I embrace and holde most deare, mine owne country and place of nativitie: howbeit, I praise and admire that other region of theirs.

G R Y L L U S.

Why then belike, the case stands thus, and this we are to say, that the wisest man is of opinion, that there be some things which are to praise and commend, and other things to chuse and love: and verily, I thinke that your judgement is the same of the soule; for the like reason there is of it and a land or plot of ground, namely, that the soule is better, which without any travell or labour, bringeth forth vertue, as a fruit springing and growing of it selfe.

U L Y S S E S.

Well: be it so as you say.

G R Y L L U S.

You grant then and confesse already, That the soule of brute beasts is by nature more kinde, more perfect and better disposed to yeeld vertue, considering that without compulsion, without commandement, or any teaching, which is as much to say, as without tillage and sowing it bringeth forth and nourisheth that vertue which is meet and convenient for every one.

U L Y S S E S.

And what vertue is that (my good friend Gryllus) whereof beasts be capable?

G R Y L L U S.

Nay, what vertue are they not capable of? yea, and more than the wisest man that is. But first, consider we (if you please) valour and fortitude, whereupon you beare your selfe and vaunt so highly, neither are you abashed and hide your selfe for feare, but are very well pleased when as men surname you, Hardie, Bolde, and a Winner of cities; whereas you have (most wicked wretch that you are) circumvented and deceived men, who know no other way of making war, but that which is plaine and generous, and who were altogether unskilfull of fraud, guile and leasing, leading, by your wily shifts and subtill pranks, attributing the name of vertue unto cunning casts, the which in deed knoweth not what deceit and fraud meaneth. But you see the combats of beasts as well against men as when they fight one against another, how they are performed without any craftinesse or sleight, onely by plaine hardinesse and cleane strength, and as it were upon a native magnanimitie, they defend themselves, and be revenged of their enemies: and neither by enforcement of lawes, nor for feare to be judicially reprovved and punished for cowardise, but onely through instinct of nature avoiding the shame and disgrace to be conquered, they endure and holde out fight to the very extremitie, and all to keepe themselves invincible: for say they be in body the weaker, yet they yeeld not for all that, nor are faint-hearted and give over, but chuse to die in fight: and many of them there be, whose courage and generositie, even when they are readie to die, being retired into some one corner of their bodie, and there gathering it selfe, resisteth the killer, it leapeth and fretteth still, untill such time as, like a flame of fire, it be quenched and put out once for all: they can not skill of praying and intreating their enemies, they crave no pardon and mercy; and it were strange in any of them, to confesse that they are overcome; neither was it ever seene that a lion became a slave unto a lion, or one horse unto another in regard of fortitude, like as one man to another, contenting himselfe and willingly embracing servitude as next cousin and a surname appropriate unto cowardise. And as for those beasts which men have surpris'd and caught by snares, traps, subtill sleights and devices of engines, such if they be come to their growth and perfect age, reject all food, refuse nourishment, yea, and endure thirst, to such extremitie, that they chuse to die and seeke to procure their owne death, rather than to live in servitude; but to their young ones and whelps, which for their tender age be tractable, pliable, and easie to be led which way one will, they offer so many deceitfull baits to entice and allure them with their sweetnesse, that they have no sooner tasted thereof, but they become enchanted and bewitched therewith: for these pleasures, and this delicate life, contrary to their nature, in tract of time causeth them to be soft and weake, receiving that degeneration (as it were) and effeminate habit of their courage, which folke call tamenesse, and in deed but basenesse and defect of their naturall generositie: whereby it appeareth, that beasts by nature are bred and passing well disposed to be audacious and hardie; whereas contrariwise, it is not kindly for men to be so much as bolde of speech and resolute in speaking their mindes. And this you may (good Ulysses) learne and know especially by this one argument: for in all brute beasts, nature Iwaith indifferently and equally of either side, as touching courage and boldnesse, neither is the female in that point inferior to the male, whether it be in sustaining paine and travell for getting of their living, or in fight for defence of their little ones. And I am sure you heard of a certaine Cromyonian swine, what foule worke she made, being a beast of the female sex, for Theseus, & how she troubled him; as also of that monstrous Sphinx, which kept upon the rocke Phicion, and held in awe all that tract underneath and about it: for surely all her craft and subtilty in devising riddles, and proposing darke questions, had bootied her nothing, in case she had not bene withall, of greater force and courage than all the Cadmeians. In the very same quarter was (by report) the fox of Telmessus, a wily and craftie beast. And it is given out, that nere unto the said place, was also the fell dragon which fought in single fight hand to hand with Apollo, for the Seignorie of the oracle at Delphi. And even your great king Agamemnon tooke that brave mare Aethre, as a gift, of an inhabitant of Syeon, for his dispensation and immunity, that he might not be prest to the warres: wherein he did well and wisely in mine opinion, to preferre a good and couragious beast, before a coward and dastardly man: and you your own selfe (Ulysses) have seene many times lionesses and the libbards, how they give no place at all to their males in courage and hardinesse, as your lady Penelope doth, who gives you leave to be abroad in warfarre, whiles she sits at home close by the herth, and by the fire side, and dares not doe so much as the very swallowes, in repelling those back who come to destroy her and her house, for all she is a Laconian woman borne: What should I tell you of the Carian or Maconian women? for by this that hath bene said already, it is plaine and evident, that men naturally are not endued with prowesse, for if they were, then should women likewise have their part with them in vertue and valour: And thereupon I inferre and conclude that you and such as you are, exercise a kind of valiance (I must needs say) which is not voluntarie nor naturall, but constrained by force of lawes, subject and servile to (I wot not what) customes reprehensions; and you meditate I say and practise for vain-glorious opinion, fortitude, gaily set out with trim words; you sustaine travells and perils, not for that you set light by them, nor for any hardinesse and confidence in your selves, but because you are afraid lest others should goe before you, and be esteemed greater than you. And like as heere among your mates at sea, he that first riseth to his businesse of rowing, laith hand and seizeth upon the lightest oare that he can meet with, doth it not, for that he despiseth it, but because he avoideth and is affraid to handle one that is heavier: and he that endureth the knocke of a balton or cudgel, because he would not receive any wound by the sword: as also, he that resisteth an enemy, for to avoid some ignominious infamie of death, is not to be said valiant in respect of the one, but coward in regard of the other: even so the valour in you, is nothing els but a wife and warie cowardise, and your prowesse and boldnesse, is no better than timorousnesse, accompanied with skill and knowledge how to decline one danger by another. To be brieue, if you thinke your selves to be more hardie and valiant than beasts, how commeth it, that your Poets tearme those who fight manfully to against their enemies, λύσιππος, that is, wolves for courage; λεωνόκαρτος, that is, lion-hearted: and οὐ βίβλος ἀνδρῶν, that is, resembling the wilde boare in animosities and force: but never doth any of them call a lion, ἀνδρῶν τιμωρ, that is, as valiant as a man: or a wilde boare, ἀνδρῶν ἐχθρὸς, that is, comparable to a man in courage and strength. Yet I wot well, when they would speake excessively in comparison, their manner is, to call men that are swift in running, πολλύπους, that is, light-footed like the winde: and those who be faire ad beautifull, θεοειδῆς, that is, angelicall, or to see to, like unto angels: and even so, they compare and resemble brave warriours in the highest degree, unto beasts, who in that case are much more excellent than men: the reason is this, for that choler and heat of courage is (as it were) the steele, the file, yea, the very whetstone that giveth the edge unto fortitude; and this doe brute beasts bring with them pure and simple unto 20 fight; whereas in you, it being alway mingled and tempered with some discourse of reason, as if wine were delaied with a little water, it is gone and to seeke in the greatest dangers, and faileth at the very point of opportunity, when it is most to be used. And some of you are of opinion, and sticke not to say, that in battell and fight there is no need at all of anger, but that laying aside all choler, we are to employ sober and staied reason; wherein they speake not amisse, and I holde well with them, when the question is of defence onely, and the securing of a mans owne life: but surely, if the case be so, that we are to offend, to annoy and defeat our enemy, they talke most shamefully. Is it not a very absurd thing, that ye should reprove and blame nature, for that she hath not set unto your bodies any stings or pricks, nor given you tusks and teeth to revenge your selves with, ne yet armed you with hooked claws and talions to offend your enemies; and 30 in the meane while your owne selves take, spoile, and bereave the foule of that naturall weapon which is inbred with it, or at leastwise cut the same short and disable it?

U L Y S S E S.

What Gryllus! you seeme (as farre as I gesse) to have beene heerebefore some wittie and great oratour; who now grunting out of your stie or frank, have so pithily argued the case, and discouered of the matter in hand: but why have you not in the same traine disputed likewise of temperance?

G R Y L L U S.

Because forsooth I thought that you would first have refuted that which hath already beene spoken; but I see well you desire to heare me speake of temperance, because you are the husband 40 band of a most chaste wife, and you thinke besides, that your selfe have shewed good prooffe of your own continencie, in that you have rejected the love & wanton company of Circē; but even heerein you are not more perfect, I meane in continence, than any one beast, for even they also lust not at all to companie or engender with those that are of a more excellent kind than their owne, but take their pleasure with those, and make love to such as be of the same sort, and therefore no marvell, that as the Mendesian buck-goat in Aegypt, when he was shut up with many faire and beautifull women, never for all that made to any of them, but abhorred to meddle with them; whereas he was raging wood in heat of lust after the does or female goats: So you taking delight in your ordinary love, have no desire at all, being a man, to sleepe or deale carnally with an immortal goddesse: And as for the chastitie and continence of your owne lady Penelope, I tell you there be ten thousand crows in the world, that after their manner, cawing and coking as they doe, will make a meere mocke of it, and shew that it is no such matter to be accounted of; for there is not one of them, but if the male or cock chance to die, remaineth a widow without seeking after a mate, not for a litle while, but even for the space of nine ages & lives of a man; so that in this respect, your faire Penelope cometh behind the poorest crow or raven that is, and deserveth not the ninth part of her honour for chastitie: But seeing you are ware that I am so eloquent an oratour, I care not much if I observe a methodicall order in this discourse course of mine; and like a cleark indeed, beginne first with the definition of temperance, and then proceed to the division of appetites and lusts, according to their severall distinct kinds right formally. Temperance therefore is a certaine restraint, abridgement, or regularitie of lusts, and desires, a restraint I say, and abating of such as are forren, strange, and superfluous, to wit, unnecessary, and a regularitie which by election and choise of time and temperature of a meane, doth moderate those that be naturall and necessarie; for you see that in lusts and desires, there be infinit differences: As for example, the appetite to drinke, besides that it is naturall, is also necessarie; But the lust of the flesh, or concupiscence, although nature hath given the beginning thereof; yet so it is, that we may live commodiously without it; so as well it may be called 10 naturall, but in no wise necessarie. Now there is another sort of desires, that be neither naturall nor necessarie, but accidentall, and infused from without by a vaine opinion, and upon ignorance of that which is good, and there be such a number of them, that they goe verie neere to chafe away and thrust out, all your naturall appetites, much like as when the aliens and strangers that swarme in a citie, drive out and expell the naturall inhabitants; whereas brute beasts give no entrance nor any communication and fellowship to forren affections for to settle in their soules, but in their whole life, & all their actions be farre remote from vain-glory, selfe-conceit, & fond opinions, as if they abode within the mediterranean parts, distant from the sea: True it is that in their port and carriage, they be not so elegant, so fine & curious as men: howbeit otherwise, for temperance & good government of their affections, which be not many in number, 20 ther domestical, or strange & forren, they are more precise & woonderfull exact in the observing of them than they; for the prooffe and truth heereof, the time was once, when I my selfe no lesse doated and was besotted upon gold than you are now, thinking verily that there was no good nor possession in the world comparable to it; I was in love allo of silver and ivory, and he that had most store heereof, me thought was a right happie man, and most highlie in grace and favour with the gods, whether he were Phrygian or Carian it skilled not, more base minded than Dolon, or unfortunate otherwise than Præmuis; inso much as being linked fast and tied to these desires, I reaped and received no pleasure nor any contentment at all from al other blessings; for notwithstanding I was sufficiently furnished with them, yet I tooke my selfe left needie and destitute of those which I accounted the greatest; and therefore I well remember, when I saw you upon a time stately arraid, with a rich robe in Camde, I wished not to have your 30 wisedome and vertue, but your beautifull cassock so decently and finely wrought, your mantell I say of purple, so delicate & soft, the beautie whereof I beheld with such admiration, that I was even ravished and transported with the sight thereof, as for the button or clasp, al of pure gold, belonging thereto, it had in it a singularity by it selfe, and an excellent workman hee was no doubt, who tooke delight in the turning and graving thereof; and verily for mine owne part, I followed after you for to see it, as if I had bene enchanted or bewitched; as women that bee amorous of their lovers: But now being delivered from these vaine and foolish opinions, and having my braine purged from such fantastical conceits, I passe over gold and silver, and make no more account of them, than I doe of other ordinarie stones; your goodly habiliments, 40 your fine embroidered garments of needle worke and tapistrie, I set so light by, that I make more reckoning I assure you, of a good deepe puddle of soft mire and dirt to walter and wallow in at mine ease, and for to sleepe when my belly is full, than of them: neither is there any of these appetites coming from without, that hath place in our soule, but our life for the most part we passe it desires and pleasures necessarie; and even those which are meere naturall onely, and not altogether so necessarie, wee use them neither disorderly, nor yet unmeasurably: And of them let us first discourse: As for that familiar pleasure which proceedeth from sweet odours, and such things, as by their sense doe affect the smelling, over and besides the simple delight that it yeeldeth, which costeth nought, it bringeth therewith a certaine profit and commodity, for to discernie nourishment; and make choise of food; for the tongue is named, 50 as it is indeede, the judge of sweet, of sharpe, eager and sower sapours, namely, when as the juices of those things which are tasted, come to be mingled and conconcorate with the discretive facultie; and not before: But our sense of smelling, before wee once taste those juices or sapours, judgeth of the force and qualitie of every thing, yea, and senteth them much more exquisitely than all the tasters that give essaie before kings and princes: As for that which is familiar and agreeable unto us, it receiveth inwardly, but whatsoever is strange and offensive, it rejecteth and sendeth forth, neither will it suffer the same once to touch us, or to offend our taste; but it bewarieth, accuseth, and condemneth the evill and noi-

before you, and be esteemed greater than you. And like as heere among your mates at sea, he that first riseth to his businesse of rowing, laicth hand and seizeth upon the lightest oare that he can meet with, doth it not, for that he despiseth it, but because he avoideth and is afraid to handle one that is heavier: and he that endureth the knocke of a balston or cudgel, because he would not receive any wound by the sword: as also, he that resisteth an enemy, for to avoid some ignominious infamie of death, is not to be said valiant in respect of the one, but coward in regard of the other: even so the valour in you, is nothing els but a wife and warie cowardise, and your prowesse and boldnesse, is no better than timorousnesse, accompanied with skill and knowledge how to decline one danger by another. Yet I wot well, when they would speake excessively in comparifon, their manner is, to call men that are swift in running, ποταμίου, that is, light-footed like the winde: and those who be faire ad beautifull, θεωδότης, that is, angelically, or to see to, like unto angels: and even so, they compare and resemble brave warriors in the highest degree, unto beasts, who in that case are much more excellent than men: the reason is this, for that choler and heat of courage is (as it were) the steele, the file, yea, the very whetstone that giveth the edge unto fortitude; and this doe brute beasts bring with them pure and simple unto 20 fight; whereas in you, it being alway mingled and tempered with some discource of reason, as if wine were delaied with a little water, it is gone and to seeke in the greatest dangers, and faileth at the very point of opportunity, when it is most to be used. Because forthwith I thought that you would first have refuted that which hath already beene spoken; but I see well you desire to heare me speake of temperance, because you are the husband 40 of a most chaste wife, and you thinke besides, that your selfe have shewed good prooffe of your own continencie, in that you have rejected the love & wanton company of Circē; but even herein you are not more perfect, I meane in continence, than any one beast, for even they also lust not at all to companie or engender with those that are of a more excellent kind than their owne, but take their pleasure with those, and make love to such as be of the same sort, and therefore no marvell, that as the Mendesian buck-goat in Aegypt, when he was shut up with many faire and beautifull women, never for all that made to any of them, but abhorred to meddle with them; whereas he was raging wood in heat of lust after the does or female goats: So you taking delight in your ordinary love, have no desire at all, being a man, to sleepe or deale carnally with an immortall goddess: And as for the chastitie and continence of your owne lady Pe- 50 nelope, I tell you there be ten thousand crows in the world, that after their manner, cawing and croaking as they doe, will make a meete mocke of it, and shew that it is no such matter to be accounted of; for there is not one of them, but if the male or cock chance to die, remaineth a widow without seeking after a make, not for a litle while, but even for the space of nine ages & lives of a man; so that in this respect, your faire Penelope commeth behind the poorest crow or raven that is, and deserveth not the ninth part of her honour for chastitie: But seeing you are ware that I am so eloquent an oratour, I care not much if I observe a methodicall order in this discou- 60 course of mine; and like a clearke indeed, beginne first with the definition of temperance, and then proceed to the division of appetites and lusts, according to their severall distinct kinds right formally. Temperance therefore is a certaine restraint, abridgement, or regularitie of lusts, and desires, a restraint I say, and abating of such as are forren, strange, and superfluous, to wit, unnecessary, and a regularitie which by election and choise of time and temperature of a meane, doth moderate those that be naturall and necessarie; for you see that in lusts and desires, there be infinit differences: As for example, the appetite to drinke, besides that it is naturall, is also necessarie; But the lust of the flesh, or concupiscence, although nature hath given the beginning thereof; yet so it is, that we may live commodiously without it; so as well it may be called 10 naturall, but in no wise necessarie. Now there is another sort of desires, that be neither naturall nor necessarie, but accidental, and infused from without by a vaine opinion, and upon ignorance of that which is good, and there be such a number of them, that they goe verie neere to chafe away and thrust out, all your naturall appetites, much like as when the aliens and strangers that swarme in a citie, drive out and expell the naturall inhabitants; whereas brute beasts give no entrance nor any communication and fellowship to forren affections for to settle in their soules, but in their whole life, & all their actions be farre remote from vaine-glory, selfe-conceit, & fond opinions, as if they abode within the mediterranean parts, distant from the sea: True it is that in their port and carriage, they be not so elegant, so fine & curious as men: howbeit otherwise, for temperance & good government of their affections, which be not many in number, ei- 20 ther domestically, or strange & forren, they are more precise & wonderfull exact in the observing of them than they; for the prooffe and truth heereof, the time was once, when I my selfe no lesse doated and was besotted upon gold than you are now, thinking verily that there was no good nor possession in the world comparable to it; I was in love also of silver and ivory, and he that had most store heereof, me thought was a right happie man, and most highlie in grace and favour with the gods, whether he were Phrygian or Carian it skilled not, more base minded than Dolon, or unfortunate otherwise than Primus; inso much as being linked fast and tied to these desires, I reaped and received no pleasure nor any contentment at all from al other blessings; for notwithstanding I was sufficiently furnished with them, yet I tooke my selfe left needie and destitute of those which I accounted the greatest; and therefore I well remember, when I saw you upon a time stately arraid, with a rich robe in Candie, I wished not to have your 30 wiledome and vertue, but your beautifull cassock so decently and finely wrought, your mantell I say of purple, so delicate & soft, the beautie whereof I beheld with such admiration, that I was even ravished and transported with the sight thereof, as for the button or claspe, al of pure gold, belonging thereto, it had in it a singularity by it selfe, and an excellent workman hee was no doubt, who tooke delight in the turning and graving thereof; and verily for mine owne part, I followed after you for to see it, as if I had beene enchanted or bewitched; as women that bee amorous of their lovers: But now being delivered from these vaine and foolish opinions, and having my braine purged from such fantasticall conceits, I passe over gold and silver, and make no more account of them, than I doe of other ordinarie stones; your goodly habiliments, 40 your fine embroidered garments of needle worke and tapistrie, I set so light by, that I make more reckoning I assure you, of a good deepe puddle of soft mire and dirt to walter and wallow in at mine ease, and for to sleepe when my belly is full, than of them: neither is there any of these appetites comming from without, that hath place in our soule, but our life for the most part we passeth in desires and pleasures necessarie; and even those which are meere naturall onely, and not altogether so necessarie, wee use them neither disorderly, nor yet unmeasurably: And of them let us first discourtse: As for that familiar pleasure which proceedeth from sweet odours, and such things, as by their sense doe affect the smelling, over and besides the simple delight that it yeeldeth, which costeth nought, it bringeth therewith a certaine profit and commoditie, for to discourtse nourishment, and make choise of food; for the tongue is named, 50 as it is indeede, the judge of sweet, of sharpe, eager and fowre sapours, namely, when as the juices of those things which are tasted, come to be mingled and incorporate with the discretive facultie; and not before: But our sense of smelling, before wee once taste those juices or sapours, judgeth of the force and qualitie of every thing, yea, and senteth them much more exquisitely than all the tasters that give eiaie before kings and princes: As for that which is familiar and agreeable unto us, it receiveth inwardly, but whatsoever is strange and offensive, it rejecteth and sendeth forth, neither will it suffer the same once to touch us, or to offend our taste; but it bewraeth, accuteth, and condemneth the evil and noisome qualitie thereof, before it doth us any harme, and otherwife it troubleth not us at all, as it doth you, whom it forceth to mixe and compound together for perfumes, cinamon, nard, spike, lavender camell, the sweet leafe malabathum, and the aromaticall calamus, or cane of Arabis, medling and incorporating one within another, by the exquisit skillling and cunning of the apothecarie and perfumer, forcing drogues and spices of divers natures to be blended and confected together, and buying for great summes of money one pleasure, which is not becoming men, but rather fit for fine wenches and daintie damosels, and nothing at all profitable: And yet being thus corrupt as it is, it mareth not onely all women, but also the most part of you that are men, in so much as you will not otherwhiles, lie with your owne espoused wives, unlessse they be perfumed and besmeared all over with sweet oiles and ointments, or els bestrewed with odoriferous powders, when they come to companie with you: Whereas contrariwise among us, the fow allureth the bore, the doe or she goat draweth unto her the buck, & other females the males of their kinde, by their owne sent and smell, casting from them the pure and neat favour of the meadowes, and the verdure of the fields, and so comming together as in marriage for generation, with a kinde of mutuall love and reciprocall pleasure; neither doe the females hold off and make it daintie, disguising and covering (as it were) their owne lust as harlots doe, with looking strange and coie at the matter, pretending colourable excuses, or making semblance of refusal, and all to enchant, entice, and draw on the rather; nor the males when they come unto them, being pricked with the furious instinct of lust to generation, doe buie either for money or for great paine and travell, or for long subjection and servitude, the act of generation; but they performe the same unfeignedly, and without deceit in due time and season, without any cost, when as nature in the spring flureth up and provoketh the generative concupiscence of all living creatures, even as it putteth forth the buds and sprouts of plants, and anon delaith as it were and quencheth the same; for neither the female after she is once sped and hath conceived, seeketh after the male, nor the male woetheth her any more, nor followeth after her; of fo little regard and small price is this pleasure among us; but nature is all in all, and nothing doe wee against it: Heereof also it is, that there hath not bene knowne unto this day, any lust so farre to transpote brute beasts, as that males should joine in this act with males, or females with females; whereas among you, there be many such examples, even of such as otherwise were accounted great and woorthie personages, for I let those passe who were of no woorth or note; to speake of: Even Agamemnon went through all Baotia, chasing and hunting after * Argemnon, who fledde secretly from him; meane while he pretended colourable, yet false excuses of his abode there, to wit, the sea and the windes, and afterwards this faire and goodly knight, bathed himselfe gently in the poole of Copais, as it were there to quench the heat of his love, and to deliver himselfe from this furious lust. Semblable Hercules pursuing after a yooing bearded Genymade whom he loved, was left behind the other gallants and brave knights that enterprised the voiage for the golden fleece, and so not imbarquing with them, betrayed the fleet. Likewise upon a scutchian of the lower or valted route of Apollos temple, furnamed Proneus, there was one of you, who secretly wrote this inscription; Achilles the faire; even after that Achilles himselfe had begotten a sonne; and I heare say, that these letters remaine there to be seene even at this day: Now if it chauce that a dunghill cocke tread another cocke, when there is no hennie at hand; he is burnt quicke, for that some wizard, soothsaier, or interpreter of such straunge prodigies, will pronounce that it is omenous, and presageth some evil lucke: Thus you see, how men themselves are forced to confesse, that beasts are more continent than they, & that to satisfie & fulfill their lusts, they never violate nor abuse nature; whereas in you it is otherwise: for nature (albeit she have the helpe and aide of the law) is not able to keepe your intemperance within the limits and bounds of reason; but like unto a violent streame which runneth forcibly, often times and in many places it worketh much outrage, causing great disorder, scandall and confusion against nature, in this point of carnall love and fleshly lust: for there have bene men who attempted to meddle and deale with shee goats, with sows and mares; as also women who have bene as wood and raging mad after certeine beasts of the male kinde; and verily, of such copulations as these, are come your *Minotaur*es and Acgipanes; yea, and as I verily thinke, those Sphinxes and Centaures in time past, have bene bred by the same meanes. True it is (I confesse) that otherwhiles, upon necessity and extreame famine, a dogge hath bene knownen to have devoured a man or a woman, yea, and some fowle hath tasted of their flesh, and begun to eat it; but there was never found yet any brute beast to have lust after man or woman, to engender with them; whereas men both in this lust and in many other pleasures, have often times perpetrated outrage upon beasts. Now if they be so unbridled, so disordinate and incontinent in these appetites, much more dissolute they are knownen to be than beasts in other desires and lusts that be necessarie, to wit, in meats and drinks, whereof we never take pleasure, but it is with some profit; but you seeking after the tickling pleasure and delight in drinking and eating, rather than the needfull nourishment to content and satisfie nature, are afterwards well punished for it by many grievous and long maladies, which proceed all from one source, to wit, surfeit and repletion, namely, when you stuffe and fill your bodies with all sorts of stutulent humors & ventosities, which hardly are purged & excluded forth: for first & formost, ech sort of beasts hath a severall food and peculiar kinde of nourishment; some feed upon grasse, others upon roots, and some there be againe which live by fruits: as for those that devoure flesh, they never touch any other kinde of pasture, neither come they to take from the weaker and more feeble kind, their proper nouriture, but suffer them to graze & feed quietly. Thus we see that the lion permiteth the stag and hinde to graze; and the wolfe likewise the sheepe, according to natures ordinance and appointment: but man (being through his disordinate appetite of pleasures, and by his gluttonie, provoked to all things, tasting and assaying whatsoever he can meet with or heare of, as knowing indeed no proper and naturall food of his owne) is of all creatures living, he alone that eateth and devoureth all things; for first, he feedeth upon flesh, without any need or necessitie enforcing him thereto, considering that he may alwaies gather, presse, cut and reape from plants, vines and seeds, all sort of fruits, one after another in due and convenient seasons, until he be weary againe, for the great quantity thereof; and yet for to content his delicate tooth, and upon a lothsome fulnesse of necessarie sustenance, he seeketh after other victuals, neither needfull nor meet for him, ne yet pure and cleane, in killing living creatures, much more cruelly than those savage beasts that live of ravin: for blood and carnage of murdered carcases is the proper and familiar food for a kite, a wolfe, or a dragon; but unto man it serveth in stead of his daintie dish: and more than so, man in the use of all sorts of beasts, doth not like other creatures that live of prey, which abstaine from the most part, and warre with some small number, even for very necessity of food; for there is neither fowle flying in the aire, nor (in maner) any fish swimming in the sea, nor (to speake in one word) any beast feeding upon the face of the earth, that can escape those tables of yours, which you call gentle, kinde and hospitall. But you will say, that all this standeth in stead of sauce to season your food: be it so: why then doe you kill the same for that purpose, and for to furnish those your milde and courteous tables?

* But the wisdom of beasts, farre different; for it giveth place to no arte whatsoever, that is vaine and needlesse; and as for those that be necessarie, it entermeth them not as comming from others, nor as taught by mercenarie masters for hire and money; neither is it required, that it should have any exercise to glue (as it were, and joine after a slender maner) ech rule, principle and proposition, one to another; but all at once of it selfe, it yeeldeth them all as native and inbred therewith. We heare say, that all the Aegyptians be Physicians; but surely every beast hath in it selfe not onely the art and skill to cure and heale it selfe when it is sicke, but also is sufficiently instructed how to feed and nourish it selfe, how to use her owne strength, how to fight, how to hunt, how to stand at defence, yea, and in very musick they are skillfull, ech one in that measure as is requirit and befitting the owne nature: for of whom have we learned, finding our selves ill at ease, to goe into the rivers for to seeke for crabbes and crafishes? who hath taught the tortoisies, when they have eaten a viper, to seeke out the herbe Organ for to feed upon? who hath shewed unto the goats of Candia, when they be shot into the bodie with arrows, to finde out the herbe Distammus, for to feed on it, and thereby to cause the arrow head to come forth and fall from them? For if you say (as the truth is) that nature is the schoole-mistresse, teaching them all this, you referre and reduce the wisdom and intelligence of dumbe beasts unto the sagest and most perfect cause or principle that is: which if you thinke you may not call reason, nor prudence, ye ought then to seeke out some other name for it, that is better and more honourable: and to say a trueth, by effects shee sheweth her puissance to be greater and more admirable, as being neither ignorant nor ill taught, but having learned rather of it self, not by imbecillitie and feeblenesse of nature, but contrariwise, through the force and perfection of naturall vertue, letting go, and nothing at all esteeming that beggerly prudence which is gotten from other by way of apprentissage. Nevertheless, all those things which men either for delicacie or in mirth and pastime, do present unto them for to learne and to exercise their conceit and wit withall, howsoever they be against the naturall inclination of their bodies: yet such is their capacitie and the excellencie of their spirit, that they will reach thereto and compasse the fame thorowly. I say nothing how whelps follow and trace beasts by the foot, or how colts practise to set their feet forward in their pace by measures: but how crows and ravens will talke and prattle, how dogs will leape and dance upon wheelles as they turne round about: also howes and oxen we see in the theaters, how they being taught to couch and lie downe, to daunce, to stand upright on their hinder feet, so woonderfully, that men themselves have much ado to performe the like dangerous gestures, and yet this they doe after they have once learned it from others, yea, and remember the feat thereof, onely for a prooffe, if there were nothing else, that docible they be and apt to learne whatsoever a man would have them, since that all this serveth for nothing else in the whole world. Now if you bee hard of beliefe, and will not be perswaded that we learne the arts, I will say more than so; namely, that we can teach the same: for the old rowen partridges teach their yong ones how to runne awaie from before the fowler, and to escape by lying upon their backs, and holding up with their feet a clod of earth to hide themselves under it; and see we not daily upon the tops of our houses, how the old storks standing by their little ones, traine and teach them how to flie; semblable the nightingales instruct their yong birds in song, in so much as those which be taken unfledge out of the nest, and are nourished by mans hand, never afterwards sing so well, because they be had away before their time from schoole, and want their master of musick. For mine owne part after that I was entred into this bodie, I marvelled much at those reasons and discourses of sophisters, who maintained and perswaded me before time, that all living creatures besides man were without reason and understanding.

U L Y S S E S.

You are indeed Gryllus now much changed, and you can shew unto us by sound demonstrations, that a sheepe is reasonable, and an asse hath wit, can you not?

G R Y L L U S.

Yes iwis, good Ulysses, for even by these very arguments, a man may principally collect and gather, that the nature of beasts is not altogether void of the use of reason and intelligence: Like as therefore among trees, there is not one more or lesse destitute of soule, (I mean that which is sensitive) than another, but they be all indifferently & equally void thereof, and not one of them is one jot endued therewith; even so in sensible beasts, there would not be one found more flow and unapt to learne things of wit and understanding than another, if they were not all partakers of reason and intelligence, although some have the same in more or lesse measure than others; and say there be some very blockish and exceeding dull of conceit, consider with all, how the wily sleights and craftie conceits of others may be put in balance against the same, namely, when you shall compare the fox, the wolfe, or the bees with the sheepe and the asse; it is all one as if you should set Polyphemus to your selfe; or that Homer of Corinth to your grandfather Antolycus: And yet I thinke verily, that there is not so great difference and distance betwene beast and beast, as there is odds in the matter of wisdom, discourse of reason, and use of memorie betwene man and man.

U L Y S S E S.

But take heed of one thing Gryllus, that it be not a strange and absurd position, founding of no probability at all, to attribute any use of reason unto those who have no sense or knowledge at all of God.

G R Y L L U S.

What Ulysses, shall we not say that you being so wise and excellent as you are, were defended from the race of Sisyphus, &c.

WHETHER

WHETHER IT BE LAWFULL TO EAT FLESH OR NO.

The former Oration or Treatise.

The Summarie.

Beloquence was highly esteemed in times past among Greeks and Romans, and therefore their children were trained and framed betimes in the schooles to discourse well, in good rearmes, and proper phrases, yea, and with pregnant and sound reasons of divers matters; to the end that when they were come to more yeeres, they might make prooffe of their sufficiency in courts and publicke assemblies of cities, in private consultations and familiar conferences, as it appeareth very plainly by the histories of all ages: Now after that yong children had learned of their schoole-masters the rules and precepts named Progymnasmata, or the first exercises, they were brought into the audiorie of some great professor in Rhetorick; where there were proposed unto them certaine themes, gathered out of poets, historians, or philosophers, upon which they exercised their stile to write pro & contra, in the defence or confutation of this or that opinion, according to the measure of their spirit and capacitie more or lesse: Those who were more forward, and further proceeded than the rest, could by heart that which they had penned, and pronounced the same after ward in the presence of those that came to hear them: Some of them who were grown to a greater measure of knowledge, and as it were in the highest forme of such exercises, were wont to stand forth and answer to all questions propounded, disputing and discoursing in the praise or dispraise of one and the same thing, as Gorgias, Carneades, and an infinit number of others, are able to make good and verifie. This manner of exercise, named Declamations, was practised in Plutarch's time, as may be collected out of divers places of his works: and as these two treatises immediately following do sufficiently declare, the which are marred and imperfect at the very beginning, in the midst and toward the end, especially the second: for it may be easily scene that they are fragments of certaine declamations which he wrote for his owne exercise when he was a yong man. Now albeit they be so corrupt and defective in manner all thoroughout, yet the remnant which is left unto us, doth sufficiently discover the honest occupation and employment of learned men in those daies, and that he carefull industrie that they had to examine & discourse all things thorowly, to the end that by a diligent conference thereof, the truth might the better appeare and be knownen. And if otherwhiles they maintained certaine paradoxes and strange opinions, it was not upon any croffe and litigious spirit to defend obliquely all that came into their fantasticall braine, but for to augment and increase in themselves an earnest desire to apprehend and understand things better: And howsoever our author seemeth to be of minde for to defend the opinion of Pythagoras, as touching the transmigration of soules, and the prohibition to eate flesh; yet by other treatises written with more deliberate, mature and staide judgement, he giveth us to understand, that he is of a contrary opinion; but his principall scope is that he should teach that, to wit, to be a cutting off and abridging of the great excess and superfluitie in purveying, buying, and spending of viands, which in his time began to grow out of all measure; a disorder and inordinate which afterwards increased much more. For to gaine and compass this point, hee would seeme to perswade men to the opinion of Pythagoras, which mightily cutteth the wings of all riot and wastfull dissolution. Moreover, this ought not to be taken so, as if it favoured and seconded the error of certaine fantasticall persons, who have condemned the use of Gods good creatures: for in the schoole of Christ wee are taught good lessons, which refuse sufficiently the dreames of the Pythagoreans, and resolve assuredly the good conscience of all those that make use of all creatures (meets for the sustentation of this life) soberly and with thanksgiving, as knowing them to be good, and their use cleane and pure unto those whom

whom the spirit of regeneration hath sanctified, for to make them partakers of that realme which is not shut up and inclosed in meats and drinks. As touching this present tract for the maintenance of Pythagoras his paradox, he alledgeth five reasons: to wit, That the eating of flesh, is a testimonie and signe of inhumanitie; That we ought to forebeare it, considering we are not driven upon necessity to feed there upon; That it is an unnatural thing; That it hurteth soule and body: and for a conclusion, That men will never come themselves and conuerse modefly together, if they learne not first to be pitifull and kinde even to the very dumbe beasts.

WHETHER IT BE LAW full to eat flesh or no.

The former Oration or Treatise.

Ut you demand of mee, for what cause Pythagoras abstained from eating flesh? And I againe do marvell, what affection, what manner of courage, or what motive and reason had that man, who first approached with his mouth unto a flaine creature, who durst with his lips once touch the flesh of a beast either killed or dead; or how he could finde in his heart to be served at his table with dead bodies, and as a man may say, very idols, to make his food and nourishment of those parts and members which a little before did blea, low, bellow, walke and see. How could his eyes endure to behold such murder and slaughter, whiles the poore beasts were either flicked or had the throats cut, were flayed and difmembered? how could his nose abide the smell and sent that came from them? how came it that his taste was not cleane marred and overthrown with horror, when he came to handle those uncouth sores and ulcers, or receive the blood and humours, issuing out of the deadly wounds.

*The skinner now flayed, upon the ground did fraule,
The flesh on spits did bellow fill and low:
Roast, sod and raw, did crye as well as crule,
And yeeld a voice of braying oxe or cow.*

But this, you will say, is a loud lie, and a meere poetically fiction; howbeit, this was certainly a strange and monstrous supper, that any man should hunger after those beasts, and desire to eat them whiles they still kept a lowing; to prescribe also, and teach men how they should feed of those creatures which live and crye still; to ordeine likewise, how they ought to be dressed, boiled, roasted, and served up to the board.

But he who first invented these monstrosities, ought to be inquired after, and not hee who last gave over and rejected the same. Or a man may well say, that those who at the first began to eat flesh, had all just causes to do, in regard of their want and necessitie: for surely, it was not by reason of disordinate and enormous appetite which they used a long time, nor upon plenty and abundance of necessarie things, that they grew to this insolencie, to seeke after strange pleasures, & those contrarie to nature. But verily, if they could recover their senses and speech againe, they might well say now, Oh how happie and well beloved of the gods are you, who live in these daies! in what a world and age are you borne! what affluence of all sorts of good things do you enjoy! what harvests, what store of fruits yeeldeth the earth unto you! how commodious are the vineyards! and what riches do the fields bring unto you! what a number of trees and plants do furnish you with delights and pleasures, which you may gather and receive, when you thinke good! you may live (if you list) in all manner of delicacie, without once fouling your hands for the matter; whereas our hap was to be borne in the hardest time and most terrible age of the world, when as we could not chuse but incur (by reason of the new creation of all things) a great want and streight indigence of many necessaries: the face of the heaven and skie was still covered with the aire; the starres were dusked with troubled and instable humors, together with fire and tempestuous windes: the sunne was not yet settled and established, having a constant and certaine race to holde his course in,

From

*From East to West, to make both even and morne Distinct por by retorne from Tropiques maine;
The seasons chang'd from those that were before,
Delight with leaves, with flowers, with fruits and graine.*

The earth suffered wrong by the inordinate streames and inundations of rivers, which had neither certaine chanelles nor banks: much of it lay waste and deformed, with loughs, marishes, and deepe bogges; much also remained savage, being over-spread with wild woods and fruitlesse forests: it brought forth no fruits ripe and pleasant; neither were there any tooles and instruments belonging to any arte; nor so much as any invention of a witty head. Hunger never gave us ease or time of repose; neither was there any expectation or waiting for the yearly seasons of seednesse, for there was no sowing at all. No marvell therefore, if we did eat the flesh of beasts and living creatures even contrary to nature, considering that then the very mosses and barke of trees served for food; & well was he who could find any greene grasse or quicke coich, or so much as the root of the herbe * Phleas: but whensoever men could meet with acornes and mast to taste and feed upon, they would dance and hop for joy about an oake or beech tree; and in their rusticall songs call the earth their bountifull mother, and their kinde nourise: and such a day as that onely, they accounted festivall: all their life besides was full of vexation, sorrow and heaviness. But now, what rage, what furie and madnesse inciteth you to commit such murders and carnage? seeing you have such store and plenty of all things necessarie for your life: why belie you the earth, and most unthankfully dishonour her, as if shee could not suffice and nourish you? why doe you violate the divine power of Ceres the inventresse of sacred lawes, and shame sweet and gracious Bacchus, as if these two deities gave you not sufficient whereupon you might live? what! are you not abashed to mingle at your tables pleasant frutes with bloudie murder? You call lions and libards savage beasts; meane while your selves are stained with bloudshed, giving no place to them in crueltie, for where as they doe worke and kill other beasts, it is for verie necessitie and need of food; but you doe it for daintie fare, for when wee have slaine either lions or wolves in defence of our selves, we eat them not but let them lie: But they be the innocent, the harmlesse, the gentle and tame creatures, which have neither teeth to bite, nor pricke to sting withall, which we take and kill, although nature seemeth to have created them, onely for beautie and delight: [ Much like as if a man seeing Nilus overflowing his banks, and filling all the countrey about with running water, which is generative and fruitful, would not praise with admiration the propertie of that river, causing to spring and grow many faire and goodly fruits, and the same so necessarie for mans life; but if he chance to espie a crocodill swimming, or an aspick creeping and gliding downe, or some venomous flie, hurtfull and noisome beastes all, blameth the said river upon that occasion, and saith that they be causes sufficient, that of necessitie he must complaine of the thing: Or verily, when one seeing this land and champion countrey overspread with good and beautifull frutes, charged also and replenished with eares of corne, should perceive casting his eye over those pleasant corne fields, here & there an eare of danel, choke-crill, or some such unhappie weed among, should thereupon forbear to reape and carie in the said corne, and forgoe the benefit of a plentiful harvest, & find fault therewith: Semblably standeth the case when one seeth the plea of an orator in anie cause or action, who with a full and forcible streame of eloquence, endeavoureth to save his client out of the danger of death, or otherwise to proove and verifie the charges and imputations of certaine crimes; this oration (I say) or eloquent speech of his, running not simply and nakedly, but carrying with it many and sundrie affections of all sorts, which he imprinteth in the minds and hearts of the hearers or judges, which being many also, and those divers and different, he is to turne, to bend and change, or otherwise, to dulce, appease and staies: if he I say should anon passe over and not consider the principall issue, and maine point of the cause, and busie himselfe in gathering out some by-speeches besides the purpose, or happily some phrases improper and impertinent, which the oration of some advocate with the flowing course thereof, hath carried downe with it, lighting thereupon, and falling with the rest of his speech. ] But we are nothing mooved either with the faire and beautifull colour, or the sweet and tunable voice, or the quicknesse and subtiltie of spirit, or the neat and cleane life, or the vivacitie of wit and understanding, of these poore seely creatures; and for a little peece of flesh we take away their life, we bereave them of the sunne and of light, cutting short that race of life which nature had limited and prefixed for them; and more than so, those lamentable and trembling voices which they utter for feare, we suppose to be inarticulate or insignificant sounds, and nothing lesse than pitiful full praier, supplications, pleas & justifications of these poore innocent creatures, who in their language, euerie one of them cry in this manner: If thou be forced upon necessitie, I beseech thee not to save my life: but if disordinate lust moove thee thereto, spare me: in case thou hast a mind simply to eat on my flesh, kill me; but if it be for that thou wouldest feed more delicately, hold thy hand and let me live. O monstrous crueltie! It is a horrible sight to see the table of rich men onely, stand served and furnished with viands, set out by cooks and victuallers that dresse the flesh of dead bodies; but most horrible it is to see the same taken up, for that the reliques and broken meats remaining, be farre more than that which is eaten: To what purpose then were those filly beasts slaine? Now there be others, who making spare of the viands served to the table, will in no hand that they should be cut or sliced; sparing them when as they be nothing els but bare flesh; whereas they spared them not whiles they were living beasts: But for-asmuch as we have heard that the same men hold and say: That nature hath directed them to the eating of flesh; it is plaine and evident, that this cannot accord with mans nature: And first and formost this appeereth by the very fabrick and composition of his bodie; for it resembleth none of those creatures whom nature hath made for to feed on flesh, considering they have neither hooked bil, no hauke-pointed tallans, they have no sharpe and rough teeth, nor stomack so strong, or so hot breath and spirit, as to be able to concoct and digest the heany masse of raw flesh: And if there were naught else to be alleged, nature her-selfe by the broadnesse and united equality of our teeth, by our small mouth, our soft tooing, the imbecillitie of naturall heat, and spirits serving for concoction, sheweth sufficiently that the approoveh not of mans usage to eat flesh, but disfavoreth and disclaimeth the same: And if you obstinately maintaine and defend, that nature hath made you for to eat such viands; then, that which you munde to eat first kill your selfe, even your owne selfe (I say) without using any blade, knife, bar, club, axe, or hatchet: And even as beares, lions, and wolves, slay a beast according as they meane to eat it; even so kill thou a beele, by the bit of thy teeth; slay me a swine with the helpe of thy mouth and iawes; teare in peeces a lambe or an hare with thy nailes; and when thou hast so done, eat it up while it is alive, like as beasts doe; but if thou stairst untill they be dead ere thou eate them, and art abashed to chafe with thy teeth the life that presently is in the flesh which thou eatest; why dost thou against nature eat that which had life? and yet, when it is deprived of life, and fully dead, there is no man hath the heart to eat the same as it is; but they cause it to be boiled, & to be roasted; they alter it with fire, and many drogues and spices, changing, disguising, and quenching (as it were) the horror of the murder, with a thousand devices of seasoning; to the end that the sense of tasting being beguiled and deceived by a number of sweet saucies and pleasant conditure, might admit and receive that which it abhorreth, and is contrary unto it. Certes it was a pretie conceit which was reported by a Laconian, who having bought in his Inne or hostelrie, a little fish, gave it, as it should seeme, to the Inkeeper for to be dressed; but when hee called unto him for vinegar, cheefe, and oyle to doe it withall: If (quoth the Laconian) I had that which thou demandest of me, I would never have bought this fish. But we contrarie, for to please our delicate tooth, are so delighted in slaughter and carnage, that flesh we call our viand; and yet then we have need of other viands for the very dressing of flesh it selfe, mixing and adding thereto, oile, wine, honie, the pickle or sauce garum and vinegar, embalming (as it were) and burying a dead corps with Syriake spices and Arabicke saucies. And verily, when our flesh meats after this maner be mortified, made tender, and in some sort putrified, our naturall heat hath much adoe to concoct the same, and being not able in deed to digest them perfectly, it engendereth in us dangerous heavinesse and crudities apt to breed diseases. Diogenes upon a time was so rash, that he durst eat a polype or pourecuttle fish all raw, because he would have taken away the use and helpe of fire in dressing such meats: and there being certeine priests and many other men standing about him, when he covered his head with his cloake, and put the flesh of the said poule to his mouth, he said unto them all; For your sake it is that I hazard my selfe thus as I doe, and adventure this jeopardie. Now by Jupiter, this was a proper perill in deed, and a doutie danger, was it not? for this Philosopher heere exposed not himselfe to any perillous hazard, as Pelopidas did, for recovery of the Thebans libertie; nor as Amoedium and Aristogiton, for the freedome of Athens: who thus wrestled with a raw poule fish in his stomacke, and all to make the life of man more beastlelike and savage. Well then, plaine it is that the eating of flesh is not onely unnaturall in regard of the bodie, but also by repletion, fulnesse and satietie, it maketh the soule fat and grosse: for the drinking of wine and feeding upon flesh meats to the full, howsoever it may seeme to cause the bodie to be more able and strong, yet surely

surely the minde it doth enfeeble and weaken. And lest I should be thought a professed enemy to those who practise the exercise of the bodie named Athletike, I will use the domestick examples of mine owne countrey: for the inhabitants of Attica do teame us of Beotia, fat backs, grosse and senselesse, yea, and blockish fots, principally for our ranke and large feeding; like as one said:

*Oftruneth these men, in judgement mine,
Benothing els but franked swine.*

And as Menander wrote in one place:

With fat their cheeks be puffed and swolne:

See, see their chaps how they be bolue.

As also Pindarus:

*They plie their jawes, they feed amaine,
That even their cheeks do shine againe.*

But according to Heraclitus, the drie soule seemeth to be the wisest: for know thus much moreover; that emptie, tunnes, pipes, or barrels, resound when they be knocked upon; whereas as if they be full, they answer not againe to the knocks or stroaks given them: brasse pannes or coppers which be thin & slender, render sounds, and ring all about untill such time as one come and with his hand seeme to stop and dull the stroke that otherwise went round about: The eie filled with superfluous humiditie, becommeth dim and darke; neither hath it the full strength and power to performe his office. When we behold the sunne through a moist aire, and a number of thick mists, and grosse undigested vapors, we see him not in his owne nature pure, cleere, and bright; but as it were in the bottome of a cloud, all dusky, and casting forth thicke wandering and disperfed beames: And even so through a bodie troubled with vapors, full fedde overcharged with nutriments, of unkind and strange viands, it cannot chuse but all the light and shining brightnesse of the soule which is naturall, should become dusked and troubled, having no radiant settled splendour, able to pierce thoroughly to the ends and extremities of subtle and fine objects, hardly to be discerned, but the same is wandering, unsteadie and disperfed.

But setting all these matters aside, is it not, thinke you, a right commendable thing to be acquainted and accustomed to humanitie? for who would ever finde in his heart to abuse & wrong a man, who is affectionate, gentle, and milde, to the very beasts which are of a strange kind from us, and have no communication of reason with us? Three daies agoe, I alledged and cited in my disputation a testimonie of Xenocrates to this purpose; and namely: How the Athenians condemned him to pay a round fine, who had slaine a quick ramme: And in very truth, he that tormenteth and putteth to paine one that is living, is not in my conceit worfe than he that taketh the life away and killeth him: Howbeit, as farre as I can see, more sense and feeling we have of such things as be unusuall and against custome, than unnaturall and contrarie unto kinde: But those reasons which I then delivered, smell haply of some grossenesse, and were too triviall; for I feare and am loth to touch and set abroch in these my discourfes, that great and high principle, that deepe and mysticall cause of this our position: That we ought not to eat flesh; for that I say the hidden secret and original thereof is so incredible to bafe and timorous persons, as Plato saith, and to such as favour of nothing but of earthly and mortall matters; and heerein I fare much like unto the pilot and master of the ship, who in a tempest is afraid to put his ship to sea; or unto a poet, who dareth not set up his fabrick or engin in the theater, all while the stage or pageant is turned and caried round about: And yet peradventure it were not amisse in this place to resound and pronounce aloud those verses of Empedocles, * * *. For under covert tearmes he doth allegorize and give us to understand; that the soules heere, are tied and fastened to mortall bodies, by way of punishment, for that they have bene murderers, have eaten flesh, devoured one another, and bene fed by mutuall slaughter and carnage: And yet this seemeth to be an opinion more ancient than Empedocles: for those fictions of Poets as touching the dismembred of Bacchus, and the outrageous attempts of the Tyrans against him, and how they tasted of flesh murdered, as also of their punishment, and how they were smitten with lightning, they be mere fables: the hidden mythologie whereof, tendeth to that renovation of birth or resurrection: for surely that brutish and reasonlesse part of our soule which is violent, disordered, and not divine, but devilish and daemoniac, the ancient philosophers called Titans; and this is that which is tormented, and suffereth judicial punishment.

The second Declamation.

The Summarie.

Our author pursuing in this second Treatise his matter and proposition, which he broched and began in the former declamation; and acknowledging how gourmandise, gluttony, and evil custome be dangerous counsellors; yet granteth and agreeth in the end, that a man may eat flesh, upon certaine conditions which he doth specify, condemning withall, the cruell excesse and riot of many in their fare. After this, having given the example of Lycurgus, that we ought to cut off the first occasions of all superfluities, he conferreth the opinions of Pythagoras and Empedocles, with those of other philosophers, and therewith setteth downe his owne conceits and advice. Afterwards when he had in one word touched from whence, and whereupon men become so bold and hardie to eat flesh; he declareth a flesh and brooeth, that this manner of feeding doth wonderfully prejudice both bodie and soule. And in conclusion, he confuteth the Stoicks, opposite enemies to the doctrine of Pythagoras; leaving their fustion unperfect, were it that himselfe never finished it, or that the malice and iniquitie of the time hath deprived us thereof: Like as many other fragments missing in these works.

OF EATING FLESH.

The second Declamation.

Reason would, that we should be flesh disposed, and readie in will, in mind and thought, to heare the discourse against this mutlie and unfavoiur custome of eating flesh: For hard it is, as Cato was wont to say, to preach unto the belly that hath no eares; and besides we have all drunke of the cup of custome, resembling that of Circus which

*Compoundeth is of dolor, griefes and paines,
Of sorrowes, woes, and of deceitfull traines*

Neither is it an easie matter for them to cast up againe the hooke of the appetite to eat flesh, who have swallowed it downe into their centrals, and are transported and tull of the love of pleasures and delights: But well and happy it were for us, if, as the manner is of the Egyptians, so soone as men are dead, to paunch them, and when their belly and bowels be taken forth, to mangle, cut and slice the same against the sunne, and then to fling them away, as being the cause of all finnes that they have committed: so we would first cut away from ourselves all our gourmandise, gluttonie, and murdering of innocent creatures, that we might afterwards lead the rest of our life pure and holy; considering that it is not the belly it selfe that by murder defileth us; but polluted it is by our intemperance. But say, it is not in our power to effect this much, or be it, that upon an inveterate custome, we are ashamed in this point to be innocent and faultlesse; yet let us at leastwise commit sinne in measure, and transgress with reason: Let us I say eat flesh, but so, as we be driven thereto for verie hunger, and not drawn to it by a licorous tooth, to satise our necessitie, and not to feed our greedie and delicate humour: kill we a beast, howbeit with some griefe of heart, with some commiseration and pittie; and not of a proud and insolent spirit, ne yet of a murderous minde;

as men doe now adaeis, after many and divers sorts: For some in killing of swine or porkets, thrust them in with red-hot spits; to the end that the blood being shed and quenched as it were by the tincture of the fire iron, running through the body, might cause the flesh forthwith to be more tender and delicate: ye shall have others leape upon the udders and paps of the poore fowes ready to farrow, and trample upon their bellies and teats with their feet, that the blood, the milke, and the congealed bag of the young pigges, knit within the dammes wombe, being all jumbled, confused and blended together, even amidst the painfull pangs of farrowing (O Jupiter Piscularis) they might make (I would not els) a most deintie dish of meat, and devoure the most corrupt and putrified part of the poore beast: many there are who have a device to stich and sowe up the eies of cranes and swannes, and when they have so done, to mew them up in a darke place, and to feed them, cramming them with strange compositions and pastes made of dried figges; but wot you why? because their flesh should be more deintie and pleasant: whereby it appeareth evidently, that it is not for need of nourishment, nor for want and necessitie; but even for facietie, wantonnesse, sumptuous curiositie, and superfluous excesse, that of horrible injustice and wickednesse, they make their pleasure and delight: and like as the filthy lecherous person, who is unsatiabie in the pleasure of women, after he hath assiaied many, runneth on headlong still, roving and ranging every way, and yet his unbridled and untamed lust is not yet satisfied, but hee falleth to perpetrate such horrible villanies as are not once to be named; even so intemperance in meats, when it hath passed once the bounds of nature, and limits of necessitie, proceedeth to outrage and crueltye, fearing all meanes how to varie and change the disordinate appetite; for the organs and instruments of our senses, by a fellow feeling and contagion of maladies, are affected one by another, yea, and runne into disorder and Sinne together, through intemperance, when they rest not contented with the measure assigned them by nature: Thus the hearing being out of frame and sicke, or not guided by reason, marreth musicke; the feeling when it is degenerate into an effeminate delicacie, seeketh filthily after wanton ticklings, touchings, and frictions handling of women: the same vice of intemperance hath taught the eieight not to be contented with beholding morisks, pyrrhick, or warlike dances, nor other lawdable and decent gestures, ne yet to see and view faire pictures and goodly statues, but to esteeme the death and murder of men, their mortall wounds, bloudie fights, and deadly combats, to be the best sights and spectacles that can be devised. And heereupon it is, that upon such excessive fare & superfluity at the table, there ensue ordinarily wanton loves; upon lecherie and filthy venerie, there followeth beastly talke; these bawdie ballads and stinking tales, be accompanied commonly with hideous fights, & monstrous shewes: lastly, these horrible spectacles have attending upon them, crueltie and inhumane impassibilitie, even in the cases of verie mankind. Heereupon it was that Lycurgus the divine law-giver, in those three ordinances of his which he called Rhetra, commanded that the dores, routes & finials of houses, should be made with the saw & the ax onely, & no other instrument besides thereto employed; which he did not, I assure you, for any hatred at all that he conceived against augers, wimbles, twibils, or other tooles for joyners or carvers worke; but he knew well enough, that a man would never bring among such simple frames a gilded bedstead, nor venture to carrie into an house so plainly built, silver tables, hangings, carpets and coverings of rich tapestrie dyed with purple, or any precious stones; and he wist full well, that with such an house, with such bedsteads, tables and cups, a frugall supper and a simple dinner would agree and fort best. For to say a truth, upon the beginning and foundation of a disordinate diet, and superfluous kind of life; all manner of delicacie and costly curiositie useth to follow

Like as the sucking foale, alway

Runnes with the damme, and doth not stay.

What supper then, is not to be counted sumptuous, for which there is evermore killed some living creature or other: for doe we thinke little of the dispense of a soule? and suppose we, that the losse of life is not costly? I do not now say, that it was peradventure the soule of a mother, a father, some friend, or a sonne, as Empedocles gave it out; but surely a soule endued with sense, with seeing, hearing, apprehension, understanding, witte and discretion, such as nature hath given to each living creature, sufficient to seeke and get that which is good for it, and likewise to avoid and shun whatsoever is hurtfull and contrary unto it. Consider now a little, whether those philosophers that teach and will us to eat our children, our friends, our fathers and wives when they are dead, doe make us more gentle and fuller of humanitie, than Pythagoras; ras and Empedocles, who accustom and acquaint us to be kind and just, even to other creatures. Well, you mock and laugh at him that maketh conscience to eat of a mutton; and shall not we (say they) laugh a good and make sport when we see one cutting and chopping pieces of his father or mother being dead, and sending away some thereof to his friends who are absent, and inviting such as be present and neere at hand, to come and make merrie with the rest, causing such joints and pieces of flesh to be served up to the table, without any spare at all? But it may be, that we offend now, and commit some fault in handling these books, having not before hand cleansed our hands, mundified our eyes, purified our feet, and purged our eares; unlesse perhaps this be their cleansing and expiation, to devise & discourse of such things with sweet & pleasant words, which as Plato saith, wash away all salt & brackish hearing; but if a man should set these books & arguments in parallell opposition or comparison one with another, he would judge that some of them were the Philosophie of the Scythians, Tartarians, Sagidians, and Melanchlanians, of whom when Herodotus writeth, he is taken for a liar; and as for the sentences and opinions of Pythagoras and Empedocles, they were the very lawes, ordinances, statutes, and judgements of the auncient Greeks, according to which they framed their lives, to wit: That there were betwene us and brute beasts certaine common rights: who were they then, that afterwards otherwise ordained?

Ccc

*Even they who first of iron and Steele, mischievous swords did forge:
And of poore labouring ox at plough, began to cut the gorge.*

For even thus also began tyrants to commit murders; like as at the first in old time, they killed at Athens one notorious and most wicked scyophant, named Epiridius; so they did by accident, and likewise a third: now the Athenians being thus acquainted to see men put to death; saw afterwards Niceratus the sonne of Nicias murdered; Theramenes also the great commander and captaine generall; yea and Polemarchus the philosopher. Semblably, men began at first to eat the flesh of some savage and hurtfull beast, then some fowles and fish were flayed and caught with nets, and consequently, crueltye (being fleshed as it were, exercised and inured in these and such like slaughters) proceeded even to the poore labouring ox, to the silly sheepe that doth clad and trimme our bodies, yea, and to the house-cocke: and thus men by little and little augmenting their insatiable greedinesse, never staid untill they came to man-slaughter, to murder, yea, and to bloodie battels. But if a man can not proove nor make demonstration by sound reasons, that soules in their resurrections and new natiuities meet with common bodies; so as that which now is reasonable, becommeth afterwards reasonlesse, and likewise that which at this present is wild and savage, commeth to be by another birth and regeneration, tame and gentle againe; and that nature transmuteth and translateth all bodies, dislodging and replacing the soule of one in another,

*And cladding them with robes unknowne,
Of other flesh, as with their owne.*

Are not these reasons yet at leastwise sufficient to reclaim and divert men from this unbridled intemperance of murdering dumb beasts? namely, that it breedeth maladies, crudities, heaviness and indigestion in the bodie, that it marreth and corrupteth the soule, which naturally is given to the contemplation of high and heavenly things? to wit, when we have taken up a wont and custome, not to feast a friend or stranger who commeth to visit us, unlesse we shed blood; and cannot celebrate a marriage dinner, or make merrie with our neighbours and friends without committing murder? And albeit the said prooffe and argument of the transmigration of soules into sundrie bodies, be not sufficiently declared, so as it may deserve to be credited and beleeved; yet surely the conceit and opinion thereof, ought to work some scruple and feare in our hearts, and in some sort hold us in & stay our hands. For like as when two armies encounter one another in a night battell; if one chauce to light upon a man fallen upon the ground, whose bodie is all covered and hidden with armour, and present his sword to cut his throat, or runne him through, and therewith heare another crying unto him, that he knoweth not certainly, but thinketh and suppoiseth that the partie lying along is his brother, his sonne, his father, or tent-fellow; whether were it better, that he giving eare and credit to this conjecture and suspicion (false though it be) should spare and forbear an enemy for a friend, or rejecting that which had no sure and evident prooffe, kill one of his friends in stead of an enemy? I suppose there there is not one of you all but will say, that the later of these were a most grosse and leud part, Behold moreover Merope in the tragedy when she listeth up her ax for to strike her own sonne, taking him to be the murderer of her sonne, and saying with all:

*Have at thy head, for now I traw,
I shall thee give a deadly blow.*

what a stirre and trouble she maketh over all the theater? how she causeth the haire to stand upright upon the heads of the spectators, for feare lest she should prevent the old man who was about to take hold of her arme, and so wound the guiltlesse yoong man her sonne? But if peradventure in this case there should have stood another aged man fast by, crying unto her: Strike hardly, for it is your enemy, and a third contrariwise, saying: Strike not in any wise, it is your owne sonne; whether had beene the greater and more grievous sinne, to let goe the revengement of her enemy for doubt that he was her sonne, or to commit filicide and murder her sonne indeed, for the anger she bare unto her enemy? When as therefore there is neither hatred nor anger that driveth us to doe a murder; when neither revenge, nor feare of our owne safetie and life mooveth us, but even for our pleasure we have a poore sheepe lying under our hand with the throat turned upward, a philosopher of the one side should say: Cut the throat, for it is a brute beast, and another admonish us on the other side, saying: Stay your hand and take heed what you doe; for what know you to the contrary, whether in that sheepe be the soule lodged of some kinsman of yours, or peradventure of some God? Is the danger (before God) all one and the same, whether I refuse to eat of the flesh, or beleeve not that I kill my child or some one of my kinsfolke?

But surely the Stoicks are not equally matched in this fight for the defence of eating flesh: For what is the reason that they so band themselves, and be so open mouthed in the maintenance of the belly and the kitchen? what is the cause that condemning pleasure as they doe, for an effeminate thing, and not to be held either good or indifferent, no nor so much as familiar and agreeable to nature, they stand so much in the parronage of those things that make to the pleasure and delight of feeding? And yet by all consequence, reason would, that considering they chase and banish from the table, all sweet perfumes and odoriferous ointments, yea, and all pastrie worke, and banketing junkets, they should be rather offended at the sight of bloud and flesh. But now, as if by their precise philosophical rules, they would controule our day-books and journals of our ordinarie expences, they cut off all the cost bestowed upon our table in things needlesse and superfluous; meane while they finde no fault with that which savoureth of bloudshed and crueltye in this superfluitie of table furniture: We doe not indeed, (say they) because there is no communication of rights betwene beasts and us; but a man might answer them againe verie well: No more is there betwene us and perfumes or other forraime and exoticall sauces, and yet you would have us to abstaine from them, rejecting and blaming on all sides, that which in any pleasure is neither profitable nor needfull. But let us I pray you consider upon this point a little neerer, to wit, whether there be any communication in right and justice, betwene us and unreasonable creatures or no? and let us doe it not subtilly and artificially, as the captious manner is of these sophisters in their disputations;

but rather after a gentle and familiar sort, having an eye unto our owne passions and affections, let us reason and decide the matter with our selves.

THAT

The Summarie.

Great disputations there have bene holden among the Philosophers and Sages of the world, as touching the sovereign good of man, as it may appeere even as this day by the books that are extant among us; and yet neither one nor other, have hit the true marke whereat they shot, to wit: The right knowledge of God: Howbeit, some of them are a great deale further out of the way than others; and namely the Epicureans, whom our author doth perswinge in many places, as holding a doctrine cleave contrary unto theirs, according as his writings doe testifie. And forasmuch as Epicurus and his disciples placed and established this sovereign good, in pleasure of the bodie: this their opinion is heere examined and confuted at large: for in forme of a dialogue Plutarch rehearseth the communication or conference which he had with Arilodemus, Zeuxippus, and Theon, as they walked together immediately after one lecture of his upon this matter, who having shewed in generall termes the absurdities of this Epicurian doctrine, maintaineth in one word: That it is no life at all for to live according to the same. Then he explaneth and sheweth what the Epicureans meane by this word To live: and from thence proceedeth forward to refute their imagination, and whatsoever dependeth thereupon, and that by sound and weighty arguments, intermingling many pretie conceits and pleasant jests, together with certaine proper similitudes for the purpose: After he had proved that they were deceived themselves, and seduced their disciples; he holdeth moreover this point: That even they deprive themselves of the true good, which consisteth in the repose and contentment of the mind, rejecting (as they doe) all Histories, Mathematicall arts and liberall sciences, and among the rest, Poetrie and Musicks, shewing throughout all this discourse that such persons are deprived of common sense. Passing forward, he holdeth and maintaineth that the soule taketh joy in a contentment proper to it selfe: and afterwards in discoursing of the pleasure that active life doth bring; he refuteth more and more his aduersarie, addressing to this purpose, a certaine conference and comparison betwene the pleasures of bodie and soule; whereby a man may see the miserie of the one, and the excellencie of the other. This point he enricheth with divers examples; the end whereof sheweth: That there is nothing as all to be counted great or profitable in the schoole of Epicurus, whose scholars never durst approve his opinion, especially in death: also: That vertuous men have without all comparison much more pleasure in this world, than the Epicureans, who in their afflictions know not how to receive any joy or comfort by remembrance of their pleasures past. And this is the very summe of the dialogue during the time that the above named persons did walke; who after they were set, began the disputation a fresh, and spake in the first place of Gods providence, condemning by divers reasons the atheisme of the Epicureans, who are altogether inexcusable, even in comparison of the common sort given to superstition: continuing and holding on this discourse, he depicteth very lively the nature of the Epicureans, and cometh to represent and let down the contentment that men of honor have in their religions; where also he holdeth this point: That God is not the author of evil; and that the Epicureans are sufficiently punished for their impietie, in depriving themselves of that pleasure which cometh unto us by meditation of the divine wisdom, in the conduct and management of all things. Consequently he sheweth that this their prophane philosophie overthroweth and confoundeth all persons, as well in their death, as during their life: Whereupon he proceedeth to treat of the immortality of the soule, and of the life to come; describing at large the misery of the Epicureans: and for a final conclusion, he compriseth in fower or five lines the summarie of all their error, and so butteth up and concludeth the whole disputation.

THAT A MAN CANNOT live pleasantly according to the do- ctrine of Epicurus.

Colotes one of the disciples, and familiar followers of Epicurus, wrote and published a booke, wherein he endeavoured to proove and declare: That there was no life at all to speake of, according to the opinions and sentences of other Philosophers. Now as touching that which readily came into my minde for the answer of his challenge and the discourse against his reasons in the defence of other Philosophers, I have before time put downe in writing: but forasmuch as after the lecture and disputation of this matter ended, there passed many speeches in our walke against that sect; I thought it good to collect and gather the same, yea, and to reduce them into a written treatise; if for nothing els, yet for this cause, to give them at leastwise to understand who are so ready to note, censure and correct others, that a man ought to have heard and read with great heed and diligence (and not superficially) the works and writings of those whom he taketh upon him to reprove and refute, and not to strike out one word here & another there, or to take hold of his words delivered by way of talke & conference, and not couched and set down precisely in writing, thereby to repell and drive away the ignorant and such as have no knowledge of those things. For when as we walked forth, after the lecture (as our man was) out of the schoole into the common place of exercise, Zeuxippus moving speech, began in this wise: Me thinks (quoth he) that this discourse hath bene delivered much more mildly and gently, than becometh franknesse and libertie of speech betwixt the schooles; which is the reason that Heraclides and his followers be departed from us, as discontented and displeased, yea, and much more bitterly nipping and checking us (without any cause given on our part) than either Epicurus or Metrodorus. Then Theon: Why said you so, quoth he) that Colotes (in comparison of them) is the most modest and fairest spoken man in the world? For the most foule and reprochfull tearmes that can be devised for to raile and slander withall, to wit, of sacrileges, scurrilities, vanities of speech, talkative, babbling, glorious and vinting arrogancie, whoremonging, murders, counterfeited hypocrites, confiners, curled creatures, heavie-headed, brainicke, tedious and making their braines ake who readeth them: these (I say) they have raked up together, and discharged as it were haile-shot upon Aristotle, Socrates, Pythagoras, Protagoras, Theophrastus, Heraclides, Hipparchus, and whom not of all the most renowned and principall Philosophers? in such sort, that how well and wisely soever they have carried themselves otherwise, yet in regard of their foule mouthes, slanderous speeches, and beastly backbitings, they deserve to be sequestered farre off, and put out of the range and number of wise men and Philosophers: for envie, emulation and jealousie ought not to enter into this divine dance and heavenly quire, being to weak and impotent, that they can not dissemble and hide their griefe and discontent. Heereat Aristodemus: Heraclides (quoth hee) who by profession is a Grammarian, in the behalfe of all the poetical rabble (for so it pleaseth the Epicureans to blason them) and for all the foolish and fabulous vanities of Homer, hath well required Epicurus; or because Metrodorus in so many places of his writings hath reviled and abused that prince of poets: but as for them (o Zeuxippus) let them goe as they are: and whereas it was objected in the beginning of the speech against those men: That there was no living at all after their precepts and rules, why doe not we our selves, alone by our selves, taking unto us Theon for our associat (because this man here was weary) go in hand to prosecute the same thorowly? Then Theon made him this answer:

This combat hath before us, bene

Performed by others, well I weene.

And therefore propounding to our selves (if it please you) another marke and scope to aime at, let us (for to be revenged of the injurie done unto other philosophers) proceed after this forme of proceffe, and assay to proove and shew (if it be possible) that according to the doctrine even of these Epicureans, men can not live in joy and pleasure. Say you so? (quoth I then, and laughed heartily withall) now surely, me thinks you are leapt upon their bellies, and be readie to

trample them with both your feet: certes, you will enforce these men to fight for their verie owne flesh if you bereave them of pleasure, who doe nothing els but crie out and sing this note:

*We are in deed no champions brave,
In fight with fists no grace we have,*

neither are we eloquent oratours, wise magistrates or prudent governours and rulers of cities or States,

*But for to scalt and make good chere,
To eat and drinke, we have no peere.*

We love (I say) to banquet alwaies and make merie, to give our selves contentment and all the delightfull motions and pricks of the flesh, if haply any pleasure and joy thereby may be transmitted and sent into the soule: so as you seeme to me not to deprive these men of joy and solace onely, but also of their very life, in case you doe not leave them a pleasant and iocund life. How then? (quoth Theon) if you thinke so well of this subiect matter, why do not you set in hand to it at this present. For mine owne part (said he again) content I will be to heare you, and answer againe, if you request so much; but begin you first to set us in the traine thereof, for I will yeeld unto you the superioritie and preidence of this disputation. Now when Theon seemed to pretend some small excuse, Aristodemus: O what a compendious, ready, faire & plaine way (quoth he) have you cut us of, for to come unto this point, in not permitting us first to make inquisition unto this Epicurean sect, and to put them to their triall as touching vertue and honestie: for it is no easie matter, nay it is impossible to drive these men from a pleasant and voluptuous life, so long as they suppose and set downe this: That the supreme end of all humane felicitie lieth in pleasure; whereas, if we could once have brought this about: That they lived not honestly; presently and withall, they had bene put by their pleasant life; for they themselves confesse, and say: That a man can not live in joy, unlesse he be honest; for that the one may not stand without the other. As touching that point (quoth Theon) we will not sticke in the progresse of our discourse, to handle it, but for the present, we will take that which they grant, and make our use of it; this therefore they holde: That the soveraigne good whereof we speake, consisteth in the bellie and the parts thereof, as also in those other passages and conduits of the bodie, thorow which pleasure entred into it; & no pain at all: and they are of opinion that all the fine devices, subtill and wittie inventions in the world were put in triall and practised, for to please and content the bellie, or at leastwise, for the good hope that the should enjoy contentment, according as the wise Philosopher Metrodorus hath said and written. And verily, by this their first supposition, without going any farther, it is easie to be knowne and scene (my good friend) what a slender, poore, rotten and unsteadie foundation they have laied, to ground upon it their soveraigne good; considering that even those pores & conduits abovesaid (by which they bring in their pleasures) lie as well open to admit grievous paines; or to say more truly, there be very few waies in the bodie of man, by which, pleasure entred; whereas there is no part or member thereof, but receiveth dolor and paine. For be it granted, that all pleasures have their seat in the naturall parts, about joints, sinewes, feet and hands; why, even in these very places are bedded and seated also the most cruell and grievous passions that be; to wit, of goutie fluxes and rheumaticke ulcers, of gangrenes, tetters, wolves, cancerous sores, which corrode, eat, mortifie and putrifie the parts that they possesse. If you present unto the bodie the sweetest odours and the most pleasant favours that be, you shall finde but few places therein (and seeke thorowout) affected therewith mildly and gently to their contentment; whereas all the rest often times are grieved and offended thereby: nay there is no part at all of the body, but subiect it is to feele and suffer the smart dolors inflicted by fire, by sword, by sting, biting, scourging and whipping; the ardour of heat, the rigor of colde entereth and pierceth into all parts, like also as doth the fever: but pleasures verily are much like unto pretie puffs and gentle gales of winde, blowing after a smiling manner, some upon one extremitie that beareth out of the bodie, and some upon other, as if it were upon the rocks lying forth in the sea, they passe away, blow over and vanish incontinently, their time and continuance is so short: much like unto those meteors or fire-lights in the night, which represent the shooting of stars as if they fell from heaven, or traversed the skie from one side to the other; soone are the pleasures on a light fire, and as soone againe gone out and quenched at one instant in our flesh; but contrariwise, how long paines and dolors do endure, we cannot alledge a better testimony than that of Philostates in Aeschylus, who speaking of the paine of his ulcer, saith thus:

That

*That dragon fell, doth never leave his holde,
By day or night, since first my foot he caught:
The stinging smart goes to my heart full colde,
By poisoned tooth which from his mouth it rought.*

Neither doth the anguish of paine lightly runne over and glide, after a tickling manner, upon other superficial parts and extremities of the bodie; but contrariwise, like as the graine or seed of the Sea-claver or Trefoile Medica, is writthen and full of points and angles, whereby it taketh hold of the earth and sticketh fast, and there (by reason of those points so rough and rugged) continueth a long time; even so dolor and paine, having many crotchets and hooked spines of roots, which it putteth forth and spreadeth here and there, inserteth and interlatheth it selfe within the flesh, and there abideth, not onely for a night and a day, but also for certaine seasons of whole yeeres, yea, and some revolutions of Olympiades, so that hardly and with much adoe at the last departeth, being thrust out by other paines, like as one nail is driven forth by another stronger than it. For what man was ever known to have drunke or eaten for long a time, as they endure thirst who are sicke of an ague, or abide hunger who are besieged? and where is that solace and pleasure in the companie and conversation of friends, that lasteth so long as tyrants cause them to abide torture and punishment, who fall into their hands? and all this proceedeth from nought els but the inability and untowardnesse of the body, to leade a voluptuous life; for that in truth, made it is more apt to abide paine and travell, than to joy in delights and pleasures; to endure laborious dolors, it hath strength and power sufficient; whereas to enjoy pleasures and delights, it sheweth presently how feeble and impotent it is, in that so soone it hath enough and is wearie thereof: by occasion whereof, when they see that wee are minded to discourse much as touching a voluptuous life, they interrupt and breake incontinently our purpose, confessing themselves; that bodily and fleshly pleasure is very small and feeble, or (to say a truth) transitorie, and such as passeth away in a moment; unlesse haply they are disposed to lie and speake otherwise than they thinke; like as Metrodorus did, when he said: That often times we sit against the pleasures of the bodie; and Epicurus, when he writeth: That a wise man being sicke and diseased, laugheth and rejoiceth in the middes of the greatest and most excessive paines of his corporall malady. How is it possible then, that they who so lightly and easily beare the anguish of bodily paines, should make any account of pleasures? for admit that they give no place to paines, either in greatnesse or continuance of time, yet they have at leastwise some reference and correspondence unto them, in that Epicurus hath given this generall limitation and common definition to them all; to wit, Indolence or a subtraction of all that which might cause and move paine; as if nature extended joy to the easement onely of dolor, and suffered it not to proceed further in augmentation of pleasure; but when it came once to this point, namely, to feele no more paine, it admitted onely certaine needlesse varieties. But the way to come with an appetite and desire to this estate, being indeed the full measure of joy and pleasure, is exceeding briebe and short; whereupon these Epicureans perceiving well, that this place is verie leane and hard, do translate and remove their soveraigne good, which is the pleasure of the bodie, as it were out of a barren soile, into a more fruitfull and fertile ground, and namely, to the soule, as if therein we should have alwaies orchards, gardens and meddowes covered over with pleasures and delights, whereas according to the saying of Telemachus in Homer:

In Ithaca there is no spacious place, Affording plaine as large to runne a race.

And even so in this poore fleshly body of ours, there is no fruition of pleasure united, plaine and smooth, but altogether rugged and rough, intermingled and delayed for the most part, with many agitations that be feverous and contrary to nature. Hereat Zenippus taking occasion to speake: Thinke you not then (quoth he) that these men doe very wel in this, that they begin with the body; wherein it seemeth that pleasure engendred first, & afterwards end in the soule, as in so that which is more constant & firme, reposing therein all absolute perfection? Yes I wis (quoth I) and my thinks I assure you that they doe passing well, and according to the direction of nature, in case they still search after and find that which is more perfect, and accomplished like as those persons do, who give themselves to contemplation and politicke life; but if afterwards you heare them protest and crie with open mouth, that the soule joiet in no worldly thing, nor findeth content and repose, but onely in corporall pleasure, either present and actual, or els in mere expectation thereof, and that therein alone consisteth their soveraigne good: thinke you not that they use the soule as a receptorie for the bodie, and in thus translating the pleasure of the body into it, they doe as those who powre and fill wine out of one vessell that leaketh and is naught, into another that is more compact and will hold better, for to preserve and keepe it longer, as supposing thereby, to make the thing farre better, and more honourable; and verily time doth keepe well and mend the wine that is thus powred out of one vessell into another. But of pleasure, the soule receiving the remembrance onely, as the odour and smell thereof, retaineth nothing else; for that so soone as pleasure hath wrought or boyled as it were one waime in the flesh, it is soone quenched and extinguished, and that remembrance remaining thereof passeth soone away as a shadow, smoke, or tuning vapour; much like as if a man should gather and heape together a number of fantasies and cogitations of whatsoever he had eat or drunke before time, and so make his repast and food thereof, for default of other wines and viands fresh and present in place: yet see how much more modestly the Cyrenaick philosophers are affected, although they have drunke out of the same bottle with Epicurus; for they are of opinion, that the wanton sports of Venus should not be exercised openly, and in the day light, but would have the same to be hidden and covered with the darkness of the night; for feare lest our cogitation receiving cleerely by the eie sight the representations of this laid act, might estfoones inflame and stirre up the lust and appetite thereto: whereas these men contrariwise doe hold, that herein consisteth the perfection of a wise mans felicitie, for that he remembereth certainly, and retaineth surely all the evident figures, gestures, and motions of pleasures past. Now whether such precepts and rules as these, be unworthy; the name of those who make profession of wisdom, namely thus to suffer such scourings and filthy ordures of their pleasures to remain in the soule, as it were in the smoke and draught of the bodie, I purpose not to discourse at this time. But surely that unpossible it is for such matters to make a man happie, or to live a joyous life, may hereby appeere most evidently: For the pleasure of remembering delights past, cannot be very great unto those, who had but a small fruition thereof when they were present; and unto those likewise, who find it expedient for them, to have the same presented in a measure, & soone to retire & withdraw themselves from them, it cannot be profitable to think thereupon long after, considering that even with those persons who of al other be most sensual & given to fleshly pleasures, the joy & contentment abideth not at al after they have once performed the action; only there remaineth with them a certaine shadow, and the illusion (as it were in a dreame) of the pleasure that is flown away, continueth a while in their minde, for to mainteine and kindle still the fire of their concupiscence: much like unto those who in their sleepe dreame that they are drinking, or enjoying their loves; and verily such imperfect pleasures and imaginarie joys doe nothing els but more egerly whet and provoke lascivious life: neither (I assure you) is the remembrance of those pleasures which these men have enjoined in times past, delectable; but only out of the small reliques remaining of their pleasure, which are but weake, slender and feeble, the same remembrance doth renew and stirre up againe a furious appetite, which pricketh and provoketh them evidently, and giveth them no rest. Again, no likelihood there is, that even those who otherwise be sober, honest, and continently given, doe amuse themselves and busie their heads in calling to minde such matters, and to reade and count them out of a journal register or day-booke and Kalender, according as the ridiculous yeast goes of one Carneades who was wont to do so, namely: How often have I lien with Hedra or with Leontium? In what and how many places have I drunke Thasian wine? At how many let feasts at three weeks or twentie daies end, have I bene merie and made great and sumptuous chere? For this passionate affection of the minde, and disordinate forwardnesse, thus to call to remembrance and represent delights past, doth argue and bewray most evidently an outrageous appetite and beastly furious heat after pleasures either present, or expected and looked for: and therefore my conceit is this: That even these men themselves perceiving what absurdities doe follow hereupon, have had recourse to indolence and the good state and disposition of the body; as if to live in joy and happinesse, were to thinke and imagine upon such a complexion, that either shall be or hath bene in some persons. For this firme habit and compact constitution of the flesh (say they) and the assured hope that it will continue, bringeth an exceeding contentment, and a most sound permanent joy unto as many as can discourse and thinke thereupon in their minds: For the better proove thereof, consider first and foremost their behaviour, and what they do, namely, how they remove, tosse and transport up and downe this pleasure, indolency, or firme disposition of the flesh, (call it what you will) transferring it out of the bodie into the soule, and againe from the soule to the bodie, for that they cannot holde and stay it, being apt to slide and run from them; whereupon they are forced to tie and fasten it to some chiefe head and principle; and thus they do stay and susteine the pleasure of the bodie with the joy of the minde, and reciprocally determine and accomplish the joy of the minde in the hope and expectation of bodily pleasure. But how is it possible, that the foundation being thus moveable and inconstant, the rest of the building upon it, should not likewise be unstedfast? or how can the hope be fast, and the joy assured, being founded upon a ground-work exposed so much unto wavering and to so many mutations as these be, which compasse and environ ordinarily the bodie, subject to a number of necessitie injuries, hurts and wounds from without, and having within the very bowels thereof, the sources and springs of many evils and maladies, which the discourse of reason is not able to avert and turne away? For otherwise it could not be, that these men (prudent and wise as they are) should have bene afflicted and tormented with the diseases of painfull strangurie or pissing drop-meale, the suppression and difficultie of urine, bloody fluxes, dysenteries and dolorous wrings in the guts, phthisicks, and consumptions of the lungs or dropries; of which maladies Epicurus himselfe was plagued with some, Polyemus with others, Nicoles also and Agathobulus had their part and were much troubled therewith, which I speake not by way of reproch unto them; for I know very well, that Pherceides and Heracitus, two singular personages, were likewise incumbered with grievous maladies: but wee would gladly require and request of them (if they will acknowledge their owne passions and accidents which they endure, and not, upon a vaine bravery of words, to win a popular favour and applause of the people, incur the crime of insolent arrogance, and be convict of leasing) either not to admit the firme and strong constitution of the flesh, for the element and principle of all joy; or els not to beare us in hand and affirm, that those who be fallen into painfull anguish and dolorous disease, doe laugh, disport, and be wantonly merie: for well it may be, that the body and flesh may be many times in good plight and in a firme disposition; but that the hope should be assured and certaine that the same will so continue, never yet could enter into a man of staid minde and sound judgement. But like as in the sea, according to the Poet Aeschylus,

*The night alwayes, even to a pilot wife,
Breeds woe, for feare lest tempests should arise.
So doth a calme*

For why? who knows what will ensue? and future time is ever uncertaine. Impossible it is therefore, that a soule which placeth and reposeth her sovereign good in the sound disposition of the bodie, and in the hope of continuance therein, should hold long without feare and trouble; for that the bodie is not onely subject to stormes and tempests without, as the sea is; but the greatest part of troublesome passions, and those which are most violent, the breedeth in herselfe, and more reason there is for a man to hope for faire weather in Winter, than to promise himselfe a constitution of bodie exempt from paine and harme, to persevere and remaine so long; for what els hath given Poets occasion and induced them to call the life of man a day-flower, unstable, unconstant and uncerteine; or to compare it unto the leaves of trees, which put out in the Spring season, fade and fall againe in Autumne; but the imbecillitie and feeblenesse of the flesh, subject to infinit infirmities, casualties, hurts and dangers? the best plight whereof, and 40 highest point of perfection, physicians themselves are wont to admonish us for to suspect, feare, diminish, and take downe. For according to the Aphorisme of Hippocrates: The good constitution of a body when it is at the height, is dangerous and slippery: and as Euripides the poet said verie well:

*Whose body strong, whose fast and brawny flesh,
Did shew ere while a colour gaye and fresh,
Soone gone he was, and extinct sodainly,
As farr as that seemes to shoot and fall from sky.*

Nay, that which more is; a common received opinion it is, that those persons who are most faire and in the flowre of their beautie, if they be eie-bitten, or looked wistly upon by a witching or envious eie, sustaine much hurt and damage thereby; because the perfection and highest degree of vigour in the bodie, is most subject to a sudden alteration, by reason of very weaknesse and frailtie; and that there is small or no assurance at all that a man should leade his life without paine and sorrow, may evidently appeere by that which they themselves doe saie unto others; for they affirme: That whosoever commit wickednesse and transgresse the lawes, live all their daies in miserie and feare; for howsoever they may perhaps live undetected, yet impossible it is that they should promise themselves assured securitie, never to be discovered; in so much as the doubt and feare of future punishment, will not give them leave to take joy, or assuredly to use the benefit of present impunity; in delivering these speeches to other, they perceive not how they speake against themselves: For seemably well it may be, that oftentimes they may have their health, and carrie able bodies about them; but to be assured that they shall continue so alwaies, or a long time, is a thing that cannot be performed; for needs they must evermore stand in doubt and distrust of their bodie for the time to come; like as women great with child, are ever grunting and groning against the time of their travell: otherwise, let them say, why they attend still a sure and confident hope of that which hetherto they never could attaine unto. Moreover, it is not sufficient to worke assured confidence, for a man to forbear sinne and wrong-doing, or not at all to offend the lawes, considering that to be afflicted justly, and for desert, is not the thing to be feared, but simply to endure paine, is fearefull and terrible. For if it be a grieft and trouble to be touched and vexed with a mans owne finnes and trespasses; he cannot chuse but be molested and disquieted also with the enormities and transgressions of others: And verily if the outrageous violence and crueltie of Laehares was not more offensive and troublesome to the Athenians; and likewise the tyrannie of Dionysius to the Syracusanes; yet I am sure at leastwise it was full as much as to their owne selves; for whiles they vexed them, tormented they were and molested themselves, and they looked to suffer punishment one time or other for their wrongs and outrages, for that they offered the same before unto their citizens and subjects who fell into their hands. What should a man alledge to this purpose, the furious rage of the multitude, the horrible and bloudie crueltie of thieves and rovers, the mischievous pranks of proud and presumptuous inheritors, plague and pestilence by contagion and corruption of the aire, as also the fell outrage of the angry sea, in a gulf whereof Epicurus himselfe writeth, he had like to have beene swallowed up as he failed to the citie Lampacum? It may suffice to relate in this place the nature onely of our body and fraile flesh, which hath within it selfe the matter of all maladies, cutting (as we say merrily in the common proverb) out of the verie ox, leather thongs; that is to say, taking paines and torments from it selfe, thereby to make life full of anguish, fearefull, and dangerous, as well to good persons as to bad; in case they have learned to rejoice, and to found the confidence and surety of their joy upon nothing else but the flesh and the hope thereof, according as Epicurus himselfe hath left written, as in many other of his books, so in those especially which hee entituled, Of the soveraigne end of all good things. We may therefore directly conclude, that these men doe hold for the foundation of a joyfull & pleasant life, not a principle that is not onely unsteadie, tottering, and not to be trusted upon, but also base, vile, and every way contemptible; if so be that to avoid evils, be their onely joy and the soveraigne felicitie that they seeke for; and in case they say: That they respect and regard naught else; and in one word: That nature herselfe knoweth not where else to lodge and bestow the said happinesse, but onely there, from whence is chased and driven away, that which might annoy and offend her; and thus hath Metrodorus written in his treatise against fopphiters: so that according to their doctrine, we are to make this definition of soveraigne good, even the avoidance of evil; for how can one lodge any joy, or place the said good, but onely there, from whence paine and evil hath beene dislodged & removed: To the same effect writeth Epicurus also, to wit: That the nature of a good thing is ingendred and ariseth from the eschuing & shunning of evil; as also that it proceedeth from the remembrance, cogitation, and joy which one conceiveth, in that such a thing happed unto him. For surely it is an inestimable and incomparable pleasure (by his saying) to wit, the knowledge alone that one hath escaped some notable hurt or great danger: And this (quoth he) is certainly the nature and essence of the soveraigne good; if thou wilt directly apply thy selfe thereto, as it is meet, and then anon rest and stay therein, without wandering to and fro, heere and there, prating and babbling I wot not what concerning the definition of the said soveraigne good. O the great felicitie and goodly pleasure which these men enjoy, rejoicing as they doe in this, that they endure none evil, feelee no paine, nor suffer sorrow! Have they not (thinke you) great cause to glorie, & to say as they doe, calling themselves immortal, and gods fellows? Have they not reason for these their grandeurs, and exceeding sublimites of their blessings, to cry out with open mouth, & as if they were possessed with the franticke furie of Bacchus priests, to breake forth into lowd exclamation for joy, that surpassing all other men in wisdom and quicknesse of wit, they onely have found out the soveraigne, celestially, and divine good, and that which hath no mixture at all of evil? So that now their beatitude and felicitie is nothing inferior to that of swine and sheepe, in that they repose true happinesse in the good and sufficient estate of the flesh principally, and of the soule likewise in regard of the flesh; of hogges I say and sheepe; for to speake of other beasts which are of a more civill, gentle, and gallant nature; the height and perfection of their good, standeth not upon the avoiding of evil, considering that when they are full, and have stored their craves, some fall to singing and crowing, others to swimming; some give themselves to sleepe, others to counterfeite all kinds of notes and sounds, disposing for joy of heart and the pleasure that they take; they use to plaie together, they make pastime, they hoppe, leape, skippe, and daunce one with another, shewing thereby, that after they have escaped some evil, nature inciteth and stirreth them to fecke forward, and looke after that which is good, or rather indeed that they reject and cast from them, all that which is dolorous and contrary to their nature, as if it stood in their way, and hindered them in the pursute of that which is better, more proper & natural unto them: 10 forthat which is necessarie is not straightwaies simple good; but surely the thing that in truth is desirable and woorthie to be chosen above the rest, is situate farther, and reacheth beyond the avoidance of evil; I meane that which is indeed pleasant, and familiar to nature, as Plato said; who forbade expressly to call or once to esteeme the deliverance of paine and sorrow, either pleasure or joy, but to take them as it were for the rude Sciographie or first draught of a painter, or a mixture of that which is proper and strange, familiar and unnaturally, like as of blacke and white. But some there be, who mounting from the bottom to the mids, for want of knowledge, what is the lowest and the middelt, take the middle for the top and the highest pitch, as Epicurus & Metrodorus have done, who defined the essential nature and substance of the soveraigne good, to be the deliverance and riddance from evil, contenting themselves with the joy of slaves and 20 captives, who are enlarged and delivered out of prison, or eased of their irons, who take it to be a great pleasure done unto them in case they be gently washed, bathed, and annointed after their whipping-cheere, and when their flesh hath beene torne with scouges; meane-while they have no taste at all or knowledge of pure, true, and liberal joyes indeed, such as be sincere, cleane and not blemished with any feares or cicatrices, for those they never saw, nor came where they grew; for say that the scurie, scabbe, and mange of the flesh, say that the bleedrednesse or gummy watering of theumaticke eies, be troublesome infirmities, and such as nature cannot away withall, it followeth not hereupon that the scraping and scratching of the skinne, or the rubbing and clensing of the eies should bee such woonderfull matters, as to bee counted felicities: neither if we admit, that the superstitious feare of the gods, and the grievous 30 anguish and trouble arising from that which is reported of the divels in hell be evil; we are not to inferre by and by that to be exempt and delivered there fro, is happinesse, felicitie, and that which is to be so greatly wished and desired: certes, the assigne a very straight roome and narrow place for their joy, wherein to turne, to walke, too rone and tumble at ease, so farre forth onely, as not to be terrified or dismayed by the apprehension of the paines and torments described in hell, the onely thing that they desire. Lo, how their opinion which so farre passeth the common sort of people, setteth downe for the finall end of their singular wisdom, a thing, which it seemeth the very brute beasts have even of themselves: for as touching that firme constitution and indolence of the body, it makes no matter, whether of it selfe or by nature, it be void of paine and sicknesse; no more in the tranquillitie and repose of the soule, skilleth it 40 much, whether by the owne industrie or benefit of nature, it be delivered from feare and terror: and yet verily a man may well say, and with great reason, that the disposition is more firme and strong, which naturally admitteth nothing to trouble and torment it; than that which with judgement and by the light and guidance of learning doth avoid it: But set the case, that the one were as effectually and powerfull as the other; then verily it will appeere at leastwise, that in this behalte, they have no advantage and preeminence above brute beasts; to wit, in that they feelee no anguish nor trouble of spirit, for those things which are reported either of the divels in hell, or the gods in heaven; nor feare at all paines and torments, expecting when they shall have an end. That this is true, Epicurus verily himselfe hath put downe in writing: If (quoth he) the suspitions and imaginations of the meteoeres and impressions which both are and doe appeare 50 in the aire and skie above, did not trouble us; nor yet those of death and the pangs thereof; we should have no need at all to have recourse unto the naturall causes of all those things, no more than those dumbe beasts who entertaine no evil suspitions or fumes of the gods, nor any opinions to torment them, as touching that which shall befall unto them after death: for they neither beleve and know, nor so much as once think of any harme at all in such things. Furthermore, if in the opinion that they holde of the gods, they had reserved and left a place for divine providence, beleiving that thereby the world was governed, they might have beene thought thought wife men as they are, to have gone beyond brute beasts for the attaining of a pleasant and joyfull life, in regard of their good hopes; but seeing all their doctrine as touching the gods tendeth to this end, namely, to feare no god, and otherwise to be searelesse and carelesse altogether, I am perswaded verily, that this is more firmly settled in those, having no sense and knowledge at all of God, than in those who say they know God; but have not learned to acknowledge him for a punishing God, and one that can punish and doe harme: for those are not delivered from superstition; and why? they never fell into it, neither have they laid away that fearefull conceit and opinion of the gods; and no marvell, for they never had any such: the same may be said as touching hell and the infernall spirits; for neither the one nor the other have any hope to receive good from thence; marie, suspect, feare and doubt what shall betide them after death those must needs, lesse, who have no fore-conceit at all of death, than they in whom this persuasion is imprinted beforehand, that death concerneth us not: and yet thus farre forth it toucheth them, in that they discourse, dispute, and consider thereupon; whereas brute beasts are altogether freed from the thought and care of such things as doe nothing pertaine unto them: true it is, that they thinne stroaks, wounds and slaughter; and thus much (I say) of death they feare, which also even to these men is dreadfull and terrible. Thus you see what good things wildome (by their owne saying) hath furnished them withall: but let us now take a sight and survey of those which they exclude themselves fro and are deprived of. As touching those diffusions of the soule, when it dilareth and spreadeth it selfe over the flesh, and for the pleasure that the flesh feeleth, if the same be small or meane, there is no great matter therein, nor that which is of any consequence to speake of; but if they passe mediocritie, then (besides that they be vaine, deceitfull and uncerteine) they are found to be comberfome and odious, such as a man ought rather to tearme, not spiritual joies and delights of the soule, but rather sensuall and grosse pleasures of the bodie, fawning, flattering and smiling upon the soule, to draw and entice her to the participation of such vanities: as for such contentments of the minde which deserve indeed and are woorthy to be called joies and delights, they be purified cleane from the contrarie, they have no mixture at all of troublefome motions, no sting that pricketh them, nor repentance that followeth them; but their pleasure is spirituall, proper and naturall to the soule; neither is the good therein borrowed abroad, and brought in from without, nor absurd and void of reason, but most agreeable and fitting thereto, proceeding from that part of the mind which is given unto contemplation of the truth, and desirous of knowledge, or at leastwise from that, which applieth it selfe to doe and execute great and honourable things: now the delights and joies adwell of the one as the other, hee that went about to number, and would straine and force himselfe to discourse how great and excellent they be, he were never able to make an end: but in briebe and few words, to helpe our memorie a little as touching this point: Histories minister an infinit number of goodly and notable examples, which yeeld unto us a singular delight and recreation to passe the time away, never breeding in us a tedious fatietie, but leaving alwaies the appetite that our soule hath to the truth, insatiable and desirous still of more pleasure and contentment; in regard whereof, untruths and very lies therein delivered, are not without their grace; for even in fables and fictions poetically, although we give no credit unto them, there is some effectuall force to delight and perswade: for thinke (I pray you) with your selfe, with what heat of delight and affection we reade the booke of Plato entituled Atlantick, or the last booke of Homer's Iliad? consider also with what griefe of heart we misse and want the residue of the tale behind, as if we were kept out of some beautifull temples, or faire theaters, shut fast against us? for surely the knowledge of truth in all things, is so lovely and amiable, that it seemeth, our life and very being, dependeth most upon knowledge and learning; whereas the most unpleasant, odious and horrible things in death, be oblivion, ignorance and darknesse; which is the reason (I assure you) that all men in a manner fight and warre against those who would bereave the dead of all sense, giving us thereby to understand, that they do measure the whole life, the being also, and joy of man, by the sense onely and knowledge of his minde; in such sort, that even those very things that are odious and offensive otherwise, we heare otherwhiles with pleasure; and often times it falleth out, that though men be troubled with the thing they heare, so as the water standeth in their eyes, and they be ready to weepe and cry out for griefe, yet they desire those that relate the same to say on and speake all: as for example, Oedipus in Sophocles.

THE MESSENGER.

Alas, my lord, I see that now I shall relate

Relate the thing which is the worst of all.

OR D I P U S.

Woe is me likewise: to heare it I am preft,
There is no helpe; say on, and tell thereof.

But peradventure this may be a current and streame of intemperate pleasure and delight, proceeding from a curiositie of the minde and will, too forward to heare and know all things, yea, and to offer violence unto the judgement and discourse of reason: howbeit, when as a narration or historie containing in it no hurtfull and offensive matter, besides the subject argument, which consisteth of brave adventures and worthy exploits, is penned and couched in a sweet stile, with a grace and powerfull force of eloquence; such as is the historie of Herodotus as touching the Greeke affaires, or of Xenophon concerning the Persian acts, as also that which Homer with an heavenly spirit hath endued and delivered in his verses, or Eudoxus in his peregrinations and description of the world, or Aristotle in his treatise of the founding of cities and governments of State, or Aristoxenus who hath left in writing, the lives of famous and renowned persons; in such (I say) there is not onely much delight and contentment, but also there ensueth thereupon no displeasure nor repentance. And what man is he, who being hungry, would more willingly eat the good and delicate meats? or athirst, desire and chuse to drinke the daintie and pleasant wines of the Phocacians, rather than reade that fiction and discourse of the voiage and pilgrimage of Ulysses? and who would take more pleasure to lie with a most faire and beautiful woman, than to sit up all night, reading either that which Xenophon hath written of Ladice Panthea, or Aristobulus of dame Timoclea, or Theopompus of faire Thisbe? These be the pleasures and joies indeed of the minde: but our Epicureans reject likewise, all those delights which proceed from the fine inventions of the Mathematicall sciences: and to say a trueth, a historie runneth plaine, even, simple and uniforme; whereas the delectation that we have in Geometric, Astronomie and Musicke, have besides (I wot not what) forcible bait of varietie so attractive, that it seemeth men are charmed and enchanted by them; so forcibly they allure, and so mightily they holde men with their delineations and descriptions, as if they were to many forceries, spells and incantations: so that whosoever hath once tasted thereof, so he be practised and exercised therein, he may go all about well enough, chanting these verses of Sophocles:

30 The furious love of Misfess mine
Hath heart and minde possessed mine:
Thus ravished, fast I me lie
To crest and cape of mountaine hie:
Melodious songs, and sound withall
Opleasant harpe, me forth doth call.

Certes, Thamyas exercised his poetical head about nothing els; no more verily did Eudoxus, Aristarchus and Archimides. For seeing that studious and industrious painters tooke so great pleasure in the excellency of their works, that Nicias when he was painting Homer's Neevia (that is to say, the calling forth and raising the ghosts of folke departed) being so affectionate to it, 40 forgot himselfe and asked his servitours estoones about him, whether he had dined or no: and when Ptolomus king of Aegypt sent unto him threecore talents for the said picture after it was finished, he refused the same, and would never sell, or part with his handy-work. What pleasure reaped (thinke you) and how great delight tooke Euclides in Geometrie and Astrologie, when he wrote the propositions of Perspective; and Philip when he composed the demonstrations of the divers formes and shapes appearing in the Moone? Archimedes also, when by the angle called Gonia, he found out, that the Diameter of the Sun is just so bigge a part of the greatest circle, as the angle is of foure right lines; Apollonius likewise and Aristarchus, who were the inventours of the like propositions; the contemplation and knowledge whereof, even at this day, bringeth exceeding pleasure and wonderfull generosity & magnanimity unto those who 50 can intend to study upon them. And verily those base and abject pleasures of the kitchen and brothell-house, we ought not so much as to compare with these, and thereby to contaminate and disgrace the sacred Muses and their mountaine Helicon,

Where shepheard none durst tend his flocks,
On hill above or vale below:
Nor edged tooke was known to shoake
Or cut one tree that there did grow.

But these pleasures are indeed the intemperate & undefiled pastures of the gentle bees; whereas

those

those other resemble properly, the itching lusts of swine and goats, which over and besides the bodie, fill with their filthie ordure the sensuall part of the soule, subject to all passions and perturbations. True it is, that lust and desire to enjoy pleasures, is a passion adventurous and hardie enough to enterprize many and sundrie matters; yet was there never any man found so amorous, who for joy that he had embraced his paramour, sacrificed a beete; nor ever was there knowne so notorious a glutton, who withed in his heart and desired, so he might first fill his bellie with delicate viands and princely banquetting dishes, to die presently: and yet Endoxus made this praiser, that he might stand nere unto the sunne, for to learne the forme, the magnitude and the beauty of that planet, upon condition to be burnt presently, as Phaëron was, with the beames thereof. Pythagoras for the prooffe of one proposition or figure which he had invented, sacrificed an ox, as Apollodorus hath recorded in this Dysticon:

But solemnly he sacrific'd an ox, even in that sound.*

Whether it were that slope line in Geometrie, called Hypotenusa, which answering directly to the right angle of a triangle, is as much in effect as the other two that comprehend and make the said angle; or rather that linearie demonstration or proposition, whereby he measured the plot in a parabolike section of a Cone or round pyramidall figure. As for Archimedes, he was so intentive and busie in drawing his Geometrical figures, that his servants were faine by force to pull him away to be washed and anointed; and even then he would with the strigill or bath-combe (which served to currie and rub his skin) draw figures even upon his very bellie: and one day above the rest, having found out whiles he was a bathing, the way to know, how much golde the gold-smith had robbed in the fashion of that crowne which king Hiero had put forth to making, he ran forth suddenly out of the baine, as if he had beene frantike, or inspired with some fanatical spirit, crying out; Heweca, Heweca, that is to say, I have found it, I have found it, iterating the same many times all the way as he went. But we never heard of any glutton so given to gourmandise & belly cheere, who went up and downe crying Bebroca, that is to say, I have eaten, I have eaten; nor of a wanton & amorous person, who having enjoied his love, would set up this note, Ephilesa, that is to say, I have kist, I have kist. Norwithstanding there have beene & are at this day, a thousand millions, even an infinit number of lascivious & loose persons: But contrariwise, we detest and abhorre those, who upon an affection, braverie and pride, make reherall what feasts they have beene at, as persons who highly account of so base and unworthy pleasures, which men ought indeed to have in contempt. Whereas in reading the works of Endoxus, Archimedes, and Hipparchus, we are ravished and transported as it were with some heavenly and divine delight; believing that saying of Plato to be true, who writeth: That the Mathematicall arts, howsoever they be contemned, by those that be ignorant, and for default of knowledge and understanding neglected; yet for the grace and delight that they yeeld, be more and more in request, even in despite of those blind and blockish persons: All which pleasures so great and so many in number, running alwaies as a river; these men heere doe turne and derive another way, for to empeach and hinder those who approach unto them, and give eare unto their doctrine, that they should not once taste thereof, but command them to set up and spread all their maine sailes, and flie away as fast as they can. Yea, and that which more is, all those of this sect, both men and women, pray and request Pythocles (for Epicurus sake) not to make any account of those arts which we name liberall: And in praising our Apelles, among other singular qualities, that they attribute unto him, they set downe this for one: That from his first beginning he had forborne the studie of the Mathematicks, and by that meanes kept himselfe unperturbed and undefiled: As for histories (to say nothing, how of all other sciences they have neither heard nor scene any) I will cite onely the words of Metradorus writing of Poets: Tush (quoth he) be not abashed nor thinke it a shame to confesse that thou knowest not, of whether side Hæstor was, of the Grecks part or of the Trojans; neither thinke it a great matter if thou be ignorant what were the first verses of Homers Poeme, and regard thou as little those in the mids.

Now forasmuch as Epicurus wilt well enough, that the pleasures of the body (like unto the aniverfarie Etesian minds) doe blow over and passe away, yea and after the flower of mans age is once gone, decay sensibly, and cease altogether; therefore he mooveth a question: Whether a wife man, being now farre steeped in yeeres, and not able any more to keepe company with a woman, taketh pleasure still in wanton touching, feeling or handling of faire and beautifull persons: Wherein verily he is farre from the minde and opinion of Sophocles; who rejoiced and thanked God, that hee had escaped from this voluptuous and fleshly love, as from the yoke, chaine, chaine, or clogge of some violent and furious master. Yet rather ought these sensuall and voluptuous persons, seeing that manie delights and pleasures corporally, doe fade and decaie in old age,

*And that with aged folk in this,

(as saith Euripides) to make provision then most all, of other spirituall pleasures, and to be stored before-hand, as it were against some long siege, with such drie victuals as are not subject to putrefaction and corruption: Then I say should they hold their solomne feasts of Venus, & goodly morrow-minds, to passe the time away by reading some pleasant histories, delectable poems, or pretie speculations of musick or geometric: And verily they would not so much as thinke any more of those blind feelings and bootlesse handlings (as I may tearme them) which indeed are no more but the pricks and provocations of dead wantonnesse, if they had learned no more but as Aristotle, Heraclides, and Dicaearchus did, to write of Homer and Euripides: But they being never careful and provident to purvey such victuals, and seeing all the rest of their life otherwise to be unpleasant, and as drie as a kex, (as themselves are wont to say of vertue) yet willing to enjoy still their pleasures continually, but finding their bodies to say nay, and not able to performe the same to their contentment, they bewray their corruption in committing foule and dishonest acts out of season, enforcing themselves (even by their owne confessions) to awaken, stirre up, and renew the memorie of their former pleasures in times past, and for want of freesh and new delights, making a shift to serve their turne with the old & tale, as if they had beene long kept in salt-pickle, or compast, untill their goodnesse and life were gone; desirous they are to stirre, kindle, and quicken others that lie extinct in their flesh, as it were raked up in dead and cold ashes long before, cleane against the course of nature; and all for default that they were not provided before of some sweet thing laid up in their soule, proper unto her, and delight some according to her worthinesse: As for other spirituall pleasures wee have spoken of them already, as they came into our minde: but as touching musick, which bringing with it so many contentments, & so great delights, men yet reject & flie fro, no man I now would willingly passe it over in silence, considering the absurd and impatient speeches that Epicurus giveth out for in his questions he maintaineth: That a wife man is a great lover of shewes & spectacles, delighting above all others to heare and see the pastimes, sports, & fights, exhibited in theatres during the feast of Bacchus; yet wil not he admit any musickal problems, any disputations or witty discourses of Criticks in points of humanitie & learning, so much as at the very table, in dinner and supper time; but giveth counsell unto kings and princes that be lovers & favorers of literature, to abide rather the reading & hearing of military narrations & stratagemes at their feasts & banquets, yea, and scurrill talke of buffons, pleasan, and jesters, than any questions propounded or discussed, as touching musick or poetrie: for thus much hath he delivered in his booke entitled: Of Royallie: as if hee had written the same to Sardanapalus or Naratus, who was in times past a great potentate and lord of Babylon. Certes, neither Hiero nor Attalus, ne yet Archelaus, would ever have bene perswaded to remove and displace from their tables such Erui- 40 pides, Simonides, Melanippides, Crates or Diodorus, for to set in their roomes Cordax, Arianes and Callias, known jesters and notorious ribaunds; or some parasiticall Thrasimides and Thrasyleons, who could skill of nothing els but how to make folke laugh, in counterfeiting lamentable yellings, groanes, howlings, and all to move applause and clapping of hands. If king Ptolemus the first of that name, who also first erected a librarie, and founded a colledge of learned men, had light upon these goodly rules and royall precepts of his putting downe, would not he have exclaimed and said unto the Samians:

*O Muses faire, & ladies deere,
What envie, and what spite is heere!*

For, becomming it is not any Athenian thus maliciously to be bent unto the Muses, and be at 50 warre with them: but according to Pindarus;

*Whom Jupiter doth not vouchsafe
His love and favour for to have.
Amaz'd they stand and quake for feare,
When they the voice of Muses heare.*

What say you, Epicurus? you goe early in the morning by breake of day unto the Theater, to heare musicians playing upon the harpe and lute, or founding flawmes and hautboies: if then it fortune at the table, in time of a banquet, that Theophrastus sheweth of Symphonies and muslicall accords? or Aristoxenes, of changes and alteration of tunes? or Aristophanes of Homer's works, will you stop your eares with both hands because you would not heare, for that you so abhorre and detest them? Surely, there was more civillity yet and honestie (by report) in that barbarous king of Sythia, Areas, who when that excellent minstrell Ismenius, being his captive, taken prisoner in the warres, plaied upon the flute before him as hee sat at dinner, swaie a great oath, that he tooke more pleasure to heare his horse neigh. Doe not these men (thinke you) confesse and grant (when they be well charged) that they have given defence to vertue and honestie, proclaiming mortall and irreconcilable warre, without all hope of truce, parle, composition and peace? for surely, setting pleasure onely aside, what other thing is there in the world (be it never so pure, holy and venerable) that they embrace and love? Had it not beene more reason, for the leading of a joyfull life, to be offended with sweet perfumes, and to reject odoriferous oiles and ointments, as beetles, jeyres and vultures doe, than to abhorre, detest and shun the talke and discourses of Humanitians, Criticks, Grammarians and Musicians? for, what manner of flute or hautboies, what harpe or lute how well forever set, tuned, and fitted for long,

*What quire resounding loud and shrill
From pleasant mouth and breast so sweeter,
A long in parts, set with great skill,
When cunning men in musick mee?*

so greatly delighted Epicurus and Metrodorus, as the discourses, the rules and precepts of quires and carols, the questions and propositions concerning flutes and hautboies, touching proportions, consonances & harmonical accords would affect Aristotle, Theophrastus, Hicronymus and Dicaearchus? as for example, what is the reason, that of two pipes or flutes (otherwise even and equally) that which hath the straighter and narrower mouth, yeeldeth the bigger and more base found? also, what might be the cause, that the same pipe when it is lifted and set upward, becometh loud in all the tones that it maketh; but holde it downward once, it foundeth as low? so doth one pipe also when it is set close unto another, give a base found; but contrariwise, if it be disjoined and put asunder, it foundeth higher and more shrill. As also, how it cometh to passe that if a man vow chaffe or cast dust thicke upon the stage or scaffold in a Theater, the people there assembled be deafe and cannot heare the plaiers or minstrels? Semblably, when king Alexander the Great was minded to have made in the citie of Pella the forepart of the stage in the Theater, all of braffe; what mooved his workman or Architec not to permit him so to doe, for feare it would drowne and dull the voice of the plaiers? Finally, why among sundry kinds of Musicke, that which is called Chromaticall, delighteth, enlargeth and joiceth the heart, whereas the Harmonicall contracteth and draweth it in, making it sad and dumpish? Moreover, the manners and natures of men which Poets represent in their writings, their wittie fictions, the difference and varietie of their stile, the solution of darke doubts and quaint questions, which (besides a delightsome grace and beautifull elegance) carie with them a familiar and perswasive power, whereout each one may reape profit; inso much as they are able (as Xenophon saith) to make a man forget even love it selfe, so effectually is this pleasure and delight. Howbeit, the Epicureans here have no feeling and experience; nay, which is woofe, they desire to have none, as they say themselves; but employing the whole contemplative part of the soule, in thinking upon nothing els but the bodie, and plucking it downward together with sensuall and carnall lusts, as fishers nets with little rols and plummets of lead, they differ nothing at all from horsekeepers or shepherds and other herdmen, who lay before their beasts, hay, straw, or some kinde of grasse and herbs, as the proper fodder & forage for the cattell which they have in charge: for do they not even so intend to feed the soule fat (as men franke up swine) with bodily pleasures; in that they would have her to be glad for the hope shee hath that the body shall shortly enjoy some pleasure, or els in the remembrance of those which it hath enjoyed in times past: as for any proper delight or particular pleasure of her owne, they suffer her to receive none from herselfe, not so much as to seeke thereafter.

And verily, can there be any thing more absurd & beside all apparance and shew of reason, than (whereas there be two parts whereof man is compounded, to wit, soule and body, of which the soule is more worth, and placed in the higher degree) to say and affirme, that there is in the bodie some good thing, proper, peculiar, familiar, and naturall unto it, and none in the soule; but that the fits still tending the bodie, and looking onely to it? that the smileth upon the passions and affections thereof, joying and taking contentment with it onely; having of herselfe selfe originally no motion, no election, no choise, no desire nor pleasure at all? Now surely they should either by putting off their maske and discovering themselves, have gone roundly to worke, making man flesh, and nothing else but flesh; as some there be who flatly denie, that there is any spirituall substance in him; or else leaving in us two different natures, they ought to have let either of them alone by it selfe, with their severall good and evil; that I say which is familiar or contrarie unto it: like as among the five senses, everie one is defined & appropriated to one object sensible, although all of them by a certaine wonderfull sympathy be affected one to the other. Now the proper sensitive organ or instrument of the soule is, the understanding; and to say that the same hath no peculiar subject to worke upon, no proper spectacle to behold, no familiar motion, no naturall and inbred passion or affection, in the fruition whereof it should take pleasure and delight, is the greatest absurditie of all others: And verily this is the saying of these men; unless haply some there be, who ere they be aware, charge upon them some slanderous and false imputations. Heere began I to speake and say unto him: Not so fir, if we may be judges; but I pray you let be, all action of inquirie, and proceed hardly to finishe and make an end of your discourse. And why (quoth he) should not Aristodemus succeed after me, if you haply refuse flatly, or be loth to speake? You say true indeed, (quoth Aristodemus) but that shall not be untill you be wearie of speech, as this man is; and for the present, since you are yet fresh and in heart, I beseech you my good friend, spare not your selfe, but use your facultie, lest you be thought for very sloth and idleness to draw back and goe out of the lists. Certes (quoth Theon then) it is but a small matter, and the same very easie which is behind; for there remaineth no more but to shew and recount how many joies and pleasures there be in active life, and that part of the soule which is given to action? Firist and formost, even they themselves in some place graunt and confesse; that it is a greater pleasure to doe good, and to benefit others, than to receive a benefit from another; as for good turnes, a man I confesse may doe them in bare words and sayings; but surely the most and greatest are performed by acts and deeds, and thus much doth the verie word of benefit or welldoing import; and even they themselves tell us no lesse: For but a while since, we heard this man report, what words and speeches Epicurus delivered; what letters he wrote and sent unto his friends, in extolling, praising, and magnifying Metrodorus; how bravely and valiantly he went downe from the citie of Athens to the port Pyreum, for to aid and succour Mithris the Syrian, albeit Metrodorus did no service at all in that fallie: What manner of pleasures then, and how great ought we to esteeme those which Plato enjoined, when Dion a scholar of his & one of his bringing up, rose up to put downe the tyrant Dionysius, & to deliver the state of Sicily from servitude? what contentment might Aristotle find, when he caused the citie of his nativitie which was ruinate and raised to the ground to be reedified, and his countreymen & fellow-citizens to be called home who were banished? what delights and joies were those of Theophrastus and Phidias, who deposed and overthrew those tyrants who usurped the lordly dominion of their countrey? and for private persons in particular, how many they relieved, not in sending unto them a strike or a bulhell of come and meale, as Epicurus sent unto some; but in working and effecting, that those who were exiled out of their native countrey, driven from their owne houses, and turned out of all their goods, might returne home againe and reenter upon all; that such as had bene prisoners and lien in irons, might be delivered and set at large; as many also as were put from their wives and children, might recover and enjoy them againe: What need I make rehearfall unto you, who know all this well enough? But surely the impudence and absurditie of this man, I can not (though I would) passe over with silence, who debasing and casting under foot the acts of Themistocles and Miltiades as he did, wrot of himselfe to certaine of his friends in this sort: Right nobly, valiantly, and magnificently, have you shewed your endeavour and care of us, in provision of corne to furnish us withall; and againe you have declared by notorious signes, which mount up into heaven, the singular love and good will which you beare unto me. And if a man observe the manner of this stile and writing, he shall find, that if he take out of the miseries of this great philosopher, that which concerneth a little corne, all the words besides are so curiously couched and penned, as if the epistle had bene written purposely as a thanksgiving for the safety of all Greece, or at leastwise, for delivering, setting free, and preserving the whole citie and people of Athens.

What should I busie my head to shew unto you, that for the delights of the bodie, nature had need to be at great cost and expences; neither doth the chiefe pleasure which they seeke after, consist in course basket-bread, in pease pottage; or lencile broth; but the appetites of these voluptuous persons, call for exquisite and daintie viands, for sweete and delicate wines, such as those be of Thasos, for sweet odours, pleasant perfumes, and precious ornaments, for curious junkets and banquetting dishes, for tarts, cake-bread, marchpanes, and other pastrie works, well wrought, beaten and tempered with the sweet liquor gathered by the yellow winged Bee: over and besides all this, their mind stands also to faire and beautiful young damosels, they must have some pretie Leontium, some fine Boisbon, some sweet Hedra, or daintie Xycedion, whom they keepe and nourish of purpose within their gardens of pleasure, to be ready at hand. As for the delights and joies of the mind, there is no man but will confesse and say: That founded they ought to be upon the greatnesse of some noble actions, and the beautie of worthy and memorable works, if we would have them to be not vaine, base and childeish; but contrariwise, reputed grave, generous, magnificent and manlike; whereas to vaunt and glory of being let loose to a dissolute course of life and the fruition of pleasures and delights, after the manner of sailors and mariners when they celebrate the feast of Venus; to boast also and please himselfe in this: That being desperately sicke of that kinde of drop sic which the Physicians call Asites, he forbore not to feast his friends still, and keepe good companie, neither spared to adde and gather more moisture and waterish humours still unto his drop sic: and remembering the last words that his brother Neocles spake upon his death-bed, melted and confounded with a speciall joy and pleasure of his owne, tempered with teares; there is no man (I trow) of sound judgement and in his right wits, who would tearme these foolish follies, either found joies or perfect delights; but surely, if there be any Sardonian laughter (as they call it) belonging also to the soule, it is feared (in my conceit) even in such joies and mirths mingled with teares as these, which do violence unto nature: but if any man shal say, that these be solaces, let him compare them with others, and see how farre these excell and go beyond them which are expressed by these verses:

*By sage advice I have effected this,
That Spartacus martiall fame eclipsed is.*

Also:

*This man, o friend and stranger both,
was while he lived heere,
The great and glorious starre of Rome,
his native citie decre.*

Likewise:

*I nor nor what I should you call,
An heavenly God and man mortall.*

And when I set before mine eyes the noble and worthy acts of Thrasibulus and Pelopidas; or behold the victories either of Aristides in that journey of Plataea, or of Miltiades at the battell of Marathon, I am even ravished and transported besides my selfe, and forced to say with Heredotus, and deliver this sentence: That in this active life, there is more sweetnesse and delectation, than glorie and honour: and that this is so, Epaminondas will beare me witness, who (by report) gave out this speech, that the greatest contentment which ever he had during his life, was this: That his father and mother were both alive to see that noble Trophée of his, for the victorie that he won at Leutres, being generall of the Thebans against the Lacedaemonians. Compare we now with this mother of Epaminondas, Epicurus his mother, who tooke so great joy to see her sonne keeping close in a daintie garden and orchard of pleasure, where he and his familiar friend Polyenus gat children in common, upon a trull and courtesan of Cyzicum: for, that both mother and sister of Metrodorum were exceeding glad of his marriage, may appeare by his letters missive written unto his brother, which are extant in his books; and yet they goe up and downe everie where crying with open mouth: That they have lived in joy, doing nought els but extoll and magnifie their delicate life, faring much like unto slaves when they solemnize the feast of Saturne, supping and making good cheere together, or celebrate the Bacchanales, running about the fields; so as a man may hardly abide to heare the utas and yelling noise they make, when upon the insolent joy of their hearts, they brake out into many fooleries, and utter they care not unto whom, as vaine and fond speeches, in this manner:

*Why say'st thou still, thou wretched lout,
Come let us drinke and quaffe about:
The meats upon the board set are,
Be merie man, and make no spare:*

*No sooner are these words let fall,
But all at once they howl and crye;
The pots then walke, one fills out wine,
Another brings a garland fine
Of flowers full fresh, his head to crowne,
And decks the cup, while wine goes downe:
And then the minstrell, Phoebus knight,
With faire Greene branch of Laurel dight,
Sets out his rude and rustie brote,
And sings a filthy tunelesse note:
With that one thrusts the pipe him fro,
And sounds his wench an a bedfello.*

Do not (thinke you) the letters of Metrodorum resemble these vanities, which he wrote unto his brother in these tearmes? There is no need at all, Timocrates, neither ought a man to expose himselfe into danger for the safetie of Greece, or to straine and busie his head to winne a coronet among them, in testimonie of his wisdom; but he is to eat, and drinke wine merily, so as the bodie may enjoy all pleasure, and susteine no harme. And againe in another place of the same letters he hath these words: Oh how joyfull was I, and glad at heart! Oh what contentment of spirit found I, when I had learned once of Epicurus, to make much of my bellie, and to gratifie it, as I ought! For to say a trueth to you, o Timocrates, that art a Naturalist: The soveraigne good of a man lieth about the bellie.

In summe, these men doe limit, set out and circumscribe the greatnesse of humane pleasure within the compasse of the bellie, as it were within center and circumference; but surely impossible it is, that they should ever have their part of any great, roial and magnificent joy, such as indeed causeth magnanimitie and haughtinesse of courage, bringeth glorious honour abroad, or tranquillitie of spirit at home, who have made choise of a close and private life within doores, never shewing themselves in the world, nor meddling with the publicke affaires of common weale; a life (I say) sequestred from all offices of humanitie, farre removed from any instinct of honour, or desire to gratifie others, thereby to deserve thanks, or winne favour: for the soule (I may tell you) is no base and small thing, it is not vile and illiberal, extending her desires onely to that which is good to bee eaten, as doe these poulps or poureutle fishes which stretch their cleies as farre as to their meat and no farther; for such appetites as these, are most quickly cutt off with fatietie, and filled in a moment; but when the motions and desires of the minde tending to vertue and honestie, to honour also and contentment of conscience, upon vertuous deeds and well doing, are once grown to their vigor and perfection, they have not for their limit, the length and tearme onely of mans life: but surely, the desire of honor, and the affection to profit the societie of men, comprehending all eternitie, striveth still to goe forward in such actions and beneficiall deeds as yeld infinit pleasures that cannot be expressed; which joies, great personages and men of woorth can not shake off and avoid though they would: for sic they from them what they can, yet they environ them about on every side, they are readie to meet them whersoever they goe, when as by their beneficence and good deeds they have once refreshed and cheered many other: for of such persons may well this verse be verified:

*To towne when that he comes, or there doth walk:
Men him behold as God, and so doe talk.*

For when a man hath so affected and disposed others, that they are glad and leape for joy to see him, that they have a longing desire to touch, salute, & speak unto him; who seeth not (though otherwife he were blinde) that he findeth great joies in himselfe, and enioith most sweet contentment: this is the cause that such men are never wearie of well doing, nor thinke it a trouble to be employed to the good of others; for we shall evermore heare from their mouths these 50 and such like speeches:

*Thy father thee begat and brought to light,
That thou one day might'st profuse many a night.*

Again,

*Let us nor cease, but shew a mende,
Of doing good to all mankind.*

What need I to speake here of those that bee excellent men, and good in the highest degree? for if to any one of those who are not extremely wicked, at the very point and instant of death; he

he in whose hands lieth his life, be he a god or someking, should graunt one howtes respit, and permit him to employ himselfe at his owne choise, either to execute some memorable act, or else to take his pleasure for the while, so that immediately after that howre past, he should goe to his death: How many thinke you would chuse rather during this small time, to lie with that courtifane and famous trumpet Lais, or drink liberally of good Ariusian wine, than to kill the tyrant Archis, for to deliver the citie of Thebes, from tyrannicall servitude? for mine owne part verily, I suppose, that there is not one: for this I observe in those sword-fencers, who fight at sharpe a combat to the utterance, such I meane as are not altogether brutish and savage, but of the Greekish nation, when they are to enter in place for to performe their devoirt, notwithstanding there be presented unto them many deintie dishes, and costly cates, chuse rather at this very time to recommend unto their friends, their wives and children, to manumise and enfranchise their slaves, than to serve their bellies and content their sensuall appetites: But admit that these bodily pleasures be great matters, and highly to be accounted of, the same are common also even to those that leade an active life, and manage affaires of State: For as the Poet saith:

*Wine muscadell they drinke, and likewise eat
Fine manchet bread, made of the whitest wheat.*

They banquet also, and feast with their friends, yea and much more merrily (in my conceit, after they be returned from bloudie battels or other great exploits and important services; like as Alexander & Agessilus; Phocion also and Epaminondas were wont to do) than these who are appointed against the fire, or carried easily in their litters: and yet such as they, mocke and scorne those, who indeed have the fruition of other greater and more deintie pleasures: for what should a man speake of Epaminondas, who being invited to a supper unto his friends house, when he saw that the provision was greater and more sumptuous than his state might well beare, would not stay and suppe with him, but said thus unto his friend: I thought you would have sacrificed unto the gods, and not have bene a wastefull and prodigall spender: and no marvell; for king Alexander the Great refused to entertaine the exquisit cooks of Ada Queene of Caria; saying: That he had better about him of his owne to dresse his meat, to wit, for his dinner or breakfast, early rising and travelling before day-light; and for his supper, a light and hungry dinner. As for Philoxenus who wrote unto him concerning two most faire and beautiful boies, to this effect, whether he should buy them for to send unto him or no: he had like to have lost the place of government unto him, for his labour: and yet to say a trueth, who might have better done it than Alexander? But like as of two paines & griefs (as Hippocrates saith) the lesse is dulled and dimmed (as it were) by the greater; even so, the pleasures proceeding from vertuous and honourable actions, do darken and extinguishe (by reason of the minds joies, and in regard of their exceeding greatnesse) those delights which arise from the bodie. And if it be so as these Epicureans say, that the remembrance of former pleasures and good things, be materiall and make much for a joyfull life; which of us all will beleieve Epicurus himselfe, that dying (as he did) in most grievous paines and dolorous maladies, he eased his torments or asswaged his anguish by calling to minde those delights which beforetime he had enjoyed? For surely, it were an easier matter to beholde the resemblance of ones face in the bottome of a troubled water, or amid the waves during a tempest, than to conceive and apprehend the smiling and laughing remembrance of a pleasure past, in so great a disquietnesse and bitter vexation of the body; whereas the memorie of vertuous and praise-worthy actions, a man can not (would he never so faine) chafe and drive out of his minde. For how is it possible, that Alexander the Great, should ever forget the battell at Arbela? or Pelopidas, the defeature of the tyrant Leontiades? or Themistocles, the noble field fought before Salamis? for as touching the victorie at Marathon, the memoriall thereof the Athenians doe solemnize with feasts even to this day; like as the Thebans celebrate the remembrance of the famous fight at Leutres: and wee verily (as you know well enough) make feasts for the victorie of Daiphantus before the citie Hyampolis; and not onely we, keepe yeerely holiday then, but also the whole country of Phocis (upon that anniverfarye day) is full of sacrifices and due honours: neither is there one of us that taketh so great contentment of all that hee eateth or drinketh at such a festivall time, as he doth in regard of the remembrance of those noble acts which those brave men performed: we may well gesse and consider therefore, what joy, what mirth, what gladnesse and solace of heart accompanied them all their life time after, who executed these noble feats of armes, considering that after five hundred yeeres and above, the memorie of them is fresh, and the same attended with so great cheere and rejoicing. And yet Epicurus himselfe doth acknowledge, that of glorie there doe arise certaine joies and pleasures; pleasures; for how could he doe lesse, seeing that himselfe is so desirous thereof, that he is even mad withall, and fareth after a furious manner to attaine thereto; insomuch, as not onely he disavoweth his owne masters and teachers, contesteth against Democritus (whose opinions and doctrines he stealeth word for word) upon certaine syllables and nice points, mainteining that there never was any wife man nor learned cleaerke, setting himselfe and his disciples aside: but also, which more is, he hath bene so impudent, as to say and write; that Colotes adored him as a god, touching his knees full devoutly, when he heard him discourse of naturall causes; and that his brother Neoteles affirmed and gave out even from his infancie; that Epicurus had never his like or fellow, for wildome and knowledge; as also, that his mother was happie and blessed for bearing in her womb such a number of Atomes, that is to say, indivisible small bodies, who concurring all together, framed and formed so skilfull a personage. Is not this all one with that which Callistarchides sometime said of Conon: That he committed adulterie with the sea; even so a man may say that Epicurus (secretly by stealth and shamefully) made love unto Glory, and went about to solicit, yea, force her by violence, not being able to win and enjoy her openly; whereupon he became passionate and love-sicke: for like as a mans bodie in time of famine, for that it hath no food and nourishment otherwise, is constrained even against nature, to feed upon the owne substance; even so ambition and thirst after glorie, doth the like hurt unto the soules of ambitious persons: for being readie to die for thirst of glorie, and seeing they can not have it otherwise, enforced they are to praise themselves. But they that be thus passionately affected with desire of praise and honour, confesse not they manifestly, that they reject, forgo and neglect great pleasures and delights; when through their feeble, lazie and base minds, they flie from publicke offices of State, forbear the management of affaires, and regard not the favours of kings and following of great persons; from whence Democritus saith; there accrue unto man many ornaments to grace and commend this life: For Epicurus shall never be able to make the world beleieve, that (esteeming so much as he did and making so great account of Neoteles his brothers testimonie or the adoration of Colotes) he would not have bene ready to have leapt out of his skin, and gone besides himselfe for joy, if he had bene received by the Greeks at the solemnitie of the Olympian games, with joious acclamations and clapping of hands: nay, hee would no doubt have shewed that gladnesse and contentment of heart with open mouth; hee would have bene aloft and flown abroad, as the Poet Sophocles saith:

*Like to the Downe, which being light and soft
From this fildie, the winde doth mount aloft.*

And if it be a gracious and acceptable thing, for a man to brute that he hath a good name; it followeth consequently, that grievous it is to be in an ill name: and what is more infamous and odious, than to be friendlesse, to want employment, to be infected with Atheisme and impietie, to live loosely and abandoned to lusts and pleasures; finally, to be neglected and contemned? and verily (setting themselves aside) there is no man living, but he thinketh at these qualities and attributes to agree fitly unto this sect of theirs. True (will some man say) but they have the greater wrong. Well, the question now, is not, what is the trueth, but what is the common opinion that the world hath of them: and to this purpose I meane not to cite the publicke decrees and acts of Citres, nor to alledge the defamatorie books written against them; for that were too odious; but if the oracles, if divination, if the prescience and providence of the gods, if the naturall love and affectionate kindnesse of parents to their children, if the managing of politike affaires, if the conduct of armies, if magistracie and rule in common-wealth, be matters honourable and glorious, then it must needs be, that they who affirme: That no travell ought to be made for the sake of Greece, but that we are to eat and drinke, so as the bellie may be pleased, and receive no harme and discontentment, should be infamous, and reputed for wicked persons; and such as are so taken, must needs be odious and in great disgrace, if so be they hold, honour, good name and reputation, to be things pleasant and desirable.

When Theon had made an end of this speech, thought good it was to give over walking; and when (as our custome and manner was) we were set downe upon the seats, we rested a pretie while in silence, ruminating (as it were) and pondering that which had bene delivered, but long this was not; for Zeuxippus thinking upon that which had bene said: And who (quoth he) shall goe through with that which remaineth behind, considering that me thinks we are not as yet come to a full point and finall conclusion? for seeing that erewhile he hath made mention by the way of Divination, and likewise put us in minde of Divine providence two maine points, I may tell you whereupon these men doe greatly stand, and which by their saying yeeld them not the denying both the one and the other.

the least pleasure, contentment, repose of spirit, and assurance in this life; * therefore I hold it necessarie that somewhat were said as touching the same. Then Aristodemus taking the matter in hand: As for the pleasure (quoth he) which they pretend in this case, me thinks (by all in manner that hath bene spoken) that if their reasons should goe for current, and bring that about which they purpose & intend, well may they free and deliver their spirit of (I wot not what) feare of the gods, and a certaine superstition; but surely they imprint no joy, nor minister any comfort and contentment to their minds at all, in any regard of the gods: for to be troubled with no dread of the gods, nor comforted by any hope from them, worketh this effect, and maketh them so affected towards the gods, as we are to the fishes of the Hyrcan sea, expecting neither goodnesse nor harme from them. But if we must adde somewhat more to that which hath bene said already; thus much I take it wee may be bold to set downe, as received and granted by them: First and formost, that they impugne them mightily, who condemne and take away all heaviness, sorrow, weeping, sighes, and lamentations for the death of friends: and they affirme, that this indolence tending to a kinde of impassibilitie, proceedeth from another evill, greater and woofe than it, to wit, cruell inhumanitie, or else an outrageous and furious desire of vainglorie and ostentation; and therefore they hold it better to suffer a little sorrow, and to grieve moderately, so a man runne not all to teares and marre his eies with weeping, nor shew all manner of passions as some doe by their deeds and writings, because they would be thought affectionate and heartie lovers of their friends, and withall of a gentle and tender nature: For thus much hath Epicurus delivered in many of his books, and namely in his letters where he maketh mention of the death of Hegeſimachus, writing unto Dositheus the father, and Pyrrhus the brother of the man departed: For long it is not since by fortune those letters of his came to my hands, which I perused, and in imitating their maner of arguing, I say: That Atheisme and impietie is no lesse sinne, than the crueltie or vaine and arrogant ostentation abovesaid; unto which impietie they would induce us with their perswasions, who take from God both favor and also anger: For, better it were, that to the opinion and beliefe which we have of the gods, there were adjoined and engrafted an affection mixed and compassed of reverence and feare, than in flying therefro, to leave unto our selves neither hope nor pleasure, no assurance in prosperitie, never recourse unto the goodnesse of the gods in time of adversitie: True it is, that we ought to ridde away from the opinion that we have of the gods, all superstition, if it be possible, as well as from our eies all gummie and glutinous matter, offending the sight; but if this may not be, we are not therefore to cut away quite, or to put out the eies cleane of that faith and beliefe, which men for the most part have of the gods; and this is not a severe, feareful and austere conceit as these imagine, who traduce and slander divine providence, to make it odious and terrible, as folke doe by little children, who they use to feare with the fantasticall illusion, Empusa, as if it were some infernall furie, or tragicall vengeance seizing upon them: but some few men there be, who in that sort doe feare God, as that it is better and more expedient for them so to doe, than otherwise not to stand in awe of him: for in dreading him as a gracious and propitious lord unto the good, and an enemy unto the wicked, by this one kinde of feare which maketh them that they have no need at all of many others, they are delivered from those baits which many times allure and entice men to evils; and thus keeping vice short, and not giving it head, but holding it neere unto them, and within their reach, that it cannot escape and get from them, they be lesse tormented than those who be so hardie as to empiole the same, and dare put it in practise, but soone after, fall into fearefull fits, and repent themselves: But as touching the disposition toward God in the common sort of men, who are ignorant, unlettered, and of a grosse conceit for the most part; howbeit not very wicked, nor starke naught: true it is, that as together with the reverence and honour that they beare to the gods, there is intermingled a certaine trembling feare, which properly is called superstition; so likewise there is an infinit deale more of good hope and true joy, which causeth them to prate unto the gods continually for their owne good estate, and for happie successe in their affaires, and they receive all prosperitie as lent unto them from heaven above; which appeareth evidently by most notable and significant arguments: for surely no exercises recreate us more, than those of religion and devotion in the temples of the gods; no times and seasons are more joyous, than solemne feasts in their honour; no actions, no sights, more delight and joy our hearts, than those which we doe and see our selves, either singing and dauncing solemly in the presence of the gods, or being assistant at their sacrifices, or the ceremonious mysteries of divine service; for at such times our soule is nothing sadde, cast downe, or melancholike, as if she had to deale with some terrible tyrants, or bloudie bloudie butchers; where good reason were, that she should bee heavie and dejected; but looke where she thinketh and is perswaded most that God is present, in that place especially, she casteth behinde her all anguishes, agonies, sorrowes, feares and anxieties; there I say she giveth herselfe to all manner of joy, even to drinke wine most liberally, to play, disport, laugh and be merie: As the poet said in love and wanton matters:

*Both grey-beard, old and aged trot when they the sports remember,
Of lovely Venus, leape for joy,
no cares their heart encomber.*

So verily in these solemne pompes, processions and sacrifices, not onely the aged husband and the old wife, the poore man that liveth in low and private estate, but also

*The fat legd wench well under laid
Which to the mill bestirs full yerne,
Her good round stumps, and well appaid
To grinde her griefe, doth: unne she quene.*

the household limes and servants, and the mercenary day-labourers, who get their living by the sweat of their browes, doe altogether leape for mirth and joy of heart: Kings and princes keepe great cheere in their roiall courts, and make certaine roiall and publike feasts for all comers; but those which they hold in the sacred temples, at sacrifices and solemnities of the gods, performed with fragrant perfumes and odoriferous incense; where it seemeth that men approach neere unto the majestie of the gods, & thinke they even touch them, and be conversant with them in all honour and reverence: such feasts (I say) yeeld a more rare joy and singular delectation, than any other; whereof he hath no part at all who denieth the providence of God: for it is not the abundance and plentie of wine there drunke, nor the store of roast & foddren meat there eaten, which yeeldeth joy and contentment at such solemne feasts; but the assured hope and full perswasion that God is there present, propitious, favourable and gracious; and that he accepteth in good part the honour and service done unto him. For some feasts and sacrifices there be, where there is no musick at all of flutes and hautboies, ne yet any chaplets and garlands of flowers used at all; but a sacrifice, where no god is present, like as a temple without a sacred feast or holy banquet, is * profane, unseittivall, impious, irreligious, and without divine inspiration and devotion; and to speake better, wholly displeasing and odious to himselfe that offereth it; for that he counterfeitheth by hypocritie, praies and adorations, onely in a shew and otherwise than he meaneth, for feare of the multitude, and pronounceth words cleane contrary unto the opinions which he holdeth in Philosophie: when he sacrificeth, he standeth by the priest as he would by a cooke or butcher, who cutteth the throat of a sheepe; and after he hath sacrificed, he goes his way home, saying thus to himselfe: I have sacrificed a sheepe as men ordinarily do unto the gods, who have no care and regard of me. For so it is that Epicurus teacheth his scholars, to set a good countenance of the matter, and neither to envie nor incur the hatred of the common sort, when they are disposed to be merie, but seeming others in practise, and themselves inwardly in being displeased with things done: for according as Euemus saith:

*What things are done perforce by us,
Displeasing be and odious.*

Hereupon it is, that they themselves do say and holde: That superstitious persons are present at sacrifices and religious ceremonies, not for any joy or pleasure they take there, but upon a feare that they have: and verily, herein no difference is betweene them and superstitious folke, in case it be so, that they doe the same things for feare of the world, which the other do for feare of the gods; nay rather they be in a worse condition than those, in that they have not so much hope of good as they, but onely stand alwaies in dread and be troubled in mind, lest they should be detected and discovered, for abusing and deceiving the world by their counterfeit hypocritie; in regard of which feare, they have themselves written books and treatises of the gods and of detrie, so composed, that they be full of ambiguities; and nothing is therein soundly or cleerely delivered, they do so maske, disguise and cover themselves; and all to cloake and hide the opinions which in deed they hold, doubting the furie of the people. Thus much concerning two sorts of men, to wit, the wicked and the simple or common multitude: now therefore let us consider of a third kinde, such as be of the best marke, men of worth and honour, most devout and religious in deed; namely, what sincere and pure pleasures they have, by reason of the perswasion that they hold of God; beleving firmly, that he is the ruler and director of all good persons, the author thou and father from whom proceed all things good and honest; and that it is not lawfull to say or beleeve, that he doth evil, no more than to be perswaded that he suffereth evil: for good he is by nature; and looke whatsoever is good, conceiveth no envie to any, is fearefull of none, neither is it moved with anger or hatred of ought: for like as heat can not coole a thing, but alwaies naturally maketh it hot; so that which is good can not hurt or do ill. Now, anger and favour be farre remote one from the other; so is choler and bitter gall much different from mildnesse and benevolence; as also malice and frowardnesse are opposite unto bountie, meeknesse, and humanitie; for that the one sort ariseth from vertue and puissance; the other from weaknesse and vice. Now are we not to thinke that the divine power is given to be wrathfull and gracious alike; but to beleeve rather, that the proper nature of God is alwaies to be helpfull and beneficiall; whereas to be angry and to doe harme, is not so naturall; but that mightie Jupiter in heaven, he descendeth from thence first downe to the earth, to dispose and ordeine all things: after him, other gods, of whom the one is fumed, The Giver; another, Mild and Bounteous; a third, Protector or Defender: as for Apollō, as Pindarus saith:

*Who doth in winged chariot flie,
Amidst the starres in azure skie,
To every man in his affaire,
Reputed is most debonaire.*

Now as Diogenes was wont to say, all things are Gods, and likewise among friends, all things are common, and good men are Gods friends; even so, impossible it is, that either he who is devout and a lover of God, should not be withall happie; or that a vertuous, temperate, and just man should not likewise be devout and religious. Thinke ye then, that these who denie the government of Gods providence, need other punishment, or be not punished sufficiently for their impietie, in that they cut themselves from so great joy and pleasure as we finde in our selves, we (I say) who are thus well given and religiously affected toward God? The greatest joy that Epicurus stood upon and bare himselfe so boldly, were Metrodorus, Polyanus, Aristotolus and such; and those he was alwaies employed about, either in curing and tending them when they were sicke, or in bewailing them after they were dead: whereas Lycurgus was honoured even by the prophetesse Pythia in these tearmes:

*A man whom Jupiter did love,

As for Socrates, who had a familiar spirit about him, whom he imagined to speake and reason friendly with him, even of kindnesse and good will: and Pindarus likewise, who heard god Pan chant one of those canticles which himselfe had composed, thinke wee that they tooke small pleasure and contentment of heart thereby? Or what may we judge of Phormio, when he lodged in his house, Castor and Pollux; or of Sophocles, for entreteining of Aesculapim, as both himselfe was perswaded, and as others beleeved, for the manifest apparitions presented unto them? It were not amiss and beside the purpose, to rehearse in this place, what a faith and beleeve in the gods, Heromogenes had, and that in those very words and tearmes which he fettereth downe himselfe: The gods (quoth he) who know all things, and likewise can doe all, are so friendly unto me, that for the care they have of my person and my affaires, are never ignorant day or night, either of that action which I purpose to doe, or of that way which I intend to goe: and for that they foresee the issue and event of whatsoever I enterprize and undertake; they advertise me thereof before hand, by preface of ossees, voices, dreames, auguries and bird-flights, which they send as messengers to me of purpose. Moreover, meet it is, that we should have this opinion of the gods, that whatsoever proceedeth from them is good; but when we are perswaded that the goods which we receive from them, be sent unto us, upon speciall favor and grace, this is a wonderfull contentment to the minde, this worketh much confidence, breedeth a marvellous courage, and inward joy, which seemeth as it were to smile upon good men: whereas, they who are otherwise minded and disposed, hinder themselves of that which is most sweet in prosperitie, and leave no refuge or retiring place in time of adversitie; for when any misfortune lighteth upon them, no other haven or reitrait have they than the dissolution or separation of body and soule; nothing I say but the depriving of all sense: as if in a storme or tempest at sea, a man should come and say for the better comfort and assurance of the passengers, that neither the ship had a pilot, nor the luckie fire-lights (Castor and Pollux) appeared to alay the surging waves, or still the boisterous and violent winds, and yet for all that, there was no harme toward, because forsooth the shippe should soone sinke and bee swallowed up of the sea; that that she would quickly turne side, or runne upon some rock for to be split and broken in pieces: for these be the proper reasons which Epicurus useth in grievous maladies and extreme perils: Hopest thou for any good at Gods hand with all thy religion? thou art much deceived: for the essence and nature of God being happie & immortal; is neither given to anger, nor yet inclined to pittie: Dost thou imagine a better state or condition after thy death, than thou hast in thy life? surely thou dost, and art mightily beguiled; for that which is once dissolved, loseth presently all manner of sense; & if it be senselesse, what is that to us? it toucheth not us, whether it be good or ill. But heare you (my good friends) How is it that you exhort me to eat, to drink, and make good cheere? Marie because the tempest is so bigge, that of necessitie (shipwracke must soone ensue, and the extreme perill at hand will quickly bring thee to thy death: and yet the poore passenger (after that the shippe is broken all to pieces, or that hee is flung or fallen out of it) beareth himselfe upon some little hope, that he shall (by one good fortune or other) reach unto the shore and swimme to land; whereas by these mens philosophie, there is no evasion for the soule:

*To any place without the sea
With striving some all loose and grey.*

For that immediately he is dissolved, perisheth and dieth before the bodie; inasmuch as shee feelth excessive joy, by having learned and received this most wise and divine doctrine: That the end of all her adversities and miseries, is to perish for ever, to corrupt and come to nothing. But it were (quoth he, casting his eie upon me) a great tollie to speake any more of this matter, (considering that long since we have heard you discourse in ample manner) against those who hold; that the reasons and arguments of Epicurus make us better disposed and ready to die, than all that Plato hath written in his treatise concerning the soule. What of that? (quoth Zenoxipus) shall this present discourse be left imperfect and unfinished because of it? and feare we to alledge the oracle of the gods, when we dispute against the Epicureans? No (quoth I againe) in any wise, for according to the sentence of Empedocles:

*A good tale twice a man may tell,
And heare it told as oft full well.*

And therefore we must intreat Theon againe; for I suppose he was present at the said disputation, and being (as he is) a young man, he need not feare that young men will charge him for oblivion or default of memorie. Then Theon seeming as if he had beene forced and overcome by constraint: Well (quoth he) since there is no other remedie, I will not do as you Aristodemus did; you were afraid to repeat that which this man had delivered; but I will not sticke to make use of that which you have said: for in mine opinion you have done very well, in dividing men into three sorts; the first, of those, who are leud and wicked; the second of them that bee simple, ignorant, and the common people; the third, of such as be wise, honest, and of good worth. As for those who be wicked & naughtie persons (in feareing the pains and punishments proposed in general unto all) they will be afraid to commit any more sinne, and by this meanes not breaking out, but restraining themselves, they shall live in more joy, & with lesse trouble and disquietnesse. For Epicurus thinketh, that there is no other meanes to divert men from evil doing, than, feare of punishment; & therefore he thinketh it good policie, to imprint in them the frights occasioned by superstition, to mask them with the terrors of heaven & earth, together with fearefull earthquakes, deepe chinks, and openings of the ground, and generally all sorts of feares and suspensions; that being terrified thereby, they might live in better order, and carie themselves more modestly; for more expedient it is for them, not to commit any hainous fact for feare of torments which they were to suffer after their death, than to transgresse & break the lawes, and thereby, live all their life time in danger, and exceeding perplexitie and distrust: As touching the meane people and ignorant multitude (to say nothing of the feare of that which such men beleeve to be in hell) the hope of eternitie, whereof the poets make so great promises, and the desire to live alwaies (which of all other desires is the most auncient and greatest) surpasseth in pleasure and sweet contentment, all childish feare of hell; inasmuch as forgoing and losing their children, their wives and friends, yet they wish rather they should still bee somewhere, and continue (though they endured otherwise all manner of pains and calamities) than wholly to bee taken out of the universall world, and brought to nothing: yea, and willing they are, and take pleasure to heare this spoken of one that is dead: How he is departed out of this world into another, or gone to God; with other such like manner of speeches, importing, that death is no more but onely a change or alteration, but not a totall and entire abolition of the soule. And thus they use to speake:

*Then shall I call even here to mind,
The sweet acquaintance of my friend.*

Also:

*What shall I say from you to Hector bold?
Or husband yours, right deere, who liv'st so old?*

And herof proceeded and prevailed this error: that men supposed they are well eased of their sorrow, and better appaied when they have interred with the dead, the armes, weapons, instruments and garments which they were wont to use ordinarily in their life time; like as Mino was buried together with Glaucon:

*His Candior pipes, made of the long-shanke bones
Of dapple doe or hind, that lived once.*

And if they be perswaded, that the dead either desire or demand any thing, glad they are and willing to send or bestow the same upon them. And thus did Periander, who burnt in the funeral fire together with his wife, her apparell, habilliments, and jewels, for that he thought she called for them, and complained that she lay a cold. And such as these are not greatly afraid of any judge Aacus, of Ascalaphus, or of the river Acheron; considering that they attribute unto them daunces, theatricall plaies, and all kinde of musicke, as if they tooke delight and pleasure therein: and yet there is not one of them all, but is readie to quake for feare, to see that face of death, so terrible, so unpleasant, so glum and grizly, deprived of all sense, and growen to oblivion and ignorance of all things; they tremble for very horrour, when they heare any of these words: He is dead, he is perished, he is gone, and no more to be seene: grievously displeased and offended they be, when these and such like speeches are given out:

*Within the earth as deepe as trees do stand,
His hap shall be to rot and turne to sand:
No feast he shall frequent nor beere the lute
And harpe, ne yet the sound of pleasant suite.*

Again:

*When once the ghost of man from corps is fled,
And pass'd he ranks of reeth let thicke in head;
All meanes to catch and fetch her are but vaine,
No hope there is of her returne againe.*

But they kill them stone dead, who say thus unto them:
*We mortall men have bene once borne for all,
No second birth we are for to expect,
We must not looke for life that is eternall,
Such thoughts, as dreames, we ought for to reject.*

For, casting and considering with themselves, that this present life is a final matter, or rather indeed a thing of nought, in comparison of eternitie; they regard it not, nor make any account to enjoy the benefit thereof; whereupon they neglect all vertue and the honourable exploits of action, as being utterly discouraged and discontented in themselves, for the shortnesse of their life so uncerteine and without allurance; and in one word, because they take themselves unfit and unworthy to performe any great thing. For, to say that a dead man is deprived of all sense, because (having bene before compounded) that composition is now broken and dissolved: to give out also, that a thing once dissolved, hath no Being at all; and in that regard toucheth us not: howsoever they seeme to be goodly reasons, yet they rid us not from the feare of death, but contrariwise, they doe more confirme and enforce the same: for this is it in deed which nature abhorreth, when it shalbe said, according to the Poet Homer's words:

*But as for you, both all and some,
Soone may you earth and water become.*

meaning thereby, the resolution of the soule into a thing that hath neither intelligence nor any sense at all, which Epicurus holding to be a dissipation thereof into (I wot not what) emptinesse, or voidnesse & small indivisible bodies, which he termeth Atomi, by that meanes cutteth off (so much the rather) all hope of immortallitie: for which (I dare well say) that all folke living, men and women both, would willingly be bitten quite thorow and gnawen by the hel-dog Cerberus, or or eary water away in vessells full of holes in the bottome, like as the Danaides did, so they might onely have a Being, and not perish utterly for ever, and be reduced to nothing. And yet verily, there be not many men who feare these matters, taking them to be poeticall fictions and tales devised for pleasure, or rather bug-beares that mothers and nouris use to fright their children with; and even they also who stand in feare of them, are provided of certeine ceremonies and exoratorie purgations, to helpe themselves withall: by which (if they be once cleansed and purified) they are of opinion, that they shall goe into another world to places of pleasure, where there is nothing but playing and dauncing continually among those who have the aire cleere, the winde milde and pure, the light gracious, and their voice intelligible: whereas the privation of life troubleth both yong and old: for we all (even every one of us) are sicke for love, and exceeding desirous

*To see the beaurie of sunnes light,
Which on the earth doth shine so bright,*

as Euripides saith: neither willing are we, but much displeased to heare this:

*And as he spake, that great immortal eie
Which giveth light thorough the fabricke wide
Of this round world, made haste and fast did he
With chariot swift, cleane out of sight to ride.*

Thus together with the perswasion and opinion of immortallitie, they bereave the common people of the greatest and sweetest hopes they have. What thinke wee then of those men who are of the better sort, and such as have lived justly and devoutly in this life? Surely, they looke for no evil at all in another world, but hope and expect there the greatest and most heavenly blessings that be: for first and foremost, champions or runners in a race, are never crowned so long as they be in combat or in their course, but after the combat ended and the victory achieved; even so, when these persons are perswaded that the prooffe of the victorie in this world is due unto them after the course of this life, wonderfull it is, and it can not be spoken, how great contentment they finde in their hearts for the privitie and conscience of their vertue, and for those hopes which assure them, that they one day shall see those (who now abuse their good gifts insolently, who commit outrage by the meanes of their might, riches and authoritie, and who come and foolishly mocke such as are better than themselves) paie for their deserts, and suffer worthily for their pride and insolencie. And forasmuch as never any of them who are enamored of learning, could satisfie (to the full) his desire as touching the knowledge of the truth, and the contemplation of the univerfall nature of this world; for that indeed they see as it were through a darke cloud and a thicke mist; to wit, by the organes and instruments of this body, and have no other use of reason, but as it is charged with the humors of the flesh, weake also and troubled, yea, and woonderfully hindered; therefore having an eie and regard alwaies upward, & endeavoring to flie forth of the bodie (as a bird that taketh her flight and mounteth up aloft, that the may get into another lightsome place of greater capacitie) they labour to make their soule light, and to discharge her of all grosse passions and earthly affections, such as be base and transitorie, and that by the meanes of their studie in philosophic, which they use for an exercise and meditation of death. And verily for my part, I esteeme death a good thing, so perfect and consummate in regard of the soule which then shall live a life indeed, found and certaine, that I suppose the life heere is not a subsistent and assured thing of it selfe, but resembleth rather the vaine illusions of some dreames. And if it be so (as Epicurus saith:) That the remembrance and renewing acquaintance of a friend departed out of this life is every way a pleasant thing; a man may even now consider and know sufficiently, of what ioie these Epicureans deprive themselves, who imagine otherwhiles in their dreames; that they receive and entertaine, yea and follow after to embrace, the very shadows, visions, apparitions, and ghosts of their friends who are dead, and yet they have neither understanding nor sense at all; and meane while they disappoint themselves of the expectation to converse one day indeed with their deere father and tender mother, and to see their beloved and honest wives; and are destitute of all such hope of so amiable company and sweet societie, as they have, who are of the same opinion, that Pythagoras, Plato, and Homer were, as touching the nature of the soule. Certes I am verily perswaded, that Homer (coverly and as it were by the way) shewed, what maner of affection there is in this point, when he casteth and projecteth amide the presse of those that were fighting, the image of Aeneas, as if he were dead indeed; but presently after, hee exhibireth him marching alive, safe and found:

*And when his friends saw him so vigorous
And whole of limbs, and with heart generous,
To battel prest, whom erst they tooke for dead,
They leapt for joy, and banished all dread.*

leaving therefore the foresaid image and shew of him, they ranged all about him. Let us likewise (seeing that reason prooveth & sheweth unto us; that a man may in very truth converse with those that are departed; that lovers and friends may touch, handle, and keepe companie one with another, having their perfect senses) be of good cheere and shunne those, who can not beleve so much, nor reject and cast behind, all such fantastickall images and outward barks and rinds onely, in which they do all their life time nothing else but grieve and lament in vaine. Moreover, they that thinke the end of this life to be the beginning of another that is better; if they lived pleasantly in this world, better contented they are to die, for that they looke for to enjoy a better estate in another; and if things went not to their mind heere, yet are they not much discontented, in regard of the hopes which they have of the future delights and pleasures behind: and these worke in them such incredible joies and expectances, that they put out and abolish all defects and offences whatsoever; these drowne (I say) and overcome all discontentments otherwise of the minde, which by that meanes beareth gently, and endureth with patience what accidents foever befall in the way, or rather in a short diverticle or turning of the way: whereas contrariwise (to those who beleve, that our life heere is ended and dissolved in a certaine deprivation of all sense) death (because it bringeth no alteration of miseries) is dolorous as well to them of the one fortune as the other; but much more unto those who are happy in this present life, than unto such as are miserable; for that as it cutteth these short of all hope of better estate; so from those it taketh away a certaintie of good, which was their present joyfull life: And like as many medicinable and purgative drougs (which are neither good nor pleasant to the stomacke, howbeit in some respect necessarie, howsoever they ease and cure the sicke) doe great hurt, and offend the bodies of such as be in health; even so the doctrine of Epicurus unto those who are unfortunate and live miserably in this world, promisseth an issue out of their miseries, and the same nothing happy, to wit; a finall end, and totall dissolution of their soule: And as for those who are prudent, wise, and live in abundance of all good things, it impeacheth and hindreth altogether their alacritie & contentment of spirit, in bringing and turning them from an happy life to no life at all, from a blessed estate to no estate or being whatsoever. For first & formost this is certaine: That the very apprehension of the losse of goods, afflicteth and vexeth a man as much, as either an assured expectance, or a present enjoying and fruition thereof rejoiceth his heart: yet would they beare us in hand, that the cogitation of this finall dissolution and perdition into nothing, leaveth unto men a most assured and pleasant good, to wit, the refutation or putting by of a certaine fearefull doubt and suspicion of infinit and endlesse miseries: and this say they, doth the doctrine of Epicurus effect, in abolishing the feare of death, and teaching that the soule is utterly dissolved. Now if this be a singular and most sweet content (as they say it is) to be delivered from the feare and expectation of calamities and miseries without end, how can it otherwise be but irksome and grievous, to be deprived of the hope of joies sempiternall, and to lose that supreme and soveraign felicitie? Thus you see it is good neither for the one nor the other, but this, Not-being, is naturally an enemy, and quite contrarie unto all that have Being: And as for those whom the miserie of death seemeth to deliver from the miseries of life, a poore and cold comfort they have (God wor) of that insensibility, as if they had an evasion and escape thereby; and on the other side, those who lived in all prosperitie, and afterwards came of a sudden to change that state into nothing: me thinks I see very plainly, that these tarrie for a fearefull and terrible end of their race, which thus shall cause their felicitie to cease; for nature abhorreth not privation of sense, as the beginning of another estate and being, but is afraid of it because it is the privation of those good things which are present. For to say: That the thing which costeth us the losse of all that we have, toucheth us not, is a very absurd speech, considering, that this very cogitation and apprehension thereof concerneth us much already: for this insensibility doth not afflict and trouble those who have no more Being, but such as yet are, namely, when they come to cast their account, what detriment and losse they receive by being no more, and that by death they shall be reduced to nothing: for it is not the three-headed-helhound Cerberus, nor the river of teares and weeping, Cocytus, which cause the feare of death to be infinit and interminable; but it is that menacing intimation of Nullity or Not-being, & of the impossibility to returne againe into a state of Being, after after men once are gone and departed out of this life; for there is no second nativite nor regeneration, but that Not-being must of necessitie remaine for ever, according to the doctrine of Epicurus: for if there be no end at all of Non-essence, but the same continue infinit and immutable, there will be found likewise an eternall and endlesse miserie in that privation of all good things, by a certaine insensibilitie, which never shall have end. In which point Herodotus seemeth yet to have dealt more wisely, when he saith: That God having given a taste of sweet eternitie, seemeth envious in that behalfe, especially to those who are reputed happy in this world; unto whom that pleasure was nothing els but a bait to procure dolor, namely, when they have a taste of those things which they must forgoe: for what joy, what contentment and fruition of pleasure is there so great, but this conceit and imagination of the soule (falling continually as it were into a vast sea of this infinitie) is not able to quell and chase away, especially in those who repose all goodnesse and beatitude in pleasure? And if it be true as Epicurus saith: That to die in paine, is a thing incident to most men; then surely there is no meane at all to mitigate or allay the feare of death, seeing it haleth us even by griefe and anguish to the losse of a soveraigne good: and yet his sectaries would seeme to urge and enforce this point mainly, to wit, in making men beleve that it is a good thing to escape and avoid evill; and yet forsooth, that they should not thinke it evill, to be deprived of good. They confesse plainly, that in death there is no joy nor hope at all, but what pleasure and sweetnesse foever we had, is thereby and then cut off; whereas contrariwise, even in that time, those who beleve their soules to be immortall and incorruptible, looke to have and enjoy the greatest and most divine blessings; and for certaine great revolutions of yeeeres, to converse in all happinesse and felicity, sometime upon the earth, otherwhiles in heaven, untill in that generall resolution of the universall world they come to burne together with Sun and Moone, in a spirituall and intellectuall fire.

This spacious place of so many and so great joies, Epicurus cutteth off and abolisheth cleane, in that he annulleth all hopes that we ought to have in the aide and favour of the gods; whereby both in contemplative life he extinguieth the love of knowledge and learning; and also in the active, the desire of valourous acts of winning honour and glory; restraining, driving and thrusting nature into a narrow roome, of a joy which is very strait, short and unpure, to wit, from the soules delight to a fleshy pleasure; as if he were not capable of a greater good, than the avoiding of evill.

The Summarie.

THis precept was first given by Neocles the brother of Epicurus, as saith Suidas: and as if it had bene some golden sentence, it wem currant or divinity in the mouthes of all the Epicureans, who advised a man that would live happily, nor to intermeddle in any publike affaires of State: but Plutarch considering well how ill this Emprise sounded, being taken in that sense and construction which they give unto it, and foreseeing the absurd and dangerous consequences ensuing upon such an opinion, doth now confute the same by seven arguments or sound reasons, to wit: That therein such foolish Philosophers discover mightily their excessive ambition: That it is a thing dishonest and perillous for a man to retire himselfe apart from others; for that if a man be vicious, he ought to seeke abroad for remedie of his maladie: if a lover of goodnesse and vertue, he is likewise to make other men love the same. Item: That the Epicureans life being defamed with all ordure and wickednesse, it were great reason in deed, that such men should remaine hidden and buried in perpetuall darknesse. After this, he sheweth that the good proceeding from the life of vertuous men, is a sufficient encouragement for every one to be employed in affaires: for that there is nothing more miserable than an idle life, and that which is unprofitable to our neighbors: That life, birth, generation mans soule, yea, and man himselfe wholly as he is, teach us by their definitions and properties: That we are not set in this world, for to be directed by such a precept as this: and in conclusion: That the estate of our soules, after they be separate from the bodie, condemneth and overthroweth this doctrine of the Epicureans, and prooveth evidently, that they be extreme miserable, both during and after this life. All these premises well marked and considered, instruct and teach them that be of good calling in the world, and in higher place, to endeavor and straine themselves in their severall vocations, to flee an idle life, so farre forth, that they take heed withall, they be not over curious, pragmatically, busie and stirring, nor too ready and forward to meddle in those matters which ought to be let alone as they be; for fewe lest whiles they weene to raise and advance themselves, they fall backe, and become lower than they would.

Or how even himselfe, who was the authour of this sentence, would not be unknowne, but that all the world should understand, that he it was who said it; for expressely he uttered this very speech, to the end that it might not remain, unknowne that he had some more understanding than others, desirous to winne a glorie undeserved and not due unto him, by diverting others from glory, and exhorting them to obscurity of life. I like the man well verily, for this is just according to the old verbe:

*I hate him who of wisdom leaves the name,
And to himselfe cannot performe the same.*

We read that Philoxenus the sonne of Eryxus, and Gnaetho the Sicilian, (two notorious gluttons given to bellie-cheere, and to love their tooth) when they were at a feast, used to snite their noses into the very dishes and platters with meat before them; thereby to drive those in their messe, and who were set at the table, from eating with them, and by that meanes to engorge themselves, and fill their bellies alone with the best viands served up: Semblably, they who are excessively and out of all measure ambitious, before others as their concurrents and corivals, blame and dispraise glorie and honour, to the end that they alone without any competitors might enjoy the fame: And herein they doe like unto mariners sitting at the oare in a bote or gally; for howsoever their eie is toward the poupe, yet they labour to 40 set the prow forward, in that the flowing of the water by reciprocaton, caused by the stroke of the oares, comming forcibly backe upon the poupe, might helpe to drive forward the vessell; even so, they that deliver such rules and precepts, whiles they make semblant to flee from glory, pursue it as fast as they can; for otherwise if it were not so: what need had he (whosoever he was) to give out such a speech? what meant he else to write it, and when he had written it, to publish the same unto posteritie? If I say he meant to be unknowne to men living in his time, who desired to be knowne unto those that came after him? But let us come to the thing it selfe: How can it chuse but be simply naught? Live so hidden (quoth he) that no man may perceive that ever you lived; as if he had said: Take heed you be not knowne for a digger up of sepulchres, & a defacer of the tombs & monuments of the dead: But contrariwise, a foule & dishonest thing it is to 50 live in such sort, as that you should be willing that we al know not the manner thereof: Yet would I for my part fye cleane contrary: Hide not thy life, how ever thou do, and if thou hast lived badly, make thy selfe knowne; bewiser, repent & amend: if thou be endued with vertue, hide it not, neither be thou an unprofitable member; if vicious, continue not obstinate there, but yeeld to correction, & admit the cure of thy vices; or rather at leastwise first make a distinction, & define who it is, to whom you give this precept? If he be ignorant, unlearned, wicked, or foolish, then it is as much as if you said thus: Hide thy feaver; cloke & cover thy phresie; let not the physician take take notice of thee; goe and put thy selfe into some darke corner, where no person may have a sight of thee, or of thy maladies and passions; go thy way aside with all thy naughtinesse, sicke as thou art of an incurable and mortall disease; cover thy sight and envie; hide thy superstition; suppress and conceale (as it were) the disorderly beatings of thine arteries; take heed & be afraid how you let your pulse be felt, or bewray your selfe to those who have the meanes, & are able to admonish, correct, and heale you. But long ago, & in the old world, our ancestors were wont to take in hand and cure openly in publike place, those that were diseased in body: in those daies, everie one (who had met with any good medicine, or knowne a remedie, whereof he had the prooffe, either in himselfe being sicke, or in another cured thereby) would reveale and communicate the same unto another that stood in need thereof: and thus they say: The skill of Physick arising first, and growing by experience, became in time, a noble and excellent science. And even so, requisite it is and necessarie, to discover and lay open unto all men, lives that be diseased, and the infirmities of the soule, to touch and handle them, and by considering the inclinations of every man, to say thus unto one: Subject thou art to anger, take heed thereof; unto another: Thou art given to jealousie and emulation, beware of it, doe thus and thus; to a third: Art thou amorous and full of love? I have beene so my selfe otherwhiles, but I repent me thereof. But now a daies it is cleane contrarie; in denying, in cloaking, covering, and hiding, men thrust and drive their vices inwardly, and more deeply still into their secret bowels. Now if they be men of worth and vertuous, whom thou counselest to hide themselves, that the world may take no knowledge of them, it is all one as to say unto Epaminondas: Take no charge of the conduct of an army: or to Lycurgus: Amuse not your head about making lawes: and to Tiberius: Kill no tyrants: to Pylagoras: Keepe no schoole, nor teach in any wife: to Socrates: See you dispute not, nor hold any discourses of philosophie: and to your selfe Epicurus first of all: Write not to your friends in Asia; enroll and gather no soldiours out of Aegypt; have no commerce nor negotiate with them; do not protect and defend as it were with a guard from villanie and violence, the yoong gentlemen of Lampsacum; send not your books abroad to all men and women alike, thereby to shew your learning; finally, ordeine nothing about your sepulture. To what tended your publicke tables? what meant those assemblies that you made of your familiar friends and faire yoong boies; to what purpose were there so many thousands of verses written and composed so painfully by you in the honour of Metrodorus, Aristobolus, & Charademus, to the end that after death they should not be forgotten? Was all this because you would ratifie and establish vertue by oblivion; arts by doing nothing, philosophy by silence; and felicitie by forgetfulness? Will you needs bereave mans life of knowledge, as if you would take away light from a feast, to the end that me might not know that you & your followers do all for pleasure, & upon pleasure? then good reason you have to give counsell, & saie unto your selfe: Live unknowne. Certes, if I had a minde to leade my life with Medea the harlot, or to keepe ordinarily about me, the strumpet Leontium; to detest all honestie; to repose all my delight and joy in the tickling pleasures of the flesh, and in wanton lusts: these ends verily would require to be hidden in darknesse, and covered with the shadow of the night; these be the 40 things that would be forgotten, and not once knowne: But if a man in the science of naturall philosophie, delight in hymnes and canticles to praise God, his justice and providence; or in morall knowledge, to set out and commend the law, humane societie, and the politike government of common-weale; and therein regard honour and honestie, not profit and commoditie; what reason have you to advise him for to live obscurely? Is it because he should teach none by good precept? is it for that no man should have a zealous love to vertue, or affect honestie by his example? If Themistocles had never bene knowne to the Athenians, Greece had not given Xerxes the foile and repulse; likewise if Camillus had bene unknowne to the Romans, peradventure by this time Rome had bene no city at all; had not Dion knowne Plato, Sicilie should not have bene delivered from tyrannie. But this is my conceit; that like as light effecteth thus 50 much, that we not onely know one another, but also are profitable one unto another; even so in my judgement, to be knowne abroad, bringeth not onely honor and glorie, but also meanes of employment in vertue: Thus Epaminondas unknowne unto the Thebanes, untill he was fortie yeeres old, stood them in no stead at all; but after that they tooke knowledge of him once, and had committed unto him the leading of their armie, he saved the citie of Thebes, which had like to have bene lost, and delivered Greece, being in danger of servitude; shewing in renowne and glorie (no lesse than in some cleere light) vertue producing her effects in due time: For according to the poet Sophocles: By use it shineth

Like

*Like iron or brasse, that is both faire and bright
So long as men doe handle it aright.
In time also, an house goes to decay,
And fallerh downe, if dweller be away.*

whereas the very manners & natural conditions of a man be marred & corrupted, gathering as it were a mosse, & growing to age in doing nothing, through ignorance & obscurity. And verily a mute silence, a sedentarie life, retired a part in idleness, causeth not onely the bodie, but the mind also of man to languish & grow feeble: & like as dormant, or close & standing waters, for that they be covered, overshadowed, & not running, grow to putrifie; even so, they that never stirre, nor be employed, what good parts soever they have in them, if they put them not forth, nor exercise their naturall and inbred faculties, corrupt quickly, and become old. See you not how when the night commeth on & approacheth neere, our bodies become more heaue, lumpy, and unfit for any worke, our spirits more dull and lazie to all actions, and the discourse of our reason and understanding more drowfie and contracted within it selfe? like unto fire that is ready to goe out; and how the same by reason of an idleness and unwillingnesse comming upon it, is somewhat troubled and disquieted with diuers fantastickal imaginations; which obseruation aduertiseth us daily after a secret and silent manner, how short the life of man is:

But when the sunne with light some beames Dispatched hath these cloudy dreames,

after he is once risen (and by mingling together the actions and cogitations of men with his light; awakeneth and raiseth them up (as Democritus saith) in the morning, they make haste jointly one with another upon a forren desire, as if they were compounded and knit with a certaine mutuell bond, some one way, and some another, rising to their severall works and businesse. Certes, I am of advice, that even our life, our very nativity, yea & the participation of mankind is given us of God to this end: That we should know him; for unknowne he is and hidden in this great fabricke and universall frame of the world, all the while that hee goeth too and fro therein by small parcels and piece-meale: but when hee is gathered in himselfe, and grown to his greatnesse; then shineth hee and appeereth abroad, where before he lay covered; then is he manifest and apparent, where before he was obscure and unknown; for knowledge is not the way to his essence, as some would have it; but contrariwise, his essence is the way to knowledge; for that knowledge maketh not each thing, but onely sheweth it when it is done; like as the corruption of any thing that is, may not be thought a transporting to that which is not, but rather a bringing of that which is dissolved to this passe, that it appeereth no more: Which is the reason that according to the aunient lawes and traditions of our countrey, they that take the sunne to be Apollo, give him the names of Delius and Pythius; and him that is the lord of the other world beneath, whether he be a god or a diuell, they call Ades; for that when we are dead and dissolved, we goe to a certaine * obscuritie, where nothing is to be seene:

*Even to the prince of darknesse and of night
The lord of idle dreames deceiving sight.*

And I suppose that our aunceltors in old time called man Phos, of light, for that there is in every one of us, a vehement desire and love to know and be knowne one of another, by reason of the consanguinitie betwene us. And some philosophers there be, who thinke verily, that even the soule in her substance is a very light, whereunto they are ledde as wel by other signes & arguments, as by this, that there is nothing in the world that the soule hateth so much as ignorance, rejecting all that is obscure and unlightsome; troubled also when she is entred into dark places, for that they fill her full of feare and suspition: but contrariwise, the light is so sweet and delectable unto her, that she taketh no joy and delight in any thing; otherwise lovely and desireable by nature, without light or in darknesse; for that it is which causeth all pleasures, sports, pastimes, & recreations to be more jocund, amiable, & to mans nature agreeable; like as a common fauce that seasoneth and commendeth all viands wherewith it is mingled: whereas he that hath cast himselfe into ignorance, and is enwrapped within the clouds of mistie blindness, making his life a representation of death, and burying it as it were in darknesse, seemeth that he is wearie even of being, and thinketh life a very trouble unto him: and yet they are of opinion, that the nature of glorie and essence, is the place assigned for the soules of godly, religious, and vertuous folke:

*To whom the sunne shin's alwaies bright
When heere with us it is darke night:*

The

*The meadowes there, both faire and wide,
With roses red are beautified:
The fields all round about them dight
With verdure, yeeld a pleasant sight:
All raptised with flowers full gay,
Of fruitfull trees, that blossom ay:
Amid this place the rivers cleere
Runne soft and still, some there, some heere.*

Wherein they passe the time away, in calling to remembrance and recounting that which is past, in discouring also of things present, accompanying one another, and conversing together. Now there is a third way, of those who have lived ill, and be wicked persons, the which sendeth their soules headlong into a darke gulf and bottomlesse pit:

*Where, from the dormant rivers bleak
Of shade night, thick mists doe reek,
As blacke as pitch continually
And those all round about doe slee.*

enfoldng, whelming, and covering those in ignorance and forgetfulness, who are tormented there and punished: for they be not greedy geiers or vultures, that evermore eat and gnaw the liver of wicked persons laid in the earth; and why? the same already is either burned or rotted: neither be there certaine heaue fardels, or weightie burdens that presse downe and overcharge the bodies of such as be punished:

*For such thin ghosts and fibres small,
Have neither flesh nor bone at all.*

Nyet are the reliques of their bodies who be departed, such as be capable of punishment, for that belongeth properly to a bodie that is solid and able to resist; but the onely way and true manner of chastising and punishing those, who have lived badly in this world, is infamie, ignorance, an entire abolition, and totall reduction to nothing, which bringeth them from the river Lethe, that is to say, Oblivion, into another mournfull river, where there is no mirth, no joy, nor cheerefulness, & from thence plungeth them into a vast sea, which hath neither shore nor bottom, even idleness and unaptnesse to all good, which can doe nought else but draw after it a generall forgetfulness and buriall (as it were) in all ignorance and infamous obscuritie.

RVLES AND PRECEPTS OF HEALTH IN MANER OF A DIALOGUE.

The Summarie.

HHe conjunction of the soule with the bodie being so straight, as every man knowes it is, I can not see how it is possible that the one should commit any disorder or excessse, but the other must needs be grieved therewith immediatly: And if there be anything that ought to be deplored and lamented, it is the losse of time, especially and above all, when the same is occasioned by our own intemperance; for that at such a time when as we should attend upon our dutie, we become and continue unprofitable, hurrying many times both our selves and many others. Now for that the study of good literature requirerh a soule well composed and governed in a sound, healthfull, and vigorous bodie; it is not without good cause, that Plutarck interminglerh among philosophical discourses certaine rules & precepts as touching health. For in truth a vaine endeavor & enterpryse this were, and hardly could a man have his mind disposed to good things, in case the bodie be ill affected and misgoverned: But fearing lest it would be thought, that he who made profession of philosophie onely, proceeded farther than in reason hee ought, and brake the limits and bounds of sciences, in meddling with physick heere: Before that he entere into the Dialogue, when he had touched the occasion of this conference and talke; he sheweth: that the studie of physick is agreeable to philosophie: which done, he representeth certaine questions proposed by a third person, which serve in stead of a preface to those precepts and lessons, by him set downe afterwards; not following heerein any exact or exquisite method, but making choise of that which he thought to be most meet for the time, and suting best to those persons, for whose sake this Dialogue was written. He speaketh first therefore of the use of meats, especially such as are sweet and pleasing to the tooth: also what a man is to take heed of in this behalfe: Then he treateth of the pleasures of the bodie, declaring what measure therein we ought to keepe, and discovering by a certaine similitude, the pernicious indiscretion of those who love to keepe good cheere and maintaine dainty fare. Consequently heereupon, he forbiddeth us to use bodily pleasures unlesse we be in good and perfect health; condemneth fulnesse and overmuch repletion, which is the cause of most diseases that are incident to mans body, and this he enrichth and amplifieth by another proper similitude. He is desirous also that maladies were foreseene and prevented, setting downe a speciall remedie therefore, and proving; that the body cannot enjoy any delight, whether in eating or drinking, in case it be not healthy. From this he proceedeth to make mention of diet, and of the prognostikes of diseases breeding and toward. Item, how, and wherewith the maladies of our friends ought to serve and stead us, adding thus much moreover; that for the better maintenance and preservation of health, a man is not to feed to satietie; that he ought to travel well and not spare himselfe; also that he is to save his naturall seed: upon this he discourseth of the exercise and nourishment of students and scholars, describing particularly whatsoever in this point is most woorth the noting and observation, and so cleareth this question, namely; Whether it be holisome for the body to dispute either at the table, or presently upon meat: After all this, he treateth of walking, of sleepe, of vomiting, of purgations of the belly, of diet's over exquisite and precise; condemning expressly idleness, as a thing contrary to the good disposition of the body. Furthermore, he sheweth when a man ought to be at quiet and rest; as also the time that he may give himselfe to pleasure: but above all, he requirith of every man; that he learne to know his owne nature and inclination, as also the meats and drinks that be agreeable unto his stomack: exhorting in the end all students to spare their bodies, to looke unto them, and make much of them, that they may have the better meanes to proceed and goe forward in the knowledge of good letters, whereby they might another day be profitable members of the common-wealth, and doe more good to the societie of men.

RULES AND PRECEPTS OF health in manner of a dialogue.

The personages speaking in this dialogue: MOS-CHION and ZEUXIPPUS.

MOSCHION.

And did you then indeed, (my friend Zeuxippus) turne away Glancus the physician yesterday, who was desirous to confesse with us in philosophie?

ZEUXIPPUS.

No wis, (good Moschion) neither did I put him away; desirous was he to doe as you say: But this was it that I avoided and feared, namely: To give him any advantage or occasion to fasten upon me, and take hold on me, knowing him as I doe to be religious and quarrellsome: for in physick, if I may use the words of Homer:

*He may well stand for many a one,
Although he be but one alone.*

As for philosophie, he is not well affected thereto, but alwaies provided of some shrewd & bitter tearmes against her in all his disputations, and as then especially; for I observed how he came directly against us, crying out upon us a farre off with a loud voice, & charging us; that we had to enterprise a great matter, and the same not very civill & honest, and in that we had broken the bounds, and pluckt up (as a man would say) the very limit-marks of sciences, laying all confusion, and making a confusion of them, in disputing as we did of holisome diet, and of the manner how to live in good health. For the confines and frontiers (quoth he) of Physicians and Philosophers, are (as we use to say in the vulgar proverbe, as touching Myfians and Phrygians) farre different, and remooved a lunder: Moreover, he had readily in his mouth certaine speeches and sentences of ours, which we delivered by way of pastime onely, and yet for all that, were not impertinent or unprofitable, and those he would seeme to controule, reprove, and scorne.

MOSCHION.

But I for my part (o Zeuxippus) could be very well content, yea, and most desirous to heare, even those speeches that he mocked, as others beside, which yee had concerning this matter, if so be it might stand with your pleasure to rehearse the same.

ZEUXIPPUS.

I thinke no lesse (o Moschion) for that you are enclined naturally to philosophie, and thinke not well of that philosopher who is not well affected to physicke, but are displeated and offended with him; in case (I say) he suppose it more meet and becoming for him to be seene studying Geometrie, Logicke, or Musicke, than willing to enquire and learne

What rule at home in house, what worke there is,

How things doe stand, what goes well, what amiss?

When I say, at home, I meane in his owne body; and yet a man shall see ordinarily, what a number more there be of spectators at Theaters, where there is some publick dole or free distribution of money to those that are assembled to see the games and pastimes, as the manner is at Athens, than otherwise. Now of all the liberall sciences, Physicke is one, which as it giveth place to none whatsoever, in beautie, in outward shew, and in pleasure or delight; so it alloweth a great reward and salarie unto those that love it, even as much as their life and health comes to; and therefore we are not to accuse and charge Philosophers, who discourse and dispute of matters concerning like regiment of health, for passing beyond their bounds and confines: but rather we ought to blame them, if they thinke that they should plucke up altogether, and take away those land-marks, to labor (as it were) in some common field betweene them and Physicians, in the study & contemplation of things good and honest, aiming & seeking in al their disputations and discourses, after that which is both pleasant to know & necessarie to understand.

MOSCHION.

But let us I pray you (o Zeuxippus) leave Glancus to himselfe, who for the gravity which he carrieth, would be accounted a man in all points accomplished without any need at all of Philosophies helpe; and recount unto me (if you please) all those speeches which you had, especially at first, those I meane which you said were not spoken in earnest, and yet were scorned and reprooved by Glancus.

ZEUXIPPUS.

I will, and that right willingly. This friend of ours therefore delivered thus much; how he heard one say: That to have ones hands alwaies warme, and never suffer them to be cold, was no small meane to the preservation of health: but contrariwise, to have ordinarily the extreme parts of the body cold, drove heat inwardly into the center of the body, and brought us to a certaine familiaritie and acquaintance with a feaver; as also, to turne and drive with out tooth together with heat the matter thereof, and to distribute the same equally throughout the whole bodie, was an holisome thing; as we see by experience, that if we occupie our hands, and doe some worke with them, the verie motion exciteeth and stirreth up, yea, and maintaineth naturall heat: but if we have no such businesse or employment for them, but hold them still and idle, yet for all that we are not to admit or entertaine cold in those extreme parts of the bodie: This (I say) was one of the points that Glancus laughed at. The second (as I take it) was touching the meats that yee use to give unto sicke persons: For that hee counsell'd men (in time of health) to taste the same by little and little; so as they might bee acquainted therewith, to the end that they should not abhorre and lothe them (as little children use to doe) nor hate such a kind of diet; but make the same in some fort after a gentle manner, familiar unto their appetites; that (whenever it hapned they were sicke) such viands might not go against their stomacks, as if they were Physicke drouges or medicines, out of the apothecaries shoppe: also, that we should not be offended and discontent, otherwhiles to feed upon one single dish and no more, and the same without any fauce to draw it on, or fine dressing and handling by cooks craft, to commend it. For which cause he would not have men thinke it strange, to come now and then to the table, without being at the baine or hot-house before; nor to drinke there water, when wine is upon the board, nor to forbear to drinke our drinke hot in summer time, although there be snow set before us to coole it. Provided alwaies, that this abstinence proceed not from any ambitious ostentation and vain-glory, or because we would vaunt and make our boast thereof afterward; but that we doe it apart by our selves, making no words thereof, and accustoming by little and little our appetite to obey reason willingly, and to be ruled by that which is good and profitable, by weaning our mindes (long before) from that scrupulous curiositie, daintie nicenesse, and inward complaints, about these matters in time of sicknesse; when commonly we are ready to whine and lament, for that wee misse those our former pleasures, and great delights, which we were wont to enjoy, and see our selves brought to a more base kinde of diet, and a straighter rule of life. For a good saying it was: Chuse the best life simply that is; use and custome will make it pleasing and agreeable unto thee: the which by good proofe and experience hath beene found profitable in all things, but principally in the regard and care of our bodies (as touching diet,) which in time of best health ought to be ordered so by use and custome, that the same may become kinde, familiar, and agreeable to our nature; and namely by calling to minde that which others are wont to doe and say in their sicknesse, how they fume and chafe, how they fare and goe to worke when hot water is brought unto them for to drinke, or warme brothes to be supped, or drie-bread to be eaten; how they call these, untoward, naughty, and unfavourie victuals, yea and name those, cursed and odious persons, who would seeme to force the same upon them for to eat or drinke. Manie there have beene, who had their bane by baines, such as ailed not much at the first, and were not very sicke at the beginning; onely they had brought themselves to this passe, that they could neither eat nor drinke, unless they were first bathed, or had sweat in a stoupe: among whom, Titus the emperour of Rome was one, as they were able to tell us who had the cure of him when he lay sicke. It was said moreover: That alwaies viands most simple, and such as cost least, were holsonest for the bodie; also that above all things, men ought to beware of repletion, of drunkennesse and voluptuous life; especially, when there is some festivall day toward, wherein they use to make exceeding cheere; or when they purpose to invite their friends to a great dinner, or otherwise looke to be hidden themselves to some roiall feast of a king or lord generally, or else to a banquet, where they shall be put to quaffe and carrouse in their turne, which they may not refuse to do: against such times (I say) they ought to prepare their bodies beforehand, as it were whiles the weather is calme and faire, and make it more fresh and lightsome, yea, and better able to abide the storme and tempest toward: for a very hard matter it is in such assemblies, and feasts of great lords or deere friends, for a man to stay himselfe in a meane, and mainteine his accustomed sobriety; but he shall be thought uncivill, unmanerly, infocible, too austere and odious to all the company. To the end therefore that we should not put fire to fire (as they say) lay gorge upon gorge, surfet upon surfet, and wine upon wine, good it were to imitate and follow in good earnest that which was sometime merily done by king Philip, and that was this: A certaine man invited him upon a time to a supper, into the countrey, thinking that hee would come with a small company about him; but seeing that he brought a great traine and retinue with him, and knowing well that he had prepared no more then would serve for a few guests; he was wonderfully troubled; Philip perceiving it, sent underhand to every one of his friends that came with him, this word: That they should keepe a roome in their stomacks for a deintie tart or cate that was coming: they beleeving this message in good sadnesse, made spare of other viands that stood before them, looking evermore when this deintie should be served up, in such sort, as that the meat provided was sufficient for the whole company; even so we ought before-hand to be prepared against the time that we are to be at such great feasts and meetings afore said, where we shall be put to it perforce, to drinke round in our turne, and to answer every ones challenge, to reserve (I say) a place in our bodies, both for meats and also for fine cates, and junketting dishes: yea and beleeve me, if need be, for drunkennesse, and thither to bring an appetite fresh and readie for such things. But if peradventure such constraints and compulsions surprise us upon a sudden, when we are either full and heavey, or ill at ease, for that we have a little before over-eaten and drunk our selves; in case (I say) some great lords be come to us, or in place unexpected, or haply a friend or stranger take us at unawares, and unprovided, so that we be forced for shame to keepe others company, who are well enough disposed in body, and prepared for to drinke and make merry; then must we be especially well armed against foolish bashfulnessse, and to meet with such such bad shamefastnesse is the cause of to many evils among men; and namely, by alledging and saying these verses of king Creon in a tragédie of Euripides:

*Better it were for me, you to displease
My friend, than at this time, for your content,
To give my selfe to pleasure and mine ease,
But after, with great sorrow to repent.*

For to cast a mans selfe into a pleurisie or phrensie, for feare to be held and reputed rustical and uncivill, is the part of a rude clowne in deed, and of one who hath neither wit nor judgement, ne yet any skill or speech to entertaine and keepe companie with men, unless they may be drunken and engorge themselves like gluttons: for the very refusall it selfe of eating and drinking, if it be handled with dexteritie and a good grace, will be no lesse acceptable to the companie, than drinking square and carrowing round. And if the man who maketh a feast, absteine himselfe, though he sit at the table (as the manner is at a sacrifice whereof he tasteth not) enterreining his guests with a cheerefull countenance and a friendly welcome, and whiles the cups and trenchers walke about him, be disposed to mirth and cast out some pretie jests of himselfe, he shall no lesse content and please his guests, than he that will seeme to be drunken for companie, and cram his bellie with them, till it be readie to cracke. To this purpose he made mention of certaine ancient examples; and namely (among other) of Alexander the Great, who after he had drunke well and liberally, was bathed and ashamed to denie the challenge of Medius, one of his captaines, who had invited him to supper; and thereupon (falling againe to drinke wine afresh) died thereof. And of those who lived in our daies, he spake of one Rigla, a notable Pan-cratiast or champion at all feats of activitie, whom Titus Caesar the emperour, sent for one day betimes in the morning to come and bathe with him, who came indeed, and after he had bathed and had drunke a great draught, was (by report) surprisid with an Apoplexie, whereupon he died immediately. All these matters, our Physician Glancie mocked and reprooved, calling them discourses of schoolemasters to children their scholars: and as he was not very willing to heare more, so were not we greatly desirous to relate and discouse farther unto him; for that he had no mind to consider ech thing accordingly that was delivered. Socrates verily, who was the first that debarred us from eating those meats which drew us on to eat more still when we were not hungry nor had a stomacke thereto; and from drinking such drinks which caused us to drinke, although we were not drie and thirstie; forbade us not simply to use meats and drinks, but taught us rather to use them onely when we had need of them, joining the pleasure of them with their necessitie; like as they do, who employ the publicke money of cities (which before was wont to be spent at Theaters, in exhibiting plaies and shewes) about the charges of mainteining souldiers for the warres: for that which is sweet, so long as it is a part of our nourishment, we hold to be proper and familiar to nature; and we ought all the whiles that we be hungry, to use and enjoy necessarie nourishment, as sweet and pleasant; but otherwise not to stirre and provoke other new and extraordinarie appetites apart, after that we are delivered from those that be common and ordinarie: for like as unto Socrates himselfe, dancing was no unpleasant exercise; even so he who maketh his whole supper or meale of junkets and banquetting dishes, catcheth lesse shame thereby: but when a man hath taken already as much as is sufficient to content nature, and wherewith he is well satisfied, he ought to beware as much as in any thing els, how he putteth forth his hands to any such dainties. And we are to flee and avoid in these things, follie and ambition, no lesse than friandise or gluttonie: for these two vices induce us likewise often times to eat some thing when we are not hungrie, and to drinke also when we be not athirst; yea, and they suggest and minister unto us certaine base and extravagant imaginations, to wit, that it were great simplicitie, and a very absurd thing, not to feed liberally of a rare, deere and geafon dith, if it may be had; as for example: That which is made of a sowes pappes when she is newly farrowed, Italian mushroomes, Samian cakes, or flow out of Aegypt; for these toies and imaginations smell somewhat of vain-glory as the sent of meat coming out of a kitchen, manie times set our teeth a watering and our stomacke on edge to use them, forcing the bodie (which otherwise would not seeke after them) to participate thereof, onely because they be much spoken of and hard to come by; to the end that we make our report and recount unto others, what wee have done, and be reputed by them right happie and fortunate; for that wee have enjoyed things, so deere, so singular and so geafon. The like affection they cary to women also of great name and reputation: for it falleth out, that having their owne wives in bedde with them, and those faire and beautifull damas, such also as love them deerey, they lie still and stirre not; but if they meet with any courtesan, such as Phryne or Lais was, unto whom they have paid good silver out of their purse, though otherwise their bodies be unable, dull and heave in performing the worke of Venus, yet doing they will be, what they can, and straine themselves upon a vaine-glorious ambition, to provoke and stirre up their lascivious lust unto fleshly pleasure: where-upon Phryne herselfe, being now old and decayed, was wont to say: That she sold her leese and dreggs the deerer, by reason of her reputation.

A great thing it is and wonderfull, that if we receive into our bodies as many pleasures as nature doth require or can well beare; or rather, if upon divers occasions and businesses, we resist her appetites, and put her off unto another time, and that we be loth and hardly brought to yeeld unto her necessities, or (according as Plato saith) give place, after that she hath by fine force pricked and urged us thereto, we should not suffer for all that, any harme thereby, but go away freely without any losse or detriment: but on the other side, if we abandon our selves to the desires that descend from the soule to the bodie, so farre forth as they force us to minister unto the passions thereof, and rise up together with them, impossible it is, but that they should leave behinde them exceeding great losses and damages, in stead of a few pleasures, and those feeble and small in appearance, which they have given unto us: and this above all things would be considered, that we take heed how we provoke the body to pleasures, by the lusts of the minde; for the beginning thereof is against nature. For like as the tickling under the arme-holes, procureth unto the soule a laughter, which is not proper, milde and gentle, but rather troublesome and resembling some spasm or convulsion; even so all the pleasures which the bodie receiveth when it is pricked and provoked by the soule, be violent, forced, turbulent, furious and unnatural. Whensoever therefore any occasion shall present it selfe to enjoy such rare and notable delights, it were better for us to take a glorie in the abstinence, rather than in the fruition thereof, calling to minde that which Simonides was wont to say: That he never repented any silence of his, but often times he bethrewed himselfe for his speech; and even so we never repent that we have refused any viands, or drunke water in stead of good Falerne wine. And therefore we ought not onely, not to force nature, but if other-whiles we be served with such cates and meats as the craveth, we are to divert our appetite from the same, and to reduce it to the use of simple and ordinary things many times, even for custome and exercise:

*If right and law may broken be,
for any earthly thing,
The best pretence is for to win a crowne, and be a king.*

So said Eteocles the Thebane, though untrue: but we may better say: If we must be ambitious and desirous of glorie in such things as these, it were most honest and commendable to use continence and temperance for the preservation of health. Howbeit, some there be, who upon an illiberall pinching and mechanicall sparing, can restraîne and keepe downe their appetites when they be at home in their owne houses; but if it chance they be bidden forth to others, they gorge and fill their bellies with these exquisite and costly viands; much like to those, who in time of warre and hostilitie, raise booties, and prey upon the lands of their enemies what they can; and when they have so done, they goe from thence ill at ease, carrying away with them for the morrow (upon this their fulnesse and unsatiable repletion) crudity of stomacke and indigestion. Crates therefore, the philosopher thinking; that civill warres and tyrannies arise and grow up in cities, as well by reason of superfluity and excess in dainty fare, as upon any other cause whatsoever, was wont by way of mirth, to give admonition in these tearmes: Take heed you bring us not into a civill sedition, by augmenting the platter alwaies before the Lentil: that is to say, by dispending more than your revenues will beare. But in deed, every man ought to have this command and rule of himselfe, as to say: Augment not evermore the platter before the Lentil, nor at any time passe beyond the Cresses and the Olive, even to fine tarts and delicate fishes, lest you bring your bodie into a domesticall dissention afterwards with it selfe; namely, to painfull colickes, lasks, and fluxes of the bellie, by over-much fulnesse and excess of feeding: for simple viands and ordinarie, containe the appetite within the bounds and compass of nature; but the artificiall devices of cooks and cunning fellows in pasty, with their curious cates of all sorts, with their exquisite sauces and pickles (as the comicall Poet saith) set out and extend alwaies the limits of pleasure, encroching still beyond the bounds of utilitie and profit. And I wot not verily, how it comes about, that considering we so much detest and abhorre those women, who give love-drinks, and can skill of charmes and forceries to bewitch and enchant men with, we be-

take thus as we do, unto mercenarie hirelings or slaves, our meats and viands, to be medicined (as it were) and no better than poisoned for to enchant and bewitch us. And admit, that the saying of Aristotles the Philosopher, against adulterers and other lascivious persons, may seeme somewhat with the bitterest; namely: that it made no great matter, which way one went about that beastly worke, whether before or behinde, for that the one was as bad as the other; yet impertinent it is not, nor beside the subject matter which we have in hand. For to say a truth, what difference is there betwene eating of Ragwort, Rogket, and such hot herbs, for to stirre up the lust of the flesh, and to provoke the taste and appetite to meat by smells and saucies? Like as mange and itching places have alwaies need of rubbing and scratching. But peradventure it would be better, to reserve unto another place, our discourse against dishonest fleshly pleasures, and to shew how honest and venerable a thing in it selfe, is continence: for our purpose at this present, is to debarre many great pleasures, otherwise in their owne nature honest: for I assure you, our diseases doe not put us by so many actions, so many hopes, voyages or pastimes, as they deprive us of our pleasures, yea, and marre them quite: and therefore they who love their delights and pleasures most, had least need of any men in the world, to neglect their health. For many there be, who for all they be sicke, have meanes to studie philosophy, and discourse thereof: neither doth their sicknesse greatly hinder them, but that they may be generals in the field to leade annies, yea, and kings (believe me) to governe whole realmes.

But of bodily pleasures and fleshly delights, some there be which during a maladie will never breed; and such as are bred already, yeeld but a small joy, and short contentment, which is proper and naturall unto them, and the same not pure and sincere, but confused, depraved and corrupted with much strange stuffe, yea and disguised and blemished as it were, with some storme and tempest: for the act of Venus is not to any purpose performed upon gourmandise and a full belly, but rather when the bodie is calme, and the flesh in great tranquillity; for that the end of Venus is pleasure, like as of eating also and of drinking; and health unto pleasures, is as much as their faire weather and kinde season, which giveth them secure and gentle breeding, much like as the calme time in winter affords the sea-fowles called Alcyons, a safe cooing, sitting and hatching of their egges. Prodicus is commended for this pretie speech: That fire was the best sauce: and a man may most truly say: That health is of all saucies must divine, heavenly and pleasant: for our viands how delicate soever they be, boiled, roasted, baked or stewed, doe no pleasure at all unto us, so long as wee are diseased, drunken, full of surfeit, or queasie stomacke, as they be who are sea-sicke; whereas a pure and cleane appetite causeth all things to be sweet, pleasant, and agreeable unto sound bodies, yea, and such as they, will be ready to snatch at, as Homer saith. But like as Demades the orator, seeing the Athenians without all reason, desirous of armes and warre, said unto them: That they never treated and agreed of peace, but in their blacke robes, after the losse of kinsfolke and friends; even so wee never remember to keepe a spary and sober diet, but when we come to be cauterized, or to have cataplasmes and plasters about us: we are no sooner fallen to those extremities, but then we are ready to condemn our faults, calling to minde what errors we have committed in times past; for untill then, we blame one while the aire, as most men doe; another while the region or countrey, as unsound and unhollome; we finde fault that we are out of our native soile, and are wonderfull loth to accuse our owne intemperance and disordinate appetites. And as king Lysmachus being constrained and enforced within the country of the Gates for very thirst to yeeld himselfe prisoner, and all his armie captivate unto his enemies; after he had taken a draught of cold water, said: Good God, what a great felicitie have I forgone and lost, for a momentarie and transitory pleasure! even so we may make use thereof, and apply the same unto our selves when wee are sicke, saying thus: How many delights have we marred quite? how many good actions have we fore-let? what honest pastimes have we lost? and all by our drinking of cold water, or bathing unseasonably, or else that we have over-drunke our selves for good fellowship: for the bite &c of such thoughts as these, toucheth our remembrance to the quick, in such sort as the scarce remaineth still behind, after that we are recovered, and maketh us in time of our health more staied, circumspect, and sober in our diet: for a bodie that is exceeding sound and healthy, never bringeth forth vehement desires, and disordinate appetites, hardly to be tamed or withstood; but we ought to make head against them, when they beginne to breake forth and sing out for to enjoy the pleasures which they are affected unto; for such lusts, some complain, pule, and erie for a little, as wanton children doe, and no sooner is the table taken away, but they be quiet and still; neither finde they fault and make complaint of any wrong or injurie offered unto them: but contrariwise, they be pure, jocund, and lightsome, not continuing heave, nor eadie to heave and cast, the next day to an end: like as by report, capitaine Timotheus (having upon a time bene at a fober and frugall scholars supper, in the academic with Plato) said: That they who supped with Plato were merry and well appaied the next day after. It is reported also, that king Alexander the Great when he turned backe those cooks which queene Admetus sent unto him, said: That he had about him all the yeere long better of his owne, namely, for his breakfast or dinner, rising beimes, and marching before day light; and for his supper, eating hark at dinner. I am not ignorant that men otherwhiles are very apt to fall into an ague upon extreme travell, upon excessive heats also and colds: but like as the odors and fents of flowers be weak & feeble of themselves; whereas if they be mixed with some oile, they take force to invigore, even so fulnesse and repletion is the ground, which giveth (as a man would say) bodie and substance unto the outward causes, and occasions of maladies; and of a great quantity of humours there is no danger, because all such indispositions and crudities are sooner overcome, dissipated, and dissolved, when some fine or subtil blood, when some pure spirit (1) doth give them their motion: but where there is a great repletion indeed, and abundance of superfluities, (as it were a deepe and mtrie puddle all troubled and stirred) then there arise from thence many malignant accidents, such as be dangerous and hard to cure: and therefore we are not to doe like some good masters of ships who never thinke their vessels bee fully fraught and charged throughly; and when they have taken in all that ever they can, doe nothing else but worke at the pumpe, void the stoke, and cast out the sea water which is gotten in; even so when we have well filled and stuffed our bodies, fall to purge and cleanse them with medicines and clysters: but we ought rather to keepe the bodie alwaies neat, nimble, and light, to the end, that if it chance otherwise at any time to be pressed and held downe, it might be seene above for lightnesse like unto a peece of corke floating aloft upon the water: but principally we are to beware of the very prece lent indispositions, which are forerunners of maladies: for all diseases walke not (as Hesiodus saith) in silence and say nothing when they come,

As whom wife Jupiter hath bereft

Of voice, and tongue to them none left.

But the most part of the have their vant-curcours as it were, their messengers, & trumpets; namely crudities of stomack, wearinesse and heavinesse over all the bodie. According to the Aphorisme of Hippocrates, lassitudes and laborious heavinesse of the bodie, comming of themselves without any evident cause, prognosticate and fore-signifie diseases; for that as it should seeme, the spirits that should passe unto the nerves and sinewes, are obstructed, stopped, and excluded, by the great repletion of humors: and albeit the bodie it selfe tendeth as it were to the contrary, and pulleth us to our bedde and repose, yet some there be, who for very gluttony and disordinate lust, put themselves into baines & hot-houles, making haste from thence, to drinking house with good fellows, as if they would make provision before-hand of victuals against some long siege of a citie, or feare that the feaver should surprise them fasting, or before they had taken their full dinner: others somewhat more honest, yea & civill than they, are not this way faultie, but being ashamed (fooles as they are) to confesse that they have eaten or drunke overmuch, that they feele any heavinesse in head or cruditie in stomacke, loth also to be knownen for to keepe their chamber all the day long in their night gownes, whiles their companions goe to tennis and other bodily exercises abroad in publicke place, and call them forth to beare their companie, rise up and make them ready to goe with them, cast off their clothes to their naked shame, with others, and put themselves to doe all that men in perfect health are to performe. But the most part of these (induced and drawn on, by hope perswaded) are bold to arise, and to doe hardly after their wonted maner, assisted by a certaine hope, grounded upon a proverbe; as an advocate to defend gormandise, and wanton life, which adviseth them that they should expell wine with wine, drive or digest one surfeit with another. Howbeit, against all such hope, we are to oppose the warie and considerat caution, that Cato speaketh of (which as that wise man saith) doth diminish and lessen great things; and as for small matters it reduceth them to nothing: also that it were better to endure want of meat, and to keepe the bodie emptic and in spight, than so to hazard it, by entering into a baine, or running to an high ordinarie to dine and sup: for if there be some disposition to sicknesse, hurtfull it will be that we have not taken heed, nor contented our selves, but by one secute: if none, dangerous it will not be that we have held in and restrained our selves, and by that restraint made our body so much more pure and cleare. But that childish foole who soever he be, that is afraid to let his friends and those of his owne

house know that he is amisse or ill at ease, for that he hath eaten overmuch, or surfeited with strong drinke, as being ashamed to confesse this day his indigestion, shall be forced to morrow even against his will, to bewray either an inordinate catarrh and fluxe, or an ague, or else some wrings and torments of the belly: thou takest it for a great shame to be knownen that thou didst want or were hungry: but farre greater shame it is to avow cruditie and rawnesse, to bewray heavinesse, proceeding from full diet, and upon repletion of the bodie to be drawn neverthelesse into a baine, as if some rotten vessell or leaking shippe, that would not keepe out water, should be shot into the sea. Certes such persons as these, resemble some failers or sea-faring men, who in the tempestuous time of winter, be ashamed to be seene upon the shore doing nothing: but when they have once weighed anchor, spread saile, and launched into the deepe, and open sea, they are very ill appaied, crying out piteously, and ready to cast up their gorge: even so, they that doubt some sicknesse, or finde a disposition of the bodie ready to fall into it, thinke it a great shame and discredit, to stand upon their guard, one day to keepe their beds and forbear their ordinarie table and accustomed diet: but afterwards with more shame, they are faine to lie by it many daies together, whiles they be driven to take purgations, to applie many cataplasmes, to speake the physicians faire, and fawne upon them, when they would have leave of them to drinke wine or cold water; being so base minded, as to doe absurdly, and to speake many words impertinently, feeling their hearts to faile, and be ready to faint, for the paine they endure alreadie, and the feare they are in to abide more. Howbeit, very good it were to teach and admonish such persons (as otherwise cannot rule and containe themselves, but either yeeld, or be transported and carried away by their lusts) that their pleasures take the most and best part of the bodie for their share. And like as the Lacedaemonians after that they had given vinegar and salt to the cooke, willed him to seeke for therin in the beast sacrificed; even so in a bodie which one would nourish, the best sauces for the meat are these, which are presented unto it, when it is found in health and cleane. For that a dish of meat is sweet or deere, is a thing by it selfe, without the bodie of him who taketh it, and eateth thereof: but for the pleasantnesse or contentment thereof, we ought to have regard unto the body that receiveth it; also for to delight therein, it should be so disposed as nature doth require; for otherwise, if the body be troubled, ill affected, or overcharged with wine, the best devices and sauces in the world will lose their grace, and all their goodnesse whatsoever: and therefore it would not be so much looked unto, whether the fish be new taken, the bread made of pure and fine flower, the bath hot, or the harlot faire and beautifull; as considered precisely, whether the man himselfe have not a lothing stomacke, apt to heave and vomit, be not full of crudities, error, vanity, and trouble: else it will come to passe, that the shall incur the same fault and absurditie that they doe, who after they are drunken, will needs goe in a maske, to plaie and daunce in an house, where they all mourne for the death of the master thereof lately deceased: for in stead of making sport and mirth, this were enough to set all the house upon weeping, and piteous wailing. For even so, the sports of love or Venus, exquisite waunds, pleasant baines, and good wines, in a bodie ill disposed and not according to nature, doe no other good, but stirre, trouble, fleame and cholier in them, who have no settled and compact constitution, and yet be not altogether corrupt; as also they trouble the body, and put it out of tune more than any thing else, yeelding no joy that we may make any reckoning of, nor that contentment which wee hoped and expected. True it is, that an exquisite diet observed streightly and precisely according to rule, and missing not one jot, cansteth not onely the bodie to be thinne, hollow, and in danger to fall into many diseases; but also dulleth all the vigor, and daunteth the cheerefulness of the verie mind, in such sort, as that the suspecteth all things, and feareth continually to stay long as well in delights and pleasures, as in travells and paines; yea, and generally in every action enterprising nothing assuredly and with confidence: whereas we ought to deale by our body, as with the saile of a ship (that is to say) neither to draw it in & keepe it down too straight in time of calme & faire weather, nor to spread and let it out over slacke and negligently, when there is presented some suspicion of a tempest; but as occasion shall require, to spare it, and give some ease and remission, that afterwards it may be fresh and lightsome, as hath bene said already, and not to slacke the time, and stay untill we sensibly feele, crudities, laskes, inflammations; or contrariwise, stupidities and mortifications of members, by which signes (being as it were messengers, and others going before a feaver, which is hard at the dore) hardly will some be so much moved, as to keepe in, and restrain themselves, (no not when the very access and fit is readie to surprise them) but rather long before to be provident, and to prevent a tempest:

*So soone as from some rocke we finde
The puffing gales of northern winde.*

For absurd it is, and to no purpose, to give such careful heed unto the crying wide throates of crows, or to the crawing and cackling of hennes, or to swine, when in a rage they tollie and fling straw about them (as Democritus saith) thereby to gather presages, & prognostications of wind, raine, and stormes; and in the meane time not to observe the motions, troubles, and fiering indispositions of our bodie, nor prevent the same, ne yet to gather undoubted signes of a tempest ready to rife and grow even out thereof. And therefore we ought, not onely to have an eie unto the bodie, for meat and drinke, and for bodily exercises, in observing whether we fall unto them more lazily and unwillingly than our manner was before time; or contrariwise whether our hunger and thirst be more than ordinary; but also wee are to suspect and feare, if our sleepe be not milde, and continued, but broken & interrupted: we must besides, regard our very dreames; namely, whether they be strange and unufuall: for if there be represented extraordinary fanfies and imaginations, they testifie and shew a repletion of grosse, viscous or slimy humours, and a great perturbation of the spirits within. Otherwhiles also it hapneth, that the motions of the soule it selfe, doe fore-signifie unto us, that the body is in some neere danger of disease: for many times men are surprisid with timorous fittes of melancholy, and heartlesse distrusts without any reason or evident cause, the which suddenly extinguish all their hopes: you shall have some upon every small occasion apt to fall into cholerick passions of anger; they become eager and hasty, troubled, pensive and offended with a little thing, inso much as they will be ready to weepe and runne all to teares, yea and languish for griefe and sorrow: And all this cometh, when evil vapours, fowre and bitter fumes ingendered within, doe arise and steeme up, and so (as Plato saith) be intermingled in the waies and passages of the soule. Those persons therefore who are subject to such things, ought to thinke and consider with themselves; that if there be no spirituall cause thereof, it cannot chuse but some corporall matter had need either of evacuation, alteration, or suppression.

Expedient also it is and very profitable for us, when we visit our friends that be sicke, to enquire diligently the causes of their maladies, not upon a cavilling curiosity or vaine ostentation, (to dispute sophistically, and discourse thereof only, or to make a shew of our eloquence, in talking of the instances, the infules, the intercourses, communities of diseases, and all to shew what books we have read, & that we know the words & tearmes of physick;) but to make search and enquire in good earnest, and not slightly or by the way, as touching these slight common and vulgar points, namely; whether the sicke partie be full or emptic? whether he overtravelled himselfe before, or no? and whether he slept well or ill? but principally, what diet he kept? and what order of life he followed, when he fell (for examples sake) into the ague: then (according as Plato was wont to say unto himselfe, whensoever he returned from hearing and seeing the faults that other men committed:) Am not I also such an one? so you must compose and frame your selfe to learne by the harmes and errors of neighbours about you, for to looke well unto your owne health, and by calling them to mind, to be so wary & provident, that you fall not into the same inconveniences, and forced to keepe your bed, and there extol & commend health, as wishing & desiring (when it is too late) for to enjoy so pretious a treasure; but rather (seeing another to have caught a disease) to marke and consider well, yea, and to entertaine this deepe impression in your heart; how deere the said health ought to be unto us, how carefull we should be to preserve, and chary to spare the same. Moreover, it would not be amisse for a man, afterwards to compare his owne life with that of the foresaid patient: for if it fall out so, that (notwithstanding we have used over-liberall diet both in drinks and meats, or laboured extremely, or otherwise committed error in any excesse and disorder) our bodies minister unto nature no suspicion, nor threaten any signe of sicknesse toward; yet ought we nevertheless, to take heed and prevent the harme that may ensue; namely, if we have committed any disorder in the pleasures of Venus and love-delights; or otherwise bene over-travelled, to repose our selves and take our quiet rest; after drunkennesse or carousing wine round for good fellowship, to make amends and recompense with drinking as much colde water for a time; but especially, upon a surfeit taken with eating heave and grosse meats, and namely, of flesh, or els feeding upon sundry and divers dishes, to fast or use a sparie diet, so as there be left no superfluitie in the bodie: for even these things, as of themselves alone (if there were no more) be enough to breed diseases; so unto other causes they adde matter and minister more strength. Full wisely therefore was it said by our ancients in old time, that for to maintaine our health, these three points were most expedient:

ent: To feed without fatietie: To labour with alacritie: and To preserve and make spare of naturall seed. For surely lascivious intemperance in venerie of all things, most decayeth and enfeebleth the strength of that naturall heat, whereby our meat and food which we receive is concocted, and so consequently is the cause of many excrescences and superfluities engendered, whereupon corrupt humours are engendered and gathered within the body.

To begin therefore to speake againe of every of these points; let us consider first the exercises meet and agreeable to students or men of learning: for like as he who first said: That he wrote nothing of Teeth to those that inhabited the sea coasts, taught them (in so saying) the use of them; even so a man may say unto scholars and men of learning: That he writeth nothing unto them as touching bodily exercises; for that the daily practise of the voice by speech and pronunciation, is an exercise woonderfull effectually, not onely for health, but also for strength, I meane not such as is procured to wrestlers and champions by art, which breedeth brawne carnositie, and causeth the skin to be firme and fast without forth (like unto an house which to the outward shew is rough-cast or thick coated with lime or plaster;) but that which maketh a tough constitution and a vigorous firmitude and strength indeed, in the noblest parts within, and the principall instruments of our life. Now, that the spirits augment & confirme the powers of our bodie, the anointers of mens bodies in the place of publicke exercise know full well, when they give order and command the wrestlers and such like, when their limmes are rubbed, to withstand such frictions in some sort, in holding their winde, observing precisely, and having an eie to each part of the body that is handled or rubbed. The voice therefore (being a motion of the spirit (fortified, not superficially and by starts, but even in the proper fountaines and springs which are about the vitall bowels) encrease the naturall heat) doth subtiliate the blood, cleanse the veines, openeth all the arteries, not suffering any obstruction, oppilation or stopping by superfluous humours to grow upon us or remaine behinde (like unto dregs or grounds) in the bottome of those vessels which receive and concoct those viands whereof we are nourished: by reason whereof, they have need to use ordinarily this exercise, and make it familiar unto them, by speaking in publicke place and discoursing continually. But it haply they doubt that their bodies be but weak, and not able to support and endure so much travell, yet at leastwise they are to reade with a loud voice; for looke what proportion there is betwene gellation or carriage of the body, and the exercise thereof upon the very ground, the same is betwene simple reading and discoursing or open disputation: for this reading doth gently stirre and mildly carrie the voice by the chariot (as it were) and litter of another mans speech; but disputation addeth thereto a certaine heat and forcible vehemence; for that the minde and the bodie conspire and concur together in that action: howbeit, in this exercise we must beware of over-loud vociferations and clamours; for such violent straining of the voice, and unequall extensions and intensions of the winde, many times cause some rupture of veines, or inward spasmes and convulsions. Now when a student hath either read or discoursed in this manner, good it is for him before he walke abroad, to use some unctuous, warme and gentle frictions, to handle and rub the skinn and flesh after a soft and milde maner; yea, and as much as he can, to reach into the very bowels within, that the spirits may be spread and distributed equally thorowout, even to the verie extremities of the bodie. In these rubbings and frictions, this gage & measure would be observed; that he continue them so long and so often, as he findeth them to agree sensibly with his bodie, and bring no offence with them. He that in this wise hath appeased & settled the trouble or tension of the spirits in the center of the bodie, if haply there should remaine some superfluitie behinde, it would do him no great harme: for say, that he should forbear walking, for want of leisure or by occasion of sudden businesse, it is all one, and it maketh no matter; for why, nature hath had already that which is sufficient, and standeth satisfied therewith. And therefore a man is not to pretend colourably for to excuse his silence, or forbearance of reading either navigation, when he is accompanied with other passengers at sea in one ship, or his abode and sojourning in an hostlerie or common inne, although all the companie there should mocke him for it: for as it was no shame nor dishonest thing, to eat before them all; no more unseemly is it to exercise himselfe in their presence by reading. But rather more undecent it were, to be afraid or stand in awe of mariners, muliters or inne-keepers, when they laugh at you, not for playing at ball alone, or fighting with your own shadow, but for speaking before the in your speech, either teaching, or discoursing, or els learning by roat and rehearsing some good thing for your exercise. Socrates was wont to say: That for him who would moove and stirre his bodie by way of dancing, a little roome (that would receive seven settles or seats) was sufficient & big enough; but but him that mindeth to exercise his body either by singing or saying, every place will serve, whether he stand, lie or sit. Only this must we take heed of, that we straine not our voice nor set out an open throat, when we are privie to our selves that we have eaten or drunke liberally, ne yet presently after the company of a woman, or any other wearisome travel whatsoever, as many of our orators & great masters of rhetoricke use to do; who enforce and give themselves to declaim and pronounce their orations too loud, even above the strength of their bodie; some for vainglory and ambition, because they would put forth themselves; others for reward and to get a fee, or els upon emulation to their concurrents. Thus did Niger, (a friend of ours) who professed rhetoricke in Galatia: this man having swallowed downe a fish-bone which stucke still in his throat (when another rhetorician travelling that way, chanced to make a publike oration; for that he was ashamed to be thought his inferior, and yet durst not deale with him in that facultie) would needs shew himselfe in open place, and declaim, whiles the said bone remained still in his throat: but by this meanes there ensued a dangerous and painfull inflammation; and being no longer able to endure the dolorous anguish thereof, he suffered himselfe to be launced without forth, and to have a deepe incision and a wide orifice made, whereby the bone indeed was plucked out, but the wound was so grievous, and oppressed besides with a descent and defluxion of theumaticke humours thither, that he died thereof. But haply, better to the purpose it were, to speake of this hereafter. Well, after exercise to go presently into the bath, & to wash in colde water, were the part of a lusty wild-braine and a giddy-headed youth, who will needs in a bravery shew what he can do, rather than holloome any way: for all the good that such colde baths bring, is this, that they seeme to harden the body, and confirme it so, as it is lesse subject to take offence by the qualities of the aire without; but surely they do more harme within, by a great deale; for that they enclose and shut up the pores of the body, causing the humors and humorsities which would evaporate and breathe forth continually, to become thicke and grosse. Furthermore, needfull it is for them that love to bathe thus in colde water, to fall into the subjection of that over-straight and exquisite diet (which we would avoid) having evermore an eye upon this, not to breake the fume in any point whatsoever, for that the least fault and smallest error in the world, is presently fore chasticed and costeth full deere: whereas contrariwise to enter into the baine, and wash in hote water, pardoneth us, and holdeth us excused for many things; for it doth not so much diminish the strength and force of the bodie, as it bringeth profit another way for the health thereof; framing and applying most gently and kindly the humors to concoction: and in case there be some which can not well and perfectly be digested, (so they be not altogether cruide and raw, nor float aloft in the mouth of the stomacke) it causeth them to dissolve and exhale without any sence of paine; yea, and withall, it doth mitigate and cause to vanish and passe away the secret lassitudes of the musculous members. And yet as good as banes be, if we perceive the bodie to be in the naturall state and disposition, firme and strong enough, better it were to intermit and for-let the use of baths; and in stead thereof, I holde it holstomer to anoint and rub the bodie before a good fire, namely, if it have need to be chafed and set in an heat; for by this meanes there is dispersed into it as much heat as is requist, and no more; which cannot be against the sunne; for of his heat a man can not take more or lesse at his owne discretion, but according as he affecteth or tempereth the aire, so he affourdeth his use. And thus much may serve for the exercise of students.

To come now unto their food and nouriture: if the reasons and instructions before delivered, by which we learne to restraine, repress and mitigate our appetites, have done any good, time it were to proceed forward to other advertisements; but in case they be so violent, so unruly and untamed, as if they were newly broken out of prison, that it is an hard piece of worke to range them within the compasse of reason; and if it be a difficult piece of worke to wrestle with the bellie, which (as Cato was wont to say) hath no cares; we must worke another feat and device with it; namely, by observing the quality of the viands, to make the quantity more light and lesse offensive: and if they be such as be solid and nourish much; as for example, grosse flesh meats, choefce, drie figges, and hard egges, they must feed of them as little as they can; for to refuse and forbear them altogether were very hard; but they may be more bold to eate heartily of those that be thinne and light, such as are the most part of worts, or pot-herbes, birdes, and fishes, that be not fatte & oleous: for in eating of such meats, a man may at once both gratifie his appetite, and also never overcharge his bodie; but above all, take heed they must of crudities and fustits, proceeding from liberal eating of flesh-meats; for besides that they lode the stomacke presently as they are taken, there remaine afterwards behind naughtie reliques; and therefore therefore it were verie well, that they accustomed their bodies never to call for flesh, considering that the earth it selfe bringeth forth other kinds of food, sufficiently not only for the necessitie of nourishment, but also for pleasure and the contentment of the appetite; for some of them are ready to be eaten without any dressing, or the helpe of mans hand, others being mingled and compounded after divers sorts to make them more lavorite and toothsome. But for as much as custome (after a sort) is a second nature, or at leastwise not contrarie to nature; we must not accustome our selves to feed on flesh, for to fulfill our appetites, after the maner of wolves, & lions, but use it onely as the foundation and ground of other viands; which being once laid, we are to make our principall nourishment of other eates and dishes, which as they are more appropriate to our bodies, and suitable to nature, so they doe increasse and dull lesse the vigor and subtiltie of the spirit, and the discouraging reasonable part of the soule, which is kindled, mainteined, and set to burne cleere, by a more delicate and light matter. As touching liquid things, they must use milke, not as an ordinarie drinke, but as a strong meat that nourisheth exceeding much: but for wine, we are to say to it, as Euripides did to Pentus:

Welcome to me in measure and in measure,

Too much is naught: yet doe not leave me cleane.

for of all drinks it is most profitable, of medicines most pleasant, and of daintie viands most harmeless; provided alwaies that it be well delaid and tempered with opportunity of the time, rather than with water. And verily water (not that onely wherewith wine is mingled, but also which is drunke betwene whiles, apart by it selfe) causeth the wine tempered therewith to do the lesse harme: in regard whereof, a student ought to use himselfe to drinke twice or thrice every day a draught of cleere water, for that it will enfeeble the headinesse of the wine, & make the usuall drinking of pure water, more familiar to the stomacke: and this I would have to be done, to this end, that if they be driven perforce to drinke faire water, they might not thinke it strange, nor be ready to refuse it. For many there be, who oftentimes have recourse to wine, when wisly they had more need to runne to the water; and namely, when they be over-heat with the sunne: yea, and contrariwise, when they be stiffe frozen with cold, or have strained themselves to speake much, or studied and sitten hard at their booke; and generally, after that they have travelled fore, till they be wearie, or have performed some vehement exploit, or violent exercise; then (I say) they thinke, that they ought to drinke wine; as if nature herselfe required and called for some contentment and refreshing of the bodie, and some change and alteration after travels: but nature verily is not desirous to have any good done to her in this sort, if you call such pleasure a doing of good; but the demandeth onely a reduction to a meane betwene labour and rest: and therefore such persons as these, are to be cut short and abridged of their victuals, and either to be debarrd quite of all wine, or else enjoined to drinke it well delaid with water: for wine being of it selfe of a violent and stirring nature, augmenteth and maketh more unquiet the stormie perturbations arising within the body, it doth irritate and dissemper more and more the parts therein already offended and troubled; the which had much more need to be appeased and dulced; to which purpose water serveth passing well: for if we otherwise being not a thirst, drinke hot water after we have laboured, or done some painfull exercise, in the exceeding heats of the summer; we finde a notable cooling, refreshing, and easement in our inward bowels; the reason is; because the humiditie of water is kinde and milde, procuring no debate or disquietnesse at all; whereas the moisture of wine hath a vehement force, which never is at quiet and repose, but maketh a deepe impression, nothing agreeable nor fit to appease the indispositions that are a breeding. Now if one doe feare the lowe and sharpe acrimonies, and the bitter tastes which (by the saying of some) hunger and want of food engender in our bodies, or as little children use to do, thinketh much not to sit at the table for to eat, a little before the fit of an ague, or when he suspecteth it coming: the drinking of water is as it were a confine and frontier betwene both, very fit to remedie the one and the other: and many times we offer unto Bacchus himselfe certaine sacrifices called Nephelia, for that there is no wine used therein; accustoming our selves wisly thereby not to be alwaies desirous for to drinke wine. Minos tooke away from sacrifices, the flute, and the chaplets used to be worne on mens heads, in regard of griefe and sorrow: and yet we know full well, that the heave and sorrowfull minde, is neither by flutes nor flowers, passionate; whereas there is not the bodie of a man, (how strong and stout forever he be) but if it be stirred, troubled, and enlisted, will take more harme and offence by wine if it be taken or powred into it. It is recorded in the Chronicles; that the Lydians in time of a great dearth and famine, did eat but once in two daies, and spent the time betwene, at dice-play, and other such games and pastimes; and even to it were well beleeving a student and lover of the Muses and his booke, at such a time as he had need to make a late and short supper, to have before him, the figure serving for some Geometrical proposition, or some little booke, some harpe or lute; this will not suffer him to be ledde as prisoner to his owne belly, but by diverting and turning ordinarily his mind from the board, to these honest pastimes and recreations; will chase away from the Muses the greedy appetite of eating and drinking, as if they were so many ravenous fowles and harpies: For a shame it were that a Scythian while hee is drinking, should estoones take his bow in hand ready bent, and twang the string, and by the sound thereof, awaken and quicken his courage, which otherwise would become drowsie, loose, and dull by wine: and that a Grecian should be ashamed or afraid of a stout or mocke, in assaying gently to refrain and bridle an unreasonable, violent, and greedy appetite, by the means of bookes and writings: for much after the same manner in a comedie of Menander, when there was a baud, who for to tempt certaine young men sitting at supper together, brought in amongst them certaine pretie young wenches, very faire, & richly arrayed; every one of the said young men (because they were afraid & unwilling to looke those beautifull damosels in the face) made no more adoe, but as he faith,

*Cast downe the head, and like good merrie mates,
Fall to their jankets hard, and deintie cates.*

Moreover, men that are addicted to their studie, and to learning, have many other proper and pleasant means to turne away their eyes, and divert their minds, if otherwise they be not able to looke off; and to stay or hold in, this violent and dogge-like greedy appetite, when the meat standeth before them upon the board. For as touching the speeches of some masters of welters, or the words of certaine schoole-masters, who goe up and downe, saying: That to reason, argue, and discourse at the table upon points of learning; causeth the meat to corrupt within the stomacke, and breedeth head-ach, or heaviness of the braine: we may indeed feare somewhat; if we will needs (while we be at our repast) fall to resolve such a sophistical argument, as the Logicians call Indos: or if wee be disposed to reason and dispute about the matterfull sophisme named Kyriton: It is said, that the crowne or upmost tuft growing upon the date tree, called the braine thereof, is exceeding sweet and pleasant to the taste, howbeit, hurtfull to the head: howbeit, these prickie and intricate disputations in Logicke at supper time, are no pleasant banquetting dishes, but offensive to the braine, tedious, and irksome, nothing more. But if those men will not permit us to discourse, to heare, reade, or talke of other matters in supper time, which together with honestie and profit, have an attractive pleasure and sweetness joined therewith: we will desire them to let us alone, & not trouble us, but to arise from the table, and goe their waies into their galleries and halls for wrestling, and there to hold and maintaine such positions among their scholars and champions, whom they withdraw and turne away from the study of good letters; and accustoming them to spend their time all the day long in scoffes and scurrile speeches, they make them in the end (as gentle Ariston said) as wilde, and without sense (yet glib and well greased) as the stone pillars which support those galleries, and places of exercise where they use to converse and keepe schoole. But we contrariwise being ruled by the physicians, who advise us alwaies to interpose some competent time betwene supper and sleepe, are not presently to go unto it, after we have filled our bellies with viands, and stuffed our spirits, even while the morsels of meat bee all raw, or beginning now to be concocted, thereby to hinder and staie digestion; but give some space and breathing time betwene, untill the meat bee well setled in the stomacke. And as they who give us counsell to moove and stirre the bodie after meales, will us not to runne our selves out of breath, nor to exercise our selves so, as that we put all the parts of our bodie to the triall, after the manner of the Pancrasts; but either to walke faire and softly, or to daunce after a gentle and easie manner; seembly, we are to thinke, that we ought to exercise our wits and minds after a dinner or supper, not about any affaires of deepe studie, and profound meditation, nor in sophistical disputes, tending to the ostentation of a quicke and lively spirit, or which bee litigious, and breed contention; but there be many questions besides of naturall philosophie, pleasant to be discussed, and easie to be decided; many pretie tales and narrations there are, out of which a man may draw good considerations and wise instructions, for to traine and frame our manners; and these containe that grace & facilitie in them, which the poet Homer calleth Menoikes, that is to say, yielding to anger, and in no wise croffe and resistant: Heereupon it is, that some doe pleasantly traine this exercise of mooving, propounding & relolving historically or poetically ons; the second course or the service of banquetting dishes, for students and learned men. Moreover, there be other sorts of pleasant talke besides these, and namely; to heare and recite fables, devised for mirth and pleasure; discourses of playing upon the flute, harpe, or lute, which many times give more contentment and delight, than to heare the flute, harpe, or lute it selfe played upon. Now the very precise time measured as it were and marked out to be most proper and meet for such recreations; is when we feele that our meat is gently gone downe, and setled quietly in the bottome of the stomacke, shewing some signe of concoction, and that naturall heat is strong, and hath gotten the upper hand.

Now forasmuch as Aristotle is of opinion, that walking after supper doth stirre up and kindle (as one would say) our naturall heat: and to sleepe immediately after a man hath supped, doth dull and quench it: considering also, that others be of a contrary minde, and hold; that rest and repose, is better for concoction; that motion so soone after, troubleth and impeacheth the digestion and distribution of the meats, which is the cause that some use to walke after supper, others sit still and take their ease: me thinks a man may reconcile and satisfie verie well after a sort these two opinions; who cherishing and keeping his bodie close and still after supper, setteth his mind a walking, awakeneth it, suffering it not to be heavie & idle at once by and by; but sharpeneth and quickeneth his spirits, as is before said, by little and little, in discoursing, or hearing discourses of pleasant matters and delectable, such as be not biting in any wise, nor offensive and odious.

Moreover, as touching vomits or purgations of the bellie by laxative medicines, which are the curied and detestable easements and remedies of fulnesse and repletion; surely they would never be used but upon right great and urgent necessitie: a contrary course to many men, who fill their gorges and bodies with an intent to void them soone after; or otherwise, who purge and empty the same for to fill them againe, even against nature; who are no lesse troubled, nay much more offended ordinarily, by being fedde and full, than fasting and empty: inasmuch as such repletion is an hinderance to the contentment and satisfying of their appetites and lusts; by occasion whereof, they take order alwaies, that their bodie may be evermore emptied; as if this voidance were the proper place and feat of their pleasures. But the hurt and damage that may grow upon these ordinary purgations and vomits, is very evident; for that both the one and the other, put the body to exceeding great straines and violent disturbances. As for vomiting, it bringeth with it one inconvenience by it selfe, more than the former, in that it procureth & augmenteth an unsatiable greedinesse to meat: for ingendered there is by that means a violent & turbulent hunger (like as when the course or stream of a river, hath bene for a while stopped & staid) snatching or greedy at meat, which is evermore offensive, & not a kind appetite indeed, when as nature hath need of meat; but resembling rather the inflammations occasioned by medicines or cataplasmes. Heereupon it is that the pleasures proceeding from thence, passe and slippe away incontinently, as abortive and imperfect, accompanied with inordinate pantings and beatings of the pulse, great wrings in the enjoying of them, and afterwards ensue dolorous tensions, violent oppressions or stoppings of the conduits & pores, & the reliques or retentions of ventosities; which staie not for naturall ejections and evacuations, but runne up and downe all over our bodies, like as if they were shippes furcharged, having more need to be eased of their burden, than still to be laden with more excrements. As for the troublesome motions of the belly and guts, occasioned by purgative drogues, they corrupt, spill and resolve the naturall strength of the solide parts, so that they engender more superfluitie within than they thrust out and expel. And this is foral the world, like as if a man, being discontented to see within his native citie a multitude of naturall Greekes inhabitants, should for to drive them out, fill the same with Scythians or Arabian strangers. For even so, some there be, who (greatly miscounting and deceiving themselves) for to send forth of their bodies the superfluous humors which are in some sort domesticall and familiar unto them, put into them I wot not what, Guadian graines, Scammoni and other strange drogues fer from farre countries, such as have no familiar reference to the bodie, but are meere wilde and savage, and in truth have more need to be purged and chased out of the body themselves, than power and vertue to void away and expell that wherewith nature is choked and overcharged. The best way therefore is, by sobrietie and regular diet, to keepe the bodie alwaies in that moderate measure of evacuation and repletion, that it may be able by proportionable temperature, to maintaine it selfe, without any outward helpe. But if it fall out otherwhiles, that there be some necessitie of the one or the other; vomits would be provoked without the helpe of strange physicall drogues, and not with much adoe adsoo and curiositie, that they disquiet & trouble no parts within, but onely for to avoid cruditie and indigestion, reject and cast up that gentle which is too much, and cannot be prepared and made meet for concoction. For like as linnen clothes that bee scoured and made cleane with sopes, ashes, lees and other absterfiv matters, weare more and fret out sooner than such as be washed simply in faire water; even so, vomites provoked by medicines, offend the body much more, and marre the complexion. But say, the belly bee bound and coltive, there is not a drouge that easeth it so mildly, or provoketh it to the sieg so easily, as doe certaine meats, whereof the experience is familiar unto us, and the use nothing dolorous and offensive. Now in case the body be so heard, that such kinde viands will not worke and cause it to be solible, then a man ought for many daies together, to drinke thinne and cold water, or use to fast, or else take some clister, rather than purgative medicines, such as disquiet the body, and overthrow the temperature thereof. And yet many there be, who ever and anon are ready to run unto them; much like unto those lewd and light wanton women, who use certaine medicines to cause abortion, or to send away the fruit which they have newly conceived; to the end that they might conceive soone againe, and have more pleasure in that fleshy action. Now is it time to say no more, but to let them goe that perswade such evacuations.

As for those on the contrary side, who interiect certaine exact, precise, and criticall fastings, observed too straightly according to just periods and circuits of daies: surely they teach nature, (wherein they doe not well) to use abstinction before it have need; and acquaint her with a necessarie abstinance of food, which in it selfe is not necessarie, even at a prefixed time, which 20 calleth for that then, whereto it is accustomed. Better yet it were, for a man to use these chastiments of his body, freely and at his owne liberty, without any foreknowledge of suspition: and as for other diet, (as hath beene said before) to order it so, that it may frame and be obsequient to all manner of occurrences & changes that shall come betwene, and not to be tied and bound to one forme and manner of life, exactly to keepe certaine daies, just numbers, and set circuits, without failing or missing in any jot. For this course is neither sure, nor easie; it is not 30 civill nor yet agreeable to humanitie: it resembleth rather the life of an oyster, or some stocke of a tree; to captivate himselfe, and be so subject and thrall, that he cannot change or alter his viands; he may not once varie in his fastings and abstinencies, in his motions or repose, but continue alwayes close and covert in a shade kinde of life, idle, private to himselfe, without 40 conversing with friends, without participation of honors, farre remote from the administration of weale publicke, which were to shut himselfe up as it were a close prisoner; a life I assure you which I cannot like nor allow: for wee cannot buie our health with idleness and doing naught; which two are the principall inconveniences incident unto diseases: and all one this were, as if a man would thinke to preserve his eyes, by not employing them to see; or his voice, by speaking not at all; thus to be perswaded, that for the preservation of health it were necessarie to have continuall repose, without doing ought: for a man in health, cannot doe better for 50 to maintaine the same, than to be employed in many good duties, and commendable offices of humanitie. An absurd error therefore it is, to thinke idleness to be either healthy or holosome, considering that it destroyeth the very end of health, which is employment: neither is it true, that the lesse men doe, the more healthfull they be. For Xenocrates had not his health better than Phocion; nor Theophrastus than Demetrius; and as for Epicurus and all the crew of his sectaries, they had no benefit at all for the attaining of that contentment and tranquillitie of the bodie which they make so great reckoning of, and praise so highly; by flying and avoiding all State affaires, and meddling in no publicke and honorable office. Other meanes therefore and provision would be made, to entercaine and keepe that disposition and habitude of the bodie, which is according to nature: for this is certaine; that all sorts of life be capable, as well of sickness as of health. Howbeit, politicians (quoth he) and States-men are to be adonished to doe cleane contrary unto that which Plato advertised his yong scholars to doe. For Plato ever as he went out of the schoole, was wont thus to say unto them: Goe to my sonnes, see 60 you employ that leisure which you have, in some honest sports and pastimes. But wee may exhort and put in minde those who deale in the administration of common-wealth, to bestow their labour and travell in honest and necessarie things, and not to overtoile and spend their bodies in small matters of little or no consequence; as the manner is of most men, who trouble and torment themselves about just nothing, overwatching, running to and fro, heere and there, up and downe about things which many times are neither good nor honest; but onely because they would disgrace and shame others, either upon envie that they beare unto them, or or upon obstinate and wilfull selfe-conceit, or else to pursue and maintaine some vaine and foolish opinions that they have taken. For I thinke verily it was in regard of such persons especially, that Demetrius said: If the body should call the soule judiciously into question upon an action of injurie or wrong done, and for to make satisfaction of losse and damage; the were not able to answer it, but must needs confesse the action, and be condemned. And Theophrastus peradventure said well and truly; when speaking by a metaphor or allegorie; he affirmed, that the soule paid a deere rent for her dwelling within the body. For (I assure you) the bodie may thanke the soule for many harmes that it susteineth; when as she useth it not with reason, nor in-treateth it according as it is meet and convenient; and looke when she hath any proper and peculiar passions of her owne, or some enterprises and actions to be performed, she maketh no 10 spare of the poore bodie. As for the tyrant Solon, hee was wont (I wot not upon what reason or ground) to say: That he ought to deale unjustly in small matters, who would be just in the greatestt affaires; and even so, wee may well advise a man of State and government, to make no reckoning of trifling things, but disport, play, and solace himselfe in repose with them; if he would not have his bodie over-spent, dull, or lazie, against the time that he should employe it in great and important causes: much like to an old shippe which hath beene drawn up to land, for to be newly calked and trimmed, after it hath rested a time, is fit to doe new service at sea; for even so, the bodie upon repose and ease, whensoever the soule shall put it to any affaires, will be ready to follow

Hard by the damme, and never parts her fro.*

And therefore when occasions will permit and give leave, wee are to refresh and recreate our selves, not envying the bodies naturall sleepe, or usuall repose and refection of dinner, the yet easement and recreation, which is of a middle nature betwene pleasure and paine, nor observing a strict rule; which many men doe keepe, and in keeping it, spill and spend the bodie by sudden mutations; like as iron that is often made hot and quenched againe: for whensoever the body is soiled and tired with travells, then they will even melt and dissolve it in excessive and unmeasurable pleasures: and all upon the sudden againe, when it is weakened & enfeebled with the delights of Venus, or by drinking out of course, they will draw and drive it presently to the ferious travels of the common hall or the court, to the solliciting and following of some affaires 30 of great importance, which requireth earnest attendance and hot pursuit. Heracitus the philosopher, being fallen into a drop sic, willed his physician to make drougt of great raine. But most men ordinarily doe fault herein exceeding much: now when they be wearied, toiled, and soiled with painfull labours and wants, yeeld their bodies to be melted and spent quite with voluptuous pleasures; and afterwards againe, wrest and straine them as it were upon the reinters, immediately upon the fruition of some pleasures. For nature verily neither liketh nor requirerh these alterations and sudden changes by turnes: but it is the incontincencie and illiberall lasciviousnesse of the soule, and nothing else, that abandoneth her selfe inordinately unto pleasures and delights, so soone as it is out of laborious exercises; like as mariners and sailors doe at sea. 40 And contrariwise, immediately after sports & pleasures, betaketh it selfe to the eager pursuit of gaine, & to the management of great affaires; giving no time and space of rest to nature, to enjoy repose and quiet tranquillitie, wherof it hath need, but setteth it out of frame, and discompereth it mightily, by reason of this inequalitye. But wise and discreet persons are verie wary and carefull in this behalfe; never presenting such pleasures to their bodies when they be out-wearied with labour and travell, for need thereof they have none at all; and besides, they doe not regard nor thinke upon them, having their mindes continually intentive upon the honestie and decency of the action or thing whereabout they are; dulling or dimming as well the joy, as the earnest sollicitude and care of their minde, by the meanes of other desires and appetites; as it is written of Epaminondas, that he should say in game and merriment, of a certaine valiant man, 50 who about the time of the Leuctrique warre, died of sickness in his bedde: O Hercules, how had this man any leisure to die, amidst so many important affaires! even so it may be said truly and in good earnest of a great personage, who hath in his hand the managing of some weightie affaires in matter of government, or treatise of philosophie: How should such a man as he have time either to be drunken, or to surfeit with gluttonie, or given himselfe to fleshy pleasures of the body? But wise men indeed, when they be freed from important matters of action, can finde a time to rest and repose their bodies, discharging them of needlesse and unprofitable travels, but much more of superfluous and unnecessarie pleasures, flying and shunning them as enemies and contrarie to nature.

I remember that upon a time I heard, how Tiberius Caesar was wont to say: That a man being once above three-score yeres of age deserveth to be mocked and derided, if he put forth his hand unto the physician for to have his pulse felt. For mine owne part, I take this speech of his to bee somewhat too proud and insolent; but me thinks this should be true: That every man ought to know the particularities and properties of his owne pulse, for there bee many diversities and differences in each one of us: also that it behooveth no man to be ignorant in the severall complexion of his owne bodie, as well in heat as in drinesse: also to be skillfull what things be good for him, and what be hurtfull, when he useth them: for he that would learne these particularities of any other than of himselfe, or goeth to a physician to know of him, whether he be better in health in summer time than in winter; or whether hee stand better affected in taking dry things rather than moist; also whether naturally he have a strong pulse or a weake, a quick or a slow; surely hath no sense or feeling of himselfe, but is as it were deafe and blinde, a stranger he is dwelling in a borrowed body, and none of his owne: for such points as those, are good to be known and easie to be learned; for that we may make proofe thereof every how, as having the body with us continually.

Also meet it is, among meats and drinks, to know those rather which be good and holosome for the stomack, than such as be pleasant to the tooth; and to have experience of that which doth the stomack good, more than of that which is offensive thereto; as also of those things that do not trouble and hinder concoction, than which content and tickle the taste. For to demand of a physician, what is easie of digestion, and what not; what doth loose, and what bindeth the belly; me thinks is no lesse shamefull than to ask him, what is sweet; what bitter; what fowre, tart or austere. But now we shall have many folke, that know well how to find fault with their cooks and dressers of meat, for seasoning their broths, or making sauce to their viands, being able to discern which is sweeter than it ought to be; which is over-tart or too much salted: and yet they themselves are not able to say, whether that which is put into the bodie and united therewith, be light or no; and whether it be harmlesse, nor offensive, or profitable. Hereupon it is, that their pottage misleth not often, the right seasoning; whereas contrariwise, for want of well seasoning their owne selves, but daily faulting therein, they make much worke for physicians: for they esteeme not that pottage best, which is the sweetest, but they mingle therewith many sharpe juices and fowre herbs, to make it somewhat tart withall; but contrariwise, they send into the bodie all maner of sweet and pleasant things, even untill it cry, Ho; partly being ignorant, and in part not calling to minde and remembrance, that nature adjoineth alwaies unto things that be good and holosome, a pleasure not mingled with displeasure and repentance. Moreover, we are likewise to remember and beare in minde, all those things that be fit and agreeable to the bodie; or contrariwise, in the changes of the seasons in the yere, in the qualities and properties of the aire, and other circumstances, to know how to accommodat and apply our diet accordingly: for as touching all the offences proceeding from nigardise, avarice and pinching, which the common sort doe incurre about the painfull innings and laborious bestowing or laying up of their come and fruits; who by their long watchings, by their running and trudging to and fro, discover and bewray what is within the bodie, rotten, faulty & ulcerous: we are not to feare, that such accidents will befall to learned persons or students, ne yet to States-men and politicians, unto whom principally I have addressed this discourse; but they ought to beware and eschue another kinde of more eager covetousnesse and illiberall nigardise in matter of studie and literature, forcing them to neglect and not regard their owne poore bodies, which often times being so travelled and outworn, that they can doe them no more service, yet they spare them never the more, nor give them leave to be refreshed and gather up their crummes againe; but force that which is fraille and mortall, to labour a vie with the foule, which is immortall; that (I say) which is earthly, to hold out with the spirit, that is heavenly. Well, the ox laid unto the camell his fellow-servant, who would not ease him a little of his burden: Thou wilt not helpe me now to beare somewhat of my charge; but shortly thou shalt carie all that I carie, and me besides: which fell out so indeed, when the ox died under his burden; semblably it hapneth to the foule, which will not allow the fillie bodie (worned and tired) some little time of rest and repose: for soone after comes a fever, head-ach, dizziness of the braine, with a dimnesse of the sight, which will compell her to lay aside all books, to abandon all good letters, disputations and studie; and in the end is driven to languish and lie sicke in bed together with it for company. And therefore Plato wisely admonisheth us, not to move and exercise the body without the soule, nor the soule without the body, but to drive them both together equally, as if they were two steeds drawing at one spire of a chariot; and especially at such a time, when as the body is builed with the foule, and laboureth together with her, we ought to have the most care of it, and to allow it that attendance & cherishment, which is meet and requisite, to the end, that thereby we may requite it with good and desireable health; esteeming this to be the greatest benefit and most singular gift that proceedeth thereupon, in that neither the one nor the other (for default of good disposition) is impeached or hindered in the knowledge of vertue and the practise thereof, as well in literature as in the actions of mans life.

OF THE ROMANS FORTUNE.

The Summarie.

Never there were any Statepolitike, in the rising growth and declination whereof, we are to see & acknowledge the admirable providence of God, together with the strength and wisdom of man, certes the Romane empire ought to be set in the foremost ring. The causes of the foundation and advancement of this great Monarchie, are otherwise considered by those whom the heavenly truer (revealed in the holy Scripture) doth illuminate, than by the Pagans and Sages of this world, guided onely by the discourse of their reason, corrupted with Sinne and ignorance of the true God. For when the question is, as touching the government of the universall world, although the sovereign Lord thereof, use often times, the spirit uall and corporal vigor both of mortall men, for to execute his will; yet we may behold above it, and before any exploit of visible instruments, this great and incomprehensible wisdom of his; who having decreed in himselfe all things, executeth every moment his deliberations; so that in regard of him, there is nothing as small, but all keepe a course according to his determinate and resolute will: but in respect of us, many things be accidentall; for that the counsels of that eternall and immutable wisdom are hidden from us, and appeare not but by little and little. Infidels and miscreants, who are not able to comprehend this secret, have imagined and set downe for governances of mans life, Fortune and Vertue; meaning by Fortune, that which the common saying compriseth in these few words: In this world there is nothing els but good lucke and a bad; but so, as if any man could skill how to manage his owne fortune, he might make it of bad, good and commodious: and this they meant by the word Vertue, which is an habitude or disposition of the mind and body; by the means whereof, he that is indited therewith, might prevent and overthrow quite all the assaults of Fortune. Some there be, who abuse the word Fortune, for to abolish the providence of God; and others have attributed so much unto Vertue, that they have set man out of those limits, in which his owne proper nature, and above all the divine truth, placed him. Others againe, have ascribed some thing unto Fortune, and yet they neither understand nor declare what it importeth, but have given out (although very irresolutely) that Fortune cannot give the check to a vertuous man. If we had this treatise following entire and perfect, all the ancient philosophie and learning, as touching this question, had bene manifestly discovered unto us. But the principall part of this discourse is lost, in such sort, as Plutarch (having brought in Fortune and Vertue disputing upon this point: Whether of them should have the honour of the foundation and maintenance of the Romane empire?) hath left unto us nothing but the plea of Fortune; who by divers reasons and proofs holdeth that the wisdom & valour of the people of Rome, was not the cause of their grandence, but Fortune, that is to say (as he exprestly sheweth in one place) the guidance and helpe of God, who hath so raised his estate for many others, and for to hold one good part of the world jointly in one body, under such a chiefe and sovereigne. As concerning the reasons alledged in the favor and maintenance of Fortune, they be marked in order, and drawn out well at large: where as those of Vertue are omitted, or peradventure referred to the judgement and discretion of the reader, for to invent, devise, and apply them by himselfe.

selfe, and of them all to collect and gather one conclusion, tending to this, for to shew the great wonders of Gods providence in sustaining the Romane empire, and the notable aid of an infinit number of instruments, which the said divine providence employed in plaming, raising up, and pulling downe so mighty and renowned a dominion.

OF THE ROMANS FORTUNE.

 Vertue and Fortune have fought many great combats, and those-teentimes one against the other: but that which presenteth it selfe unto us at this time, is the greatest of all the rest; to wit: the debate and plea which they had together as touching the empire of Rome, namely; whether of them twaine wrought that worke? and which of them brought forth so mightie a puissiance? For this wil be no small testimonie on her side who shall gaine the victorie, or rather a great apologie, against the imputation charged upon the one and the other. For Vertue is accused, in that she is honest, but unprofitable: and fortune, that she is uncerteine, but yet good: and it is commonly said, that as the former is fruitlesse for all her paines; so the other is faithlesse and untrusting in all her gifts. For who will not say, if the greatnesse of Rome be adjudged and awarded to one of them, that either Vertue is most profitable, in case she could doe so much for good and honest men, or Fortune most firme and constant, if she have preserved and kept so long, that which the once hath given? Ten the poet in those works of his which he composed without verse, and in prose, saith: That Fortune and Wisedome (two most different things, and farre unlike one to the other) produce neverthelesse most like and semblable effects: both the one and the other indifferently make men great and honorable; they advance them in dignitie, puissiance, estate and authoritie. And what need I (for to draw out this matter at length) rehearse and reckon up a number of those whom they have preferred, considering that even nature herselfe who hath borne us, and brought forth all things; some take to be Fortune, and others Wisedome. This present discoufse therefore, addeth unto the citie of Rome a great and admirable dignitie, in case we dispute of her as our manner is of the earth, the sea, the heaven and the starres, namely, whether it were by Fortune or by providence, that she was first founded and had her being? For mine owne part, I am of this opinion, that howsoever Fortune and Vertue have alwaies had many quarrels and debates otherwise, yet to the framing and composition of so great an empire and puissiance, it is very like they had made truce and were at accord; that by one joint-consent also, they wrought both together, and finished the goodliest piece of work that ever was in the world. Neither think I that I am deceived in this conjecture of mine; but am perswaded, that like as (according to the saying of Plato) the whole world was not made at first, of fire and earth, as the two principall and necessarie elements, to the end that it might be visible and palpable, considering that as the earth gave massinesse, poise and firmitude; so fire conferred thereunto, colour, forme, and motion. Besides, the other two natures and elements which are between these two extremes (to wit, aire and water, by softning, melting, tempering and quenching (as it were) the great diffociation and dissimilitude of the said extremes) have drawn together, incorporate and united by the means of them, the first matter; even so, time and God together, intending such a stately piece of worke as Rome, tooke Vertue and Fortune, and those they tempered and coupled in one, as yoke-fellows; to the end, that of the thing which is proper both to the one and the other, they might found, build, and reare a sacred temple indeed, an edifice beneficiall and profitable unto all, a strong castle seated upon a firme ground-worke, and an eternall element, which might serve in stead of a maine pillar, to susteine the decaying state of the world, readie to reele and sinke downward; and finally, as a sure anker-hold against turbulent tempests, and wandering waves of the surging seas, (as Democritus was wont to say.) For like as some of the naturall philosophers hold: That the world at the first was not the world, and that the bodies would not joine and mingle themselves together, for to give unto nature a common forme, composed of them all: but when the said bodies, (such as yet were small and scattered heere and there,) slid away, made meanes to escape and die for feare they should be caught and interlaced with others; such also as were more strong, firme, and compact, even then strove mainly one against another, and kept a foule coile and strite together, in such manner, as there arose a violent tempest, a dangerous ghust and troublefome agitation, agation, filling all with ruine, error, and shipwacke, untill such time as the earth arose to greatnesse by the tumultuarie concourse of those bodies that grew together, whereby she her-selfe began first to gather a firme confidence; and afterwards yielded in her selfe, and all about her a sure seat and resting place for all other. Semblably, when the greatest empires and potentacies among men, were driven and caried to and fro, according to their fortunes, and ranne one against another, by reason that there was not one of that grandence and puissance as might command all the rest, and yet they all desired that sovereignty: there was a wonderfull confusion, a generall destruction, a strange hurlyburly, a tumultuary wandering, and an universall mutation and change throughout the world, untill such time as Rome grew to some strength and bignesse, partly by laying and uniting to her selfe the neighbour nations and cities neere about her; and in part, by conquering the seigniories, realmes, and dominions of princes farr off, and strangers beyond sea; by which meanes the greatest and principall things in the world began to rest, and be seled as it were a firme foundaoun and sure seat, by reason that a generall peace was brought into the world, and the maine empire thereof reduced to one round circle, so firme as it could nor be checked or impeached: for that indeed all vertues were seated in those who were the foundiers and builders of this mightie State; and besides, Fortune also was ready with her favour to second and accompany them; as it shall (more plainly) appeere and be shewed in this discourse ensuing. And now me thinks I see from this project, as it were from some high rocke and watch tower; Vertue and Fortune marching toward the pleading of their cause, and to the judgement and decision of the foresaid question propounded: but vertue in her part and maner of going, seemeth to be milde & gentle, in the carriage also of her eie, staied and composed; the earnest care likewise and desire the hath to mainteine and defend her honour in this contention, maketh her colour a little to rise in her face, albeit she be farr behinde Fortune, who cometh apace, and maketh all the haste she can: now therefore conduct her, and attend upon her round about in manner of a guard, a goodly traine and troupe.

*Of worthies brave, who martiall captaines were,
In bloody warres, and bloody armours beare.*

All wounded in the fore-part of their bodies, dropping with blood and sweet mingled together, leaning upon the truncheons of the lances & pikes halfe broken, which they had won from their enemies. But would you have us to demand and aske who they might be? They say, that they be the Fabricii, the Camilli, the Lucii surnamed Cincinnati, the Fabii Maximi, the Claudian Marcelli, and the two Scipios: I see also C. Marius all angry, and chafing at Fortune. Alcibiades likewise is amongst them, who sheweth the flump of his burnt hand, crying aloud with-all: And will you ascribē this hand also to Fortune? And Marcus Horatius Cokes that valliant knight, who fought so bravely upon the bridge, covered all over with the shot of Tuskan darts, and shewing his lame thigh, seemeth to speake (from out of the deep while-pit of the river into which he leapt) these words: And was it by chance & Fortune that my legge became broken, & I lame upon it? Lo, what a company came with vertue to the triall of this controversie and matter in question!

*All warriours stout, in complet armour dight:
Expert in feates of armes, and prest to fight.*

But on the other side, the gate and going of Fortune seemes quicke and fast, her spirit great, and courage proud, her hopes high and haughtie: she overgoeth vertue, and approacheth nere at hand already; not mounting and lifting up her selfe now, with her light and flight wings: nor standing a tiptoe upon a round ball or boole, commeth the wavering and doubtfull; and then goeth her way afterwards in discontentment and displeasure: but like as the Spartiates describe Venus, saying, That after she had passed the river Eurotas, she layd by her mirrors and looking glasses; cast aside her daintie jewels, and other wanton ornaments, and threw away that titillie and lovely girdle of hers; and taking speare and shield in hand, sheweth her selfe thus prepared and set out, unto Lycurgus: euen so Fortune having abandoned the Persians and Assyrians, flew quicklie over Macedonia, and soone shooke off Alexander the great: then travelled shea while through Aegypt and Siria, carrying after her kingdomes as she went; and so having ruined and overthrowen the Carthaginians state, which with much variety and change she had oftentimes upheld; she approached in the end to mount Palatine, and when she had passed over the river Tiber, even there (as it should seeme) she cast off her wings; then she put off her flying patins; her boule so incessant turning and rolling to and fro the forsooke, and so entered Rome as to make her stay and abode there: and in this guise and maner sheweth her selfe

now, and maketh her apparance for to heare justice, & have this quarrell decided: Not as a bafe, unknowne, and obfcure perfon (as Pindarus faith) nor guiding and tefting with her hand two helmes; but rather as the filter of Ennomia, that is to fay Aequitie; and of Peitho, that is to fay Perfuaſion; and the daughter of Promethia, that is to fay Providence, according as Alcimus the poet deriveth her genealogie and pedigree. Moreover ſhe holdeth betwene her hands that plentifull Horne of all abundance, ſo much celebrated and renowned, and the fame filled, nor with ſtore of frutes alwaies freſh and verdant which Autumue yeeldeth, but brim full of all thoſe precious and exquisite commodities

or out of rivers ſpring:*

Which in deepe mines by deſce are found, or hauens by veſſels bring.

And thoſe powreth the fourth abundantly, and giueth abroad in great largeſſe. There are about her alſo to be ſcene in her traine, a number of moſt noble and right excellent perſonages, to wit: Numa Pompilius deſcended from the Sabines; Tarquinius Priſcus from the citie Tarquini; whom being aliens and meere ſtrangers the entailed kings, and enthronized in the roiall ſeat of Romulus. Alſo Paulus Aemilius, who brought backe his armie ſafe and found from the deſaſture of Perſeus and the Macedonians, where he atchived ſo fortunate a victorie, that there was not ſcene one Romane with a weeping eye, for the loſſe of any friend in that warre: and when he returned in triumph magnified Fortune. Even ſo did that good olde knight, Cacilius Metellus, furnamed Macedonicus, aſwell in regard of his brave victories, as of this rare felicitie of his, that he was caried unto his ſepulture by foure of his owne ſonnes, who had bene all conſuls; namely, Quintus Balearius, Lucius Diadematus, Marcus Metellus, and Caius Caprarius: there attended alſo upon his corps, two ſonnes in law of his, that married his daughters, both conſular men, and as many nephewes, his daughters children; men of marke and name all, both for great prowefſe in ſeats of armes, and alſo for their high place which they held in government of State: and commonweale. Aemilius Scaurus likewiſe (who being of a low degree and condition of life, yet came from a ſtock more bafe than it, a new upſtart and of the firſt head) was raiſed and advanced by her, and by the meanes of her favour, made a great lord and prince of that high court and honourable counſell, called the Senate. Cornelius Sylla likewiſe, whom ſhe tooke out of the lap & boſome of Nieopolis a courtiſan, for to exalt him above all the Cunbricke Trophies and Laureat Triumphs; yea, and the ſeven conſulſhips of Marinus, to raiſe him to that high pitch and ſovereigne degree of an abſolute monarch in the world, and a dictatour; he (I ſay) openly and directly gave himſelfe (as it were) by way of adoption unto Fortune, and attributed his whole eſtate and all his actions to her favour, crying with a loud voice with Oedipus in Sophocles:

*To Fortunes court I owe all ſues,
And her good ſonne my ſelfe repues.*

Inſomuch as in the Romane language he furnamed himſelfe Felix, that is to fay, Happie: and unto the Greeks, he wrote thus in their tongue: Δεῦρος Καρρίου & Ευχαιος Εμμεγέστρης, that is to fay: Lucius Cornelius Sylla, beloved of Venus and the Graces. And verily thoſe trophies of his, which are to be ſcene in our cuntry of Cheronea, in regard of thoſe noble victories which he gained againſt the lieutenants generall of king Mithridates, have the like inſcription, and that right worthily. For it is not the night (as Menander faith) but Fortune, that is beſt acquainted and in greateſt favour with Venus. Should not he therefore (who is deſirous to plead the cauſe of Fortune) doe very well to lay this for a good ground of his plea, and in the forefront and Exordium of his oration, bring in very fitly and properly for his witneſſes to depoſe, the Romans themſelves, who have aſcribed more unto Fortune than to Vertue? Certes, late it was among them, & after many ages, ere Scipio Numantinus builded a temple to Vertue: & after him, Marcellus cauſed to be built that chapel bearing the name, Virtutis & Honoris, that is to fay, Of Vertue and Honour: like as Aemilius Scaurus gave order for another to be reared by the name of Mentis, that is to fay, of underſtanding; even about the time of the Cunbricke warre: in which age, (when literature, and profeſſors of learning & eloquence, flocked thicke, as it were, and reſorted to the citie of Rome) they beganne to have in price and reputation, ſuch matters: and yet to this very day there is not one chapell of Wiſdome, Temperance, Patience & Magnanimitie, ne yet of Continence; whereas of Fortune there be temples ſo ſtately, ſo glorious, and ſo ancient withall, that a man would take them to have bene edified even in manner when the firſt foundations, ons of the citie were laid. For firſt and formoſt, Anco Martius the nephew or daughters ſonne of king Numa, and the fourth king of Rome after Romulus, founded one in the honour of Fortune. And peradventure he it was that furnamed Fortune, Virilitas, and derived it of Fortis; for that Virility, that is to fay, Manhood, and Fortitude, that is to fay Prowefſe and Valour, have moſt helpe by Fortune, to the atchieving of victorie. As for that temple of Feminine Fortune, named otherwiſe Mulieris, they built it alſo before the daies of Camillus, at what time as Marius Coriolanus (who led under banners diſplayed, againſt the city of Rome, a puiſſant power of the Volſcians) was turned backe and retired, by the meanes and interceſſion of certaine noble dames that encountered him: for thoſe ladies went in a ſolemne ambaffage toward him, accompanied with his wife and mother; and ſo earnestly intreated and effectually perſwaded with him, that in the end they prevailed, inſomuch, as for their ſakes he pardoned and ſpared the citie, and ſo withdrew the forces of that barbarous nation: and then it was (by folks ſayings) that the ſtatue or image of Fortune at the dedication thereof, pronounced theſe words: You have (good Romane dames) according to the ordinance of the citie, conſecrated me right devoutly. And verily Furius Camillus (at what time as he had quenched the flaming fire of the Gaules, and recovered the city of Rome out of the very ſcoles of the balance where it was to bee weighed in counterpoſe againſt a certaine quantitie of golde) erected a temple, neither to Good counſell nor to Valour, but unto * Fame and Rumour, even in that very place by the new ſtreet, where (by report) Marcus Cæditi as hee went by the way, heard in the night a voice, that gave warning and advertiſed, that ſhortly after they ſhould looke for the Gaules to warre upon them. As for that temple (upon the banke of the river Tyber) of Fortune furnamed Fortis, that is to fay, Strong, Martiall, Valiant, and Magnanimous, for that to her belonged generofiſie and the forcible power to tame and overcome all things, they built a temple to the honour of her, within the orchards and gardens that Cæſar (by his laſt will and teſtament) bequeathed unto the people of Rome; as being perſwaded that himſelfe (by the gracious favour of Fortune) became the greateſt man of all the Romans, as himſelfe doth teſtifie. As concerning Julius Cæſar, I would have bene abaſhed and aſhamed to ſay, that through the favour of Fortune he was liſed up to that rare greatneſſe, but that his owne ſelfe beareth witneſſe thereof: for being departed from Brindis the fourth day of January, and embarked for to purſue Pompeius, even at the verie height and in the heart of Winter, he croſſed the ſeas moſt ſafely, as if Fortune had held in the tempeſtuous weather of that ſeaſon; and when he found Pompeius ſtrong and puiſſant aſwell by ſea as land, as having all his forces aſſembled together about him in a ſet and ſtanding campe, being himſelfe but weake and accompanied with a ſmall power; for that the companies which Antonius and Sabinus ſhould have brought, lingered and ſtaied behinde, he adventured to take ſea againe; and putting himſelfe into a ſmall frigate, ſailed away unknown both to the maſter, and alſo to the pilot of the ſaid barke, in ſimple habit, as if he had bene ſome meane and ordinary ſervitor: but by occaſion of a violent returne of the tide, ſul againſt the current of the river, & withall, of a great tempeſt that aroſe, ſeeing that the pilot was readie to alter his courſe, and turne abaſt backe, he plucked away his garment from his head wherewith he ſat hoodwinked, and diſcovered his face, ſaying unto the pilot: Holde the helme hard (good fellow) and be not afraid to ſet forward: be bolde (I ſay) hoife ſailes, ſprede them open to the winde at adventure, and feare not, for thou haſt aboard, Cæſar and his Fortune. So much perſwaded was he, and confidently aſſured, that Fortune ſailed with him, accompanied him in all his marches and voiaiges, aſſiſted him in the campe, aided him in battell, conducted & directed him in all his warres: whoſe worke indeed it was, and could proceed from nothing els but her, to command a calme at ſea, to procure faire weather and a Summer ſeaſon in Winter; to make them ſwift and nimble, who otherwiſe were moſt ſlow and heaue; to cauſe them to be couragious, who were greateſt cowards and moſt heartleſſe; and that which is more incredible than all the reſt, to force Pompey to flie, and Ptolemæus to kill his owne gueſt, to the end that Pompey might die, and yet Cæſar be not ſo ſtained with his bloodſhed. What ſhould I alledge the teſtimonie of his ſonne, the firſt emperor furnamed Auguſtus, who for the ſpace of ſittie yeeres and foure, was abſolute commander both by ſea and land of the whole world? who when he ſent his nephew or ſiſters ſonne to the warres, prayed and wiſhed at Gods hands for no more, but that he might prove as valiant as Scipio, and as well beloved as Pompey, and as fortunate as himſelfe; aſcribing the making of himſelfe as great as he was, unto Fortune; as if a man ſhould intitle ſome ſingular piece of worke with the name of the workman or artifice: which Fortune of his, was the cauſe that he got the ſtate and vantage of Cicero, Lepidus, Paſſa, Hirtius, and Marcus Antonius, by whole counſels, brave exploits exploits and prowesses, expeditions, victories, voiajes, armadoes, legions, camps, and in one word, by these warres, as well by sea as by land, she made him ever chiefe and principall, lifting him on high still, and putting them downe by whom hee was mounted and advanced; untill in the end, hee remained alone, and had no peere nor second. For it was for his sake that Cicero gave counsell: Lepidus ledde an armie; Pompey vanquished the enimie; Clodius lost his life in the field; and Antonius lived riotously in drunkenness, gluttonie, and lecherie: for I recken Cleopatra among the favors that Fortune did to Augustus, against whom, as against some rock, Antonius so great a commaunder, so absolute a prince, and mightie triumvir, should runne himselfe, besplit, and sinke; to the end that Cesar Augustus might survive and remaine alone. And to this purpose reported it is of him; that there being so inward acquaintance and familiarity, as there was among them, that they used often to passe the time away together in playing at tennis, or at dice, or seeing some pretty sport of cocks and quails of the game, which were kept for the nonce to fight: when Antonius was evermore away with the world, and on the loosing hand; one of his familiar friends, (a man well scene in the art of divination) would manie times frankly say unto him by way of remonstrance and admonition: Sir, what meane you to meddle or have any dealing with this young gentleman, (meaning Augustus) Fly and avoid his company, I advise you; more renowned and better reputed you are than he; his elder you are, you have a greater command and feignorie than he, more expert in feats of armes, and of better experience and practise by farre: but good sir, your Genius or familiar spirit is afraid of his, your Fortune, which by it selfe apart is great, flattereth and courteth his, and unlesse you remove your selfe farre from him, it will forsake you quite and goe unto him.

Thus you see what evidences and proofes Fortune may alledge for herselfe, by way of testimony. But we are besides to bring forth those which are more reall, and drawn from the things themselves, beginning our discourse at the very foundation and nativie as it were of Rome city. In the first place therefore, who will not say and confesse, that for the birth, the preservation, the nouriture, rearing, and education of Romulus, well might the excellencies of Vertue be the hidden ground-works, and first foundation; but surely it was Fortune alone that raised the same above ground, and built all up? For to beginne at the verie generation and procreation, even of those, who first founded and planted the citie of Rome, they seeme both to proceed from a wonderfull favour of rare Fortune: for it is said, that their mother lay with god Mars, and was by him conceived: and like as the report goeth, that Heracles was begotten in a long night, by reason that the day extraordinarily, and besides the course of nature was held backe, and the sunne staied in his race and rising; even so we finde it recorded in histories, that when Romulus was gotten, and conceived, the sunne became eclipsed, by reason of his full conjunction indeed with the moone, like as Mars being a very god, medled with Sylvia a mortall woman: also that the same hapned againe unto Romulus, just upon the very same day when hee was translated out of this life: for they say, that even at the very instant when the sunne entred into the eclipse, he also departed out of sight, and was no more scene; which fell out to be upon the day called Nona Caprinae: upon which day, the Romans doe still at this present celebrate a solemne feast. Now when these first founders were in this manner bred and borne; after that the tyrant sought to make them away, by good fortune it hapned, that the minister to take them and execute the deed, was neither a barbarous nor a mercilesse cruell slave, but a gracious and pitifull servitour, who would in no wise murder the silly babes: but finding a convenient place, upon the banke by the river side, adjoining hard to a faire greene meadow, and shadowed with pretie trees growing low by the ground; there he bestowed the infants, neere unto a wilde figge tree, which they called afterwards Ruminalis; for that a teat or pappe in Latin is called Ruma: which done, it chaunced that a bitch-woolfe having newly whelped her litter, and feeling her pappes beset with milke, and so stiffe by reason that her young ones were dead, that they asked againe, and were ready to burst, seeking to be eased and to discharge her selfe thereof; came gently to these babes, stooped downe, and seemed to winde about them, put unto them her teats, desirous & labouring to be delivered of her milke, as if it had beene a second litter: And then (see the fortune of it) a certaine bird (consecrated to Mars, which thereupon men name in Latine Picus Martius, that is to say, a Speghit or Wood-pecker) chaunced to approach neere, and having alighted gently upon the tips of her toes fast by them, & softly opened with one of her clees the mouthes of these infants, one after another, she conveyed into them certaine morsels, minced small, even of her owne food & provision. That this is true, the said wilde fig tree at this day is named Ruminalis of the wolves teat, called in Latine

Ruma

Ruma, which she held unto the babes for to suckle them, doth testifie. And long time after, the inhabitants about that place have observed this custome; not to expose and call forth any thing that is bred and borne amongst them; but to reare and nourish all, in a venerable memoriall of this happe and resemblance of the accident which befell unto Romulus and his brother Remus. Now that these two foundlings were nourished and brought up afterward in the citie of Gabii, unknowne to all the world that they were the children of Sylvia, and the nephewes or daughters children of Numitor the king; may seeme to be a craftie theevith calt, and deceitfull sophistrie, proceeding from Fortune; to the end that they should not perish before they had done some woorthy exploit, by reason of their noble birth, but be discovered by their verie deeds and effects; shewing their vertue as a marke of their nobilitie. And heere I call to minde a certaine speech which Themistocles (a brave and wise captain) upon a time gave to some other captaines, who after him, and in a second place, were in great name at Athens, and much esteemed, howbeit pretending to deserve more honour than he: The morrow-mind (quoth he) quarrelled and contended upon a time with the feast or holi-day, which went before it, saying: That she was full of labour and businesse, and never had any rest; whereas in her there was nothing but eating and drinking that, which before hand had bene prepared and provided with great paine and travell; unto whom the feast made this answer: Certes, true it is, that thou saiest; but if I had not bene, where hadst thou bene? Even so (quoth Themistocles) if I had not conducted the Medians warre, what good would you have done now? and where had your imploiment bene? Semblably, methinks that Fortune saith the same unto the Vertue of Romulus: Thy acts are famous, and thy deeds renowned; thou hast shewed by them indeed, that descended thou art from divine blood and some heavenly race; but thou seest againe, how farr short thou art of me, how long after me it was, ere thou didst come in place; for if I had not (when time was) shewed my selfe kinde, gracious and courteous unto those poore infants, but had forsaken and abandoned them silly wretches, how could you have had any being, and by what meanes should you have bene so gloriously scene in the world? in case (I say) a female wilde beast, even a shee-wolfe, had not come in the way, having her bigs swollen, enflamed and aking with the plentie of milke, flowing (as it were) a streame unto them, seeking rather whom to feed, than by who she should be fed? or if she had bene altogether savage indeed & hunger-bitten; these roiall houses, these stately temples, these magnificent theaters, these faire galleries, these goodly halles, palaces and counsell-chambers, had they not bene at this day, the lodges, cottages and stables of shepherds and herdmen, serving (as slaves) some lords of Alba and Tuscan, or els some masters of the Latine nation? The beginning, in all things, is chiefe and principall, but especially in the foundation and building of a city; and Fortune is she who is the author of this beginning and foundation, in saving and preserving the founder himselfe: for well may Vertue make Romulus great, but Fortune kept him untill he became great.

It is for certaine known and confessed, that the reigne also of Numa Pompilius, which continued long, was guided and conducted by the favour of a marvellous Fortune: for to say that the nymph Ageria, one of the Wood-Fairies, called Dryades, a wife and prudent goddesse, was enamoured of him, and that lying ordinarily by his side, taught him how to establish, governe and rule the weale-publicke, peradventure is a meere fabulous tale; considering that other persons, who are recorded to have bene loved by goddeses (and to have enjoyed them in marriage; as for example, Peleus, Anchises, Orion & Emathion) had not for all that (thorowout their life) contentment and prosperitie, without some trouble and adversitie: but surely it seemeth that Numa in very truth had good Fortune for his domestickall and familiar companion, and to reigne jointly with him; which Fortune of his (receiving the citie of Rome, as in a boisterous and troublefome tempest, or in a turbulent sea, to wit, in the enimie, envie and malice of all the neighbor-cities and nations bordering upon it; and besides disquieted within it selfe, and troubled with an infinite number of calamities and seditious factions) quenched all those flames of anger, and alaid all frightfull and malicious grudges, as some boisterous and contrary windes. And like as men say, that the sea, even in mid-winter receiveth the young brood of the birds Halcyones, after they have newly hatched, and giveth them leave to be nourished and fed in great calme and tranquillitie; even so Fortune (spreading and drawing round about this people newly planted, and as yet ready to wag and shake every way, such a quiet and still season, void of all busie affaires, without warres, without mortalitie, without danger or feare of danger) gave good meanes unto the citie of Rome to take root and set sure footing, growing still in repose with all securitie, and without any hinderance and impeachment whatsoever. Much like therefore, as a great carraque, or or gallee, is framed, wrought and set together by many a knoeck and stroke, and that with great violence; whiles it feelleth the blowes of sledges and hammers, is pierced with spikes and great nailes, cut with sawes, axes and hatchets; and when it is once made and finished by the shipwright, ought to rest quiet and in repose, for a competent time, untill the braces be well settled and fastened, and the joints firmly knit and compact: for otherwise, he that should stirre it, and shoot it into the sea, whiles yet the junctures and commissures be yet greene, fresh, loose, and not well consolidated, all would chinke, cleave and open, when it came to be never so little shaken and tossed by the boisterous billowes of the sea, so that she would leake & take in water thorough out; even so, the first prince, author and founder of the city of Rome, having composed it of rusticall peasants and herdmen, as it were, of rough-hewn planks and posts of tough and stubburne oake, had much adoe, and tooke no small paines, but engaged himselfe farre into sundry warres, and exposed his person and estate to manifold and great dangers, being of necessity enforced to encounter and fight with those who opposed themselves, and withstood the native (as it were) and foundation thereof, before he could bring his worke to an end; but the second king receiving the fame at his hands, gave it good time and leisure to gather strength, and to confirme the growth and augmentation thereof by the favour of happie Fortune, who afforded him the meanes to enjoy great peace and long repose. But if at that time, some such as king Porrenna, had come against it, pitching his campe before it, and leading a strong armie of Tuscanes to give assault thereto, whiles the wallies were yet greene, soft, and ready to shake with every small thing; or if some puissant prince and potentate, or worthy warrior from among the Martians, upon apostasie and revolt; or els some Lucan, for envie or upon a troublesome spirit and desire of contention, a bush-headed person, factious and quarrelsome, such an one as afterwards Mutius or stout Silvanus, furnished the Bolde; or last of all, Telephus, with whom Sylla scuffled, an found himselfe somewhat to do; him I meane, who (as it were) with one signall could make all Italic rise and take armes: if one of these (I say) had come and given the alarme, envining and assailing with sound of trumpets this Sage-like prince and philosopher Numa, whiles he was at sacrifice, or in his devotions and prayers to the gods; surely the citie in that infancy of hers and first beginnings, had never bene able to have held out and withstood so great a storme and tempest, neither had it grown up as it did, to so goodly a number of lustie and serviceable men: whereas, it seemeth that the long peace which continued under this king, served in stead of a provision of furniture and all sorts of munition for innumerable warres ensuing; and the people of Rome, much like unto a champion who hath to fight a combat, having bene exercised and enured at leisure, in a peaceable time, for the space of three and forty yeeres after the warres which they had fought under Romulus, became strong enough, and sufficient to make head against those that afterwards assailed them: for it is for certaine recorded, that during all that time, there was neither pestilence nor famine, no unkinde barrenesse of the earth, nor unseasonable distemperature of Winter or Summer, to afflict or trouble the city of Rome, as if there had beene no humane providence, but onely a divine Fortune which tooke the care and government of all those yeeres. In those daies likewise it was, that the two-leaved doores of the temple of Janus were shut up and locked fast, those (I meane) which they call the gates of warre, for that they were set open in the time of warre, and kept shut when it was peace. No sooner was king Numa dead, but these gates were opened for the Albane warre, which brake out suddenly and with great violence, and so stood open still, during an infinit number of other warres ensuing continually one after another thereupon: but in proceesse of time, namely, about foure hundred and foure score yeres after, they were shut againe, when the first Punicke warre was ended, and peace concluded with the Carthaginians, even that yeere, wherein C. Attilius and Titus Manlius were consuls. After this, they were set open by occasion of new warres, which lasted untill the very time that Cesar Augustus was that noble victorie under the Promontory Aethiun. Then had the Romans a cessation or surcease of armes, but the same continued not long; for that the tumultuous stirres of the Biscains, the Galatians and Germaines comming all together, troubled the peace. And thus much may serve out of histories, for testimonies in behalfe of the felicity and good Fortune of king Numa.

But the Kings also that reigned in Rome after him, highlie honoured Fortune, as the chiefe patronesse, nurse, and the prop or pillar, as Pindarus saith, which supported and upheld the citie of Rome; as we may judge by the reasons and arguments following. There is at Rome, I wot well, the temple of Vertue highlie honored: but founded it was and built of late daies, even by Marcus, who forced and won the citie of Syracusa. There was another also in the honor of

reason, understanding, or good advice, which they called by the name of Mentis: but Aemilius Scaurus was the man who dedicated it; about the time of the Cimbricke warres. For that by this, the learning, the artes and pleasant eloquence of the Greekes were crept already into the citie: but, to wisdom there is not yet to this day so much as one temple or chappell; neither to temperance, nor patience; ne yet to magnanimitie, whereas of Fortune there be many churches and temples verie auncient, and those much frequented; and to speake in one word, celebrated with all kinds of honor; as being founded and erected amid the noblest parts, and most conspicuous places of the citie. For there is the temple of Masculine Fortune called Fortuna virilis, which was buile by Martius Ancus the fourth king of Rome, and by him so called; for that he thought that Fortune availed as much as Fortitude to the obtaining of victorie. As for the other, entituled by the name of Fortune Feminine; otherwise called Fortuna Muliebris, everie man knoweth that they were the dames of the citie, who dedicated it, after they had averted and turned backe Martius Coriolanus, who was come with a puissant power of enemies, and presented himselfe before the citie. And Servius Tullius who augmented the puissance of the people of Rome, and brought it unto a goodlie and beautifull maner of government, no prince so much, having set downe and established a good order for the giving of suffrages and voices at the elections of magistrates, and enacting of lawes: and besides instituted the order of militarie discipline; having been himselfe the first censor of mens maners, and the controller or overseer of every mans life and behaviour; who seemed also to have been a right valiant prince, and most prudent withall: this man I say, whollie avowed himselfe the vassalle of Fortune, and did homage to her, acknowledging all principallitie to depend upon her; in such sort as men say Fortune her selfe used to come & lie with him, descending downe by a window into his chamber; which now the call the gate Fenestella. He founded therefore within the Capitoll one temple to the honor of Fortune, called Primigenia, which a man may interpret, first begotten: and another to Fortune obsequens, which some take to be as much as obsequant; others, gratus and favourable. But not to stand any longer upon the Romaine names and appellations; I will leave them, & endeavour to reckon up and interpret in Greeke the meaning and signification of all these temples, founded and dedicated in the honor of Fortune. For in the mount Palatine there standeth one chappell of private Fortune, and another of gluing Fortune: which tearme may haplie seeme to be ridiculous; howbeit, by way of a metaphor it carrieth a signification verie important, as if we were to understand thus much by it: That it draweth unto it, and catcheth those things which be farre off, and holdeth fast whatsoever sticketh and cleaveth to it. Moreover, neere unto the fountaine called Muscosa, that is to say, moffie; there is another chappell of Fortune the virgin: as also in the mount Esquilus, another of Aduerse Fortune; upon the streete called the Long Way, an altar there is erected to Fortune Good-hope; or, as it were Hope: and neere adjoining unto the altar of Venus Epi-talaria, that is isto say, Foote-winged Venus, a chappell and image of Fortune Masculine: besides a thousand honors and denominations more of Fortune, which Servius for the most part instituted and ordeined; as knowing full well, that in the regiment of all humane things, Fortune is of great importance, or rather can doe all in all. And good reason he had therefore, considering that himselfe by the beneficial favor of Fortune, being descended as he was by birth from a captive, and that of an enemy nation, was raised and advanced to royall dignitie. For when the citie of the Corniculanes was won forcible by the Romanes, a certaine young damsell named Oerisa, being taken prisoner (who notwithstanding her infortunate captivity; was neither for beauty of face, nor comely behaviour blemished or stained) was given unto queene Tanaquil, the wife of king Tarquin, to serve her, and afterwards bestowed in marriage upon one of the retainers or dependants to the king; such as the Romanes call Clientes: and from thence came this foresaid Servius. Others say, that it was nothing so; but that this maiden Oerisa taking ordinarily certaine first-frutes or affiaes as it were, both of viands and wine from the kings table, carried the same to the hearth of the domestick altar; and when one day above the rest she cast these primities or libaments afore said (as her usuall manner was) into the fire upon the hearth; behold all on the sudden when the flame went out; there arose out of the said hearth, the genitall member of a man; whereat the young damosell being affrighted, reported what a strange sight she had seene, unto queene Tanaquil alone: who being a wise and witty lady, apparelled and adorned the maiden like a bride in every respect, and shut her up with the foresaid apparitions; taking it for a divine thing, presaging some great matter. Some say, that this was the domestick or tutelare god of the house, whom they call Lar; others Pulchra, who was enamored enamored of this young virgin: but whatsoever it was, Oeris was thereupon with child, and so was Servius borne. Now whiles he was but an infant, there was scene a shining light, much like unto the flash of lightning, to blaze out of his head round about. But Valerius Antius recordeth this narration otherwise: saying, that Servius had a wife named Gegania, who hapned to die; by occasion of whose death, hee grew into a great agonie and passion of sorrow, in the presence of his mother, untill in the end for very heavinesse and melancholy, hee fell a sleepe, and as he slept, the woman of the house might perceive his head shining out in a light fire; a sufficient argument and testimonie, that engendred he was of fire; yea, and an assured preface of a kingdome unlooked for, which he attained unto after the decease of Tarquinius, by means of the port and favour that Tanquil graced him with. For otherwise, of all the kings that were of Rome, he seemed to bee the man that was unlikest to reach unto a monarchie, and least intended, or minded to aspire thereunto: considering that when he was king, he determined to resigne up the crowne; though hee was impeached and staied for so doing: because Tanquil upon her death-bed conjured and bound him by an oath to continue in his roiall estate and dignitie, and in no case to give over the politike government of the Romans, wherein hee was borne. Lo, how the regall power & kingdome of Servius may be wholly ascribed unto Fortune, seeing that as hee came unto it beyond all hope and expectation, so hee held it even against his will.

But to the end it may not be thought, that we withdraw our selves and retire, flying unto antiquitie, as it were into a place obscure and darke, for want of more cleere and evident proofes, let us leave the historie of the kings, and turne our speech unto the most glorious acts of the Romans, and their warres, which were of greatest name and renowne: wherein I will not deny; and who is there but must confesse? there did concurre

*Both boldnesse stout and fortitude, with martiall discipline,
In warre which aie cooperant with vertue doth combine.*

according as Timotheus the poet writeth? but the prosperous traine and happy course of their affaires, the violent streame also, & current of their progresse into such puissance & growth of greatnesse, sheweth evidently unto those who are able to discourse with reason, and to judge aright, that this was a thing conducted neither by the hands nor counsels, ne yet by the affections of men, but by some heavenly guidance and divine direction, even by a fore-winde and gale of Fortune blowing at the poupe, and hastening them forward, Trophies upon trophies by them were erected, one triumph met with another continually; the former blood upon the weapons not yet cooled, but still warre was washed away by new bloudish comming upon it: they reckoned and numbered their victories, not by the multitude of enemies slaine and heapes of spoiles, but counted them by realmes subdued, by nations conquered and brought to subjection, by isles and firme lands of the continent reduced into servitude and bondage, and all to augment the greatnesse of their empire. In one battell king Philip was chased out of Macedonia: one blow and one conflict caused Antiochus to abandon and forgoe Asia: by one defeature the Carthaginians lost Lybia: one man alone in one expedition, and by the power of one armie, * conquered unto them Armenia, the kingdome of Pontus, the sea Euxinus, Syria, Arabia, the Albanians, the Iberians, all the nations even as farre as the mountaine Caucasus, and the Hircanians, yea and the very ocean sea which environeth the world round about; saw the same man thrise victor and conquerour: the Nomades in Affricke he repressed and vanquished, even to the coasts of the fourth sea: he subdued Spain which revolted and rebelled with Sertorius, as far as to the atlantike sea: the kings of the Albanians he pursued, & never left the chafe untill he had driven them to the Caspian sea. At these brave exploits and glorious conquests he achieved, so long as he used the publique Fortune of the citie, but afterwards he was overthrowen and came to ruine by his owne private desires. Now that great Demon and tutelar god of the Romans, did not second them for a day as it were and no more; neither in a short time did his best and came to the height and vigor of his gracious favour, as that of the Macedonians; nor gave them his assistance upon the land onely, as he who was the patron of the Lacedemonians; or at sea alone, as the Athenians god; ne yet was long ere he would stirre, as he whom the Colophonians trusted upon; no, nor gave over quickly, as the Persians patron did: but even from the very nativitie and foundation of the citie; it began, it grow up, waxed; and went forward as it did, it managed the government of it, it continued firme and sure with it; by land,

* All this is to be understood of Pompeius Magnus.

land, by sea, in warre, in peace, against Barbarians, and against the Greeks: He it was that when Annibal the Carthaginian overpersed all Italy, in manner of a land-flood, or violent brooke, wrought it so, that partly through envie, and in part through the malice of his spitefull fellow-citizens, no succours and supplies were sent to feed and mainteine him; and so by that means wasted, spent, and consumed him to nothing in the end: he it was that dispersed and kept the armies and forces of the Cimbrians, & Teutonians a great way, and a long time asunder, so as they could not meet; to the end that Marius might be furnished and provided sufficiently to fight with them, and to defeat them both, one after another: hee impeached the joining together of three hundred thousand fighting men at one time; all invincible soldiers, and appointed with armes insuperable, that they might not invade and over-runne all Italy. For this cause, and by the means of this protector, Antiochus sat still, and stirred not to aid Philip, all the whiles that the Romans made sharpe warre upon him: likewise, when Antiochus was in distresse and danger of his whole estate, Philip being discontented before, durst not hold up his head, and died the while: he, and none but he procured, that whiles the Marsians warre for all Rome and Italy on a light fire, the Sarmatian, and Bastarnian warre held king Mithridates occupied. Finally, through his procurement, king Tigranes, when Mithridates flourished, and was in his ruffe most puissant, upon suspicion, envie, and distrust, would not joine with him; and afterwards when the said Mithridates had an overthrow, combined and banded with him, that in the end he might also lose his life and perish with him for company.

What! in the greatest distresses and calamities that lay heave upon the citie; was it not the Romane Fortune that redressed all, and set it upright againe? As for example: When as the Gaules were encamped round about the mount Capitoll, and held the castle besieged:

A plague she sent, the soldiers soon fell sick, Throughout their host, whereof they died thicke.

Fortune also it was, & meere chance, that revealed their comming in the night, & gave advertisement thereof, when no man in the world either knew or doubted thereof: and peradventure it would not be impertinent and besides the purpose, in this place to discourse of it more at large. After the great discomfiture and overthrow that the Romans received neere the river Alia; as many as could save themselves by good foot-maniship, when they were come to Rome, filled the whole citie with a fright and trouble; inso much, as the people wonderfully amazed with this fearful newes, fledde scattering heere and there, excepting onely a few, who put themselves within the castle of the Capitoll, resolved to keepe that peece, and abide the extremities of the siege: others who escaped after that unfortunate battell and defeature, assembled themselves immediately in the citie Vetii; and chose for their dictator Furius Camillus, a man, who the people (proud & insolent upon their long prosperitie) had before time rejected, and sent away into banishment, condemning him for robbing the common treasure; but then being humbled by his affliction, and brought to a low ebbe; called him backe againe, after that discomfiture; committing and putting into his hands, the absolute power and soveraigne authorities; but to the end it might not be thought, that it was by the occasion of the iniquitie and infortunitie of the time, and not according to order of law, that the man excepted of this high magistracie, and that in a desperate state of the citie, without all hope that ever it should rise againe, he was elected by the tumultuary suffrages of a broken armie, dispersed and wandering heere and there: his will was, that the senators of Rome who had retired themselves within the Capitoll aforesaid, should be made acquainted and advertised thereof, and that by their uniform consent, they might approve and confirme that election of him, which the soldiers and men of warre had decreed. Now among the others, there was one named Caius Pontius, a valiant and hardy man, who undertooke, and promised in his owne person to goe and carry the newes of that which had beene determined, unto those who abode within the Capitoll: and verily he enterprized a thing exceeding dangerous, for that hee was to passe through the middes of the enemies, who then invested the Capitoll with trenches, and a strong corps-de-guard: when he was come to the river side by night, he fastened just under his breast certeine broad pieces of plates of corke, and so committing his body to the lightnesse of such a barge, hee bare himselfe thereupon, and hulled with the course of the water, which was so good and favourable unto him, that it carried him over, and set him gently upon the banke on the other side of the river, without any danger at all; where he was no sooner landed, but hee went directly toward that place which he law was without all light, conjecturing by the darknesse and silence withall, that he should not light upon any of the watch or ward there: thus he began to climb up the steepe rocke, whereas he could find any way to set sure footing upon the stones that stuck out, or whersoever he found a place to yeeld better accessse and ascent than another; so fetching a compasse, and catching hold with his hand upon the rough craggies, and bearing himselfe as well as possibly he could, he made such shift, that in the end he crawled up to the toppe thereof; and there those Romans that kept watch and ward, and were foremost of the corps-de-guard, having espied him, helped to pull him up: then declared hee unto those within the place, what had beene set downe and agreed upon by them who were without, from whom hee had no sooner received their assent and approbation of the foresaid ordinance concluded, but the verie same night he made his returne the way that he came, unto Camillus: the next morning, one of the barbarous enemies, as hee walked about that place, thinking of no such thing, perceiving by very chance, partly the print of a mans tiptoes, together with the marks of unsteadily footing, and partly the grasse and weeds crushed and broken, which grew heere and there in such places, where they had some little earth to mainteine them; as also the tracks and traces where he had leaned and wrestled with his bodie, either in clambering up, or striving overthwart; went straight waies and related unto his fellow-souldiours what he had seene; who taking it thus, that the enemies themselves shewed them the way, and trode it out before them, assailed presently to doe the like, and to gaine the toppe of the rocke. In the night time therefore having observed where the place was most solitary, and void of watchmen, they mounted up, without being descried and discovered, not onely by the men who were in guard and sentinell, but not so much as by the dogges, which were set a front before, for to assist the watch, so to Ileap they were all, both the one and the other. Howbeit, the good Fortune of Rome wanted no voice to bewray so imminent a danger, and to give warning thereof; for there were within the Capitoll certaine geese consecrated unto the goddesse Juno, kept at the cities charges, in the honour of her, close under her temple: now is this creature of all others by nature very timorous, and at every little noise that is made, ready to be affrighted; and at that time especially, by reason that there was within the place great scarcitie of victuals, they were neglected, and for that they were kept somewhat hungry, slept not so soundly as they were wont to doe; by reason whereof, at the first, being aware of the enemies comming, even so soone as they had gotten over the buttlements of the wals, they came full butt upon them, & being affrighted besides to see their bright armour, set up such a gagling note after their manner, that all the court of the castle rung with their violent and disonant noise: whereat the Romans were awakened, and suspecting deeply what the matter was, ranne incontinently to the wall, gave the enemies the repulse, and turned them downe with their heads forward: in memoriall of which accidents and occurrences, Fortune goeth as it were in triumph even at this day. For at Rome they are wont upon a certaine set day of the yeere in a solemne procession, to have a dogge carried in a shew, crucified; and a goose borne in a gorgeous litter upon a rich cushion, most sumptuously dight and set out: which spectacle representeth and sheweth unto us the puissance of Fortune, and the great meanes that she hath to effect all those things with ease and facilitie, which in mans reason seeme impossible; considering that she giveth a kinde of wittie perceivance and understanding, to brute beasts, otherwise foolish and voide of reason; yea and insensibly bold courage and strength to those which by nature are fearefull, weak, and cowardly. For what man is there, unless he be altogether deprived of naturall sense and affection, who would not be astonied and ravished againe with a woonderfull admiration, to consider and discourse after a sort with himselfe, comparing the heavey cheere and mournfull condition of this citie in those daies, with the felicitie and stately port thereof at this present; to looke up (I saie) to the Capitoll, and behold the riches there, the sumptuositie and magnificence of the monuments and oblations there to bee seene; the excellent pieces of worke, wrought by most cunning artificers, striving who might doe best; the presents of cities, contending who should bee most bounteous and liberall; the crownes sent by kings and princes, and what precious things soever the earth, the sea, the islands, the firmelands of the continent, so the rivers, trees, beasts, champain fields, mountaines and metall-mines doe afford; and in one word, the first fruits and choise parcels of all things in the world, which seeme all to strive one with another, to embelish, grace, adorne, enrich and beautifie this onely place: and withall, to looke backe unto those times past, and consider how it went within a very little, that all this should never have beene, or at least wile not extant at this day; seeing that all being within the power of intercelle fire, fearefull darknesse of the mirke night, cruell and barbarous swords, and most bloudy minds and inhumane hearts of these Gauls; the poore contemptible beasts, foolish lish, reasonlesse and timorous, made the overture to save all, and were the principall instruments of preservation; also, how those brave gallants, valourous knights, and great captaines and commanders, the Mantii, the Servii, the Posthumii and Papirii, the ancestours and progenitours of so many noble houses afterwards, were very neere and at the point to have beene undone for ever, and come to nothing; had not these silly geese awakened and started up to fight for their country, and to defend the god, patron, and protectour of the city. And if it be true that Polybius writeth in the second booke of his historie, as touching those Gauls, who at that time surprised the city, and were lords of Rome: That when newes came suddenly unto them, how certeine of their barbarous neighbours neere at hand, were entred in armes within their owne country, and won all before them as they went; they had returned in hast backe, and made peace with Camillus, certes, without all doubt, Fortune even then had bene the cause also of the cities safetie, in distracting the enemies, or rather in withdrawing them another way contrary to all hope and expectation of man. But what need we to stand thus upon these old histories, wherein there is no certieintie to build upon delivered; considering that the state of Rome was then ruinate, and all their annales, records, registers and memorials either perished or confounded, according as Livie himselfe hath left in writing; seeing that the affaires of the Romans which happened afterward, and carry more light and perspicuities with them, declare and tell us sufficiently the love and indulgence of Fortune? For mine owne part, I count this for one singular favor of hers, to wit, the death of Alexander the Great, a prince of incomparable courage, and spirit invincible, who being lifted up by many great prosperities, glorious conquests and happy victories, lanced himselfe in maner of a starre volant in the aire, leaping out of the East into the West, and beginning not to shoot the flaming beames and flashing rays of his armour as farre as into Italie; having for a pretense and colourable cause of this enterprize and expedition of his, the death of his kinsman Alexander the Milossian, who together with his army, was by the Brutians and Lucanians (neere unto the citie Pandæsa) put to the sword and cut in pieces: although (in trueth) that which carried him thus against all nations, was nothing els but a desire of glory and sovereignty, having propoised this unto himselfe upon a spirit of zeale and emulation, to surpassse the acts of Bacchus and Hercules, and to go with his armie beyond the bounds of their voiajes and expeditions. Moreover, he had heard say, that he should find the force and valour of the Romans, to be as it were a gad of Steele, to give edge unto the sword of Italie; and he knew well enough (by the generall voice and report abroad in the world, which was brought unto him) that famous warriors they were, and of greatest renowne, as being exercised and hardened like stout champions in warres and combats innumerable,

And verily, as I doe weene.

A bloudy fight there would have beene, if the undanted and unconquered hearts of the Romans, had encountered in the field with the invincible armies of the Macedonians: for surely the citizens of Rome were no fewer at that time in number, by just computation, than a hundred and thirty thousand fighting men, able all to beare armes, and hardy withall:

Who expert were on horsebacke for to fight,

And when they saw their time, on foot to fight.

The rest of this discourse is lost, wherein we misse the reasons and arguments that Vertue alledgeth for herselfe in her plea.

40 THE SYMPOSIAQUES OR Table-questions.

THE FIRST QUESTION.

Whether we may discourse of learning and philosophie at the table.

50 Ome there be (sir Sofinus Senerio) who say that this ancient proverbe in Greeke, Misrois iudiciorum ovum iudicium.

At banquet, wine, or any self,

I hate a well remembering guest.

was meant of * hostellers or rulers at feasts, who ordinarily are odious, troublesome, uncivill, saucy, and imperious at the table. For the Dorians who in old time inhabited Italie (as it should seeme) were wont to call such an one, perisquam. Others againe, be of opinion, that this proverbe admonisheth and teacheth us to forget all that hath beene done and said at the boord, and among our cuppes, when we have

have beene merry together. Heereupon it is, that in our countrey, men commonly say : That both oblivion and also the palmar, or the plant Perula, that is to say, Fenel-giant, be consecrated unto Bacchus; which giveth us to understand, that the errors and faults which passe at the table, are either not to be remembered at all, or els deserve to be chastised gently as children are. But seeing you also are of the same minde that Euripides was, namely : That howsoever

Bad things and filthy to forget,

Indeed, is counted wisdom great,

yet the oblivion generally of all that is spoken at the boord and when we drinke wine, is not only repugnant to this vulgar saying : That the table makes many a friend ; but also hath divers of the most renowned and excellent philosophers to beare witness to the contrary, to wit, Plato, Xenophon, Aristotle, Spensippus, Epicurus, Prytanis, Hicronymus and Dion the Academicke, who all have thought and reputed it a thing woorth their travell, to put downe in writing, the talke that had bene held at meat & drinke in their presence. And for that you have thought it meet, that I also should collect and gather together the principall and most memorable points of learned discourses, which have passed sundry times and in divers places, both here and there ; I meane aswell at Rome among you, as also with us in Greece, when we were eating and drinking together among our friends ; I settled my selfe unto it willingly; and having sent unto you three books heretofore, containing every one of them ten questions, I will shortly send you the rest, if I may perceive that these which you have already, were not altogether thought unlearned, impertinent, and without good grace.

The first question then, which I have set abroad, is this : Whether it be a seemly and decent thing, to philosophize, that is to say : To speake and treat of matters of learning at the table? for you may remember very well, that this question being moved upon a time at Athens after supper : Whether it were besitting those who are come to make good cheere, for to enter into speech, or maintaine discourse, as touching philosophical matters or no? and if it were : How far forth it might be allowed, and within what bounds it ought to be limited? Ariston, one of the company there present : What (quoth he) and are there any persons indeed (tell me for the love of God) who denie philosophers and learned men a room at the boord? Yea many are there (my good friend, quoth I againe) who not onely doe so, but also in good earnest and great gravitie (after their ironical maner) give out and say : That philosophie, which is (as it were) the mistress of the house, ought not to be heard speaking at the boord, where men are met to make merry; who commend also the maner of the Persians for good and wise, who never would seeme to drinke wine merrily, and untill they were drunke, nor yet to dauce with their wedded wives, but in the company of their concubines : for seembly, they would have us at our feasts and banquets, to bring in musike, dances, plaies, masks and counterfeit pleasures, but in no wise meddle with philosophie; as if she were never meet for mirth and play, nor we at such a time fit and disposed for serious study. For even so the oratour Socrates (say they) could never be brought to make any other answer to those that earnestly intreated him, and were very urgent, that he should make some good speech before them, when he and they were drinking wine, but this : The time fitteth not now for those matters which I professe, and have skill in; and of such things as this present time requireth, I am altogether unskilfull. Then Crato crying out with aloud voice : Now so god Bacchus helpe me (quoth he) I con the man thanke, and commend him highly, for refusing and (as it were) for swearing talke at table, in case he meant those long clauses and tedious traines or periods of sentences of his, wherewith he should have driven away all the Graces from the feast. But, in my conceit, it is not all one, to banish from the boord an affected speech or rhetorical language; & to chafe away a philosophical discourse; for certainly, philosophie is a farre different thing, which being the arte professing to teach us how we are to live, there is no reason to shut the doores against her, at any game, sport, or pleasant pastime for our recreation whatsoever : for she ought to stand by, and be present at all, for to instruct us what time, what measure and meane we should observe : unlesse by the same rule, we will say, that we must not admit to our feasts, either Justice or Temperance, or other vertues, as scorning and scoffing (forsooth) their venerable gravitie. Now, if we were to eat and drinke some where in a solemne judicial hall or public place of justice, as the maner is of those who feasted Orestes, and entertained him with all silence; somewhat it were, and peradventure it might serve for some pretense or excuse (though the same were but an untoward and unhappie precedent) to colour and cloake our ignorance and incivilitie; but in case, Bacchus be by right furnished Lyfius or Lydius, that is to say, the Deliverer and Setter free of all things, and principally pally of the tongue, from which it taketh away the bit and bridle, giving all libertie to the voice; I suppose it were meere folly and sottishnesse indeed, to deprive that time (which commonly is most talkative and fullest of words) of the best speeches and most fruitfull discourses : It were absurd (I say) to dispute in schoole, what duties are to be observed at a feast; what is the office of a guest; how a man should be have himselfe at the table; & in what sort he ought to drinke wine; and then afterwards wholly bereave all banquets and feasts of philosophy, as if the were not able to continue that by deed, which she prescribeth and reacheth in word. And when thereupon, you inferred and said : That it was unmeet and bootlesse to goe about for to contradict Crato in these points, but it behooved rather to studie what limits to appoint, and what prescript forme to set downe of philosophical discourses at the table, to avoid that jest (which usually and not unpleasantly is cast forth at them, who are given litigiously to cavill, argue and dispute, when they should eat) taken out of this verse of Homer :

For this time now to supper goe yee,

That soone twist in a combat may bee.

and with all exhorted and animated me to speake mine advice, I entred into speech and said. That first and foremost I thought it a point especially to be considered, what manner of persons are meet at a feast, and what the company is? for if there be more in number of learned men than of others at the boord, such as the table was of Agathon, of Socrates, of Phaedrus, Pausanias, Eryximachus, Calbias Charmidas, Anisphenes, Hermogenes and others like unto them, suffer then we will have philosophical talke, tempering and mixing Bacchus, (that is to say wine) no lesse with the mules than with the Nymphes, (that is to say waters;) for that, as these make him to enter and goe downe into the bodie milde and gentle; so the other may cause him to be as kinde, courteous, and acceptable to the minde. For if so bee there are some few ignorant and unlettered persons, among many learned and skilfull clearks, yet will they like unto mute letters, and consonants betwene vowels, participate with them in a kinde of voice, not altogether inarticulate and insignificant, yea, and learne somewhat by those means, of their skill and knowledge : but say there be a sort of rude guests, such as can abide to heare either the crowing and singing of any bird whatsoever, or the found of any string or piece of wood, it skils not what it be, rather than the toong of a philosopher : then were it good to practise that which Pisistratus did; who being at some debate and difference with his owne children, and perceiving that his enemies were well enough contented therewith, and laughed thereat in their sleeves; called a solemne assemblie, wherein hee delivered this speech unto the people : That desirous he had beene indeed to have drawn his children to his owne opinion, but since it would not be, and seeing how obstinate they were bent, he meant to be ruled by them, and to follow their minde; even so a learned man and a philosopher being marched with other guests, that have no list at all to give eare unto his sage sawes and wise words, will range himselfe to their side, and change his owne conceit, he will I say, dauce after their pipe, and take pleasure in their pastimes, so long as they exceed not the bounds of honestie and civilitie; as knowing thus much : That men cannot shew and exercise their eloquence but in speaking, but they may declare and practise their philosophie even in silence and saying nothing; yea, and indisporting themselves with others, giving and taking pretie scoffes interchangeably. For it is not onely a point (as Plato saith,) of extreme injustice, when a man is unjust, to make a semblance and shew of justice, but also a kind of soveraigne & principall wisdom to philosophie, & yet to seeme no philosopher, & by way of game & mirth, to doe the serious offices of those that are in good earnest, studious : for like as the franticke women in Euripides called Bacche, without armes or any weapon of iron and Steele, onely smiting with their little javelits or ferula-stems, wounded those that set upon them; even so the pleasant words of true philosophers indeed, cast out by way of jest, yea, and the very laughers of wise men are able to moove and correct in some sort, such as are not altogether incorrigible, nor so hard as nothing will pierce and enter into them. Moreover, I suppose there be certaine narrations fit to be related at a feast where men are assembled, whereof some be drawn out of written histories, others, present occasions and occurrences do daily yeeld, and those containe examples to incite and provoke men partly to the study of philosophie, and in part to pietie, religion & devotion toward the gods: some induce us to imitate generous & magnanimous acts, others ingender a fervent zeale to performe the works of bountie and humanitie : which precedents, he that can closely and with dexterity use as documents and instructions to those that be drinking with them, so as they perceive him not, shall discharge the time which they drinke, of many vices, and those not the least, which are imputed unto it: some there be, who put leaves of buttrage into their wine, others be, sprinkle the floores and pavements of parlours and dining-chambers with water, wherein they have infused or steeped the herbes vervain & maiden-haire; having an opinion, that these devices procure some joy and mirth in the hearts of those who are at a feast; and all to imitate ladie Helene, who, as Homer reporteth, with certaine spices and drougues that she had medicined and charmed (as it were) the wine that her guests should drinke; but they doe not perceive, that this tale being fetched from as farre as Aegypt, after a great way and long circuit, endeth at the last in honest discourses, fitted and accommodated to time and place: for that the said Helene recounteth unto them as they drunke with her at the table, the travels of noble Ulysses, and namely,

*What things this valiant knight had done,
and what he had endured;*

*What wrongs also he wrought him selfe,
to which he was inured;*

For this was that Nemethes (if I be not deceived) a medicine which discusseth and charmeth all sorrow and paine, even a discreet speech, framed aptly and in season to the affections and occasions which are presented: but men considerate, well advised, and of good judgement, howsoever they may seeme to deale in philosophie, yet they carrie their words, and place them so, that they are effectually, rather by a gentle way of perswasion, than by force and violence of demonstration. For thus you see how Plato also (in the treatise called, His banquet; where hee discusseth of the final end of humane actions, of the soveraigne good of man, and in one word, treachery of God and heavenly matters, like a divine and theologian) doth not enforce and stretch the prooffe of his demonstration, nor bestrew powder as it were with dust his advertisement, according to his wonted manner, otherwise to take surer hold, that hee might not possibly struggle out of his hands; but induceth and draweth on the hearers his guests, by a weaker kinde of arguments and suppositions, by pretie examples, and pleasant fictions. Moreover, the very questions and matters at such a time and place propounded, & not only their reasonings, ought to be somewhat easie, the problemes and propositions plaine and familiar; the interrogations also and demands probable, and carrying a resemblance of truth, and nothing darke or intricate; lest they doe perstringe and dazzle their eyes, who are not quick sighted, suffocate such as are but weake spirited, and in one word, turne them cleane away, who are but shallow witted and of a meane conceit. For like as there is a custome allowable, to removee and stirre (when a man will) the guests at a feast, by urging them either to daunce alone, or in a ring; but he that should force them to rise from the table, for to put on armour and fight in compleat harness, or to sling the barre, or cast a sledge, doth not only make the feast unpleasant and nothing acceptable to his guests, but also hurtfull unto them; even so, easie and light questions, exercise mens spirits handsomely, and with great fruit and commoditie; but we must reject and banish all disputations of matters litigious, intricate, and snarled (as Demetrius saith) to wit, knottie questions & hard to be undone, such as both busie themselves, who propose them, and trouble those that heare them. For thus it ought to be, that as the wine is all one and common throughout the table; so the questions propounded at a feast or banquet, to be talked of, should be intelligible unto all, for otherwise, they who broch matters so darke and mystically, were as unreasonable, and should have as little regard of the common benefit of their company, as the crane, and fox in Aelops fables, had one of the others good. For the fox having invited the crane to dinner, set before her a good messe of fattie broth, of beanes and pease, which he had powred upon a broad shallow stone vessell, in such sort, as the poore crane was made a foole and laughing-stocke by this meanes, for that with her long and small bill she could get none of it up, but it went still besides, it was so thinne and glibbe withall: the crane againe, because she would be quit and meet with the fox, bad him to dinner, and presented unto him good victuals within a bottle, that had a long and narrow necke, at which she her selfe could easily convey & thrust her bill to the very bottome; but Reinard was not able to take out his part with her; even so, when learned men at a table plunge and drowne themselves (as it were) in subtle problemes and questions interlaced with logicke, which the vulgar sort are not able for their lives to comprehend and conceive; whiles they also againe for their part come in with their foolish songs, and vaine ballads, of Robin-hood and little John, telling tales of a tubbe, or of a roasted horse and such like; enter into talke of their trafficke and merchandise, of their markers and such mechanicall matters; certes all the fruit and end of such an assemblie at a feast cast is utterly lost, and were injurie done to god Bacchus: for like as when Phrynicus & Aeschylus first brought a tragedie (which at the beginning was a solemne song, in the honour of Bacchus) to fables and narrations pathetically, arose this proverbe: And what is all this I pray you to Bacchus? even so it comes many times into my minde to say thus unto one that draweth by head and shoulders into a feast, that sophisticall and masterfull syllogisme called Koelion. My good friend, what is this to Bacchus? Haply there is some one who singeth certain of these ordinarie songs at feasts, called * Scotia, as a man would say oblique or crooked, when the great standing cuppe of wine is set in the middes of the table before all the company, and the chaplets of flowers divided & dealt among the guests, which that god Bacchus putteth upon our heads, to signifie, that hee giveth us all liberty: but surely this is neither good nor honest, ne yet becoming that freedome which should bee at feastes, howsoever some say, that those sonnets are not darkly composed, as the word Scotia seemeth to implice, which signifieth crooked; but that they rooke the name, because in old time the guests, at first sung altogether with one voice and accord, one song in the praise of Bacchus, and afterwards every one in his turne chanted another apart; giving one to another in order from hand to hand, a branch or garland of a myrtle tree; which I suppose they called * Asaron; for that he who tooke the said branch was to sing in his course: and to the same purpose, a lute there was, or an harpe that went round about the table; and looke who could skill to play upon it, tooke it in hand and sung thereto in measures; but those who had no knowledge at all in musike, and refused the said instrument, gave occasion of the name Scotia, because such maner of singing was not common or easie unto all: others there be who say: That the said branch of myrtle went not round about to all the guests in order, but passed from table to table, or from beddeto bedde; for when he that sat formost at the first table, had sung, he sent it to the principall or first man of the second, and he to the chiefe person of the third; and so consequently, the second did by the second; by reason whereof, and in regard of this crosse and overthwart varietie in the oblique revolution thereof, the song was called Scotia.

THE SECOND QUESTION.

Whether the master of the feast ought himselfe to asigne unto every guest his place, or suffer them to sit as they will themselves?

MY brother Timon having upon a time invited many persons to a feast, willed every one of them as he entred in, to take his place, and sit where he thought good himselfe, for that there were among them, strangers, citizens, neighbours, familiars, friends, and kinsfolke, and in one word, all that were bidden were not one mans children, but a medley and mixt number of all sorts and conditions. Now, when as they were for the most part, come already, and had taken their places, a certaine stranger well appointed, like an amorous gallant in some comedie, all in his purple, excessive otherwise in curious and costly apparel, attended beside, with a traine of lacquies and pages following at his heeles; and in one word, better guarded than regarded, came to the doore of the hall or dining-chamber, who after he had cast his eye round about, and viewed all the companie how they sat at the table, would not enter in, but slung away immediately and stayed not. Many there were who ranne after him, requesting him to returne and beare them company; but in no wise would hee, saying, That he saw never a place left, woorthy his person: which when they who were set already, understood, (and many of them had taken their drink well, and had in maner their full load) they being right glad, tooke up a great laughter, and with this note:

Now farewell he, since needs he will be gone, Better his room, than company (quoth each one.)

but after that supper was done, my father addressing his speech unto me who sat a great way off: Timon and I (quoth he) have chosen thee for a judge, to decide a matter of some question and difference betwene us: for I blamed and reprooved him a pretie while since, about this itanger; for if at the first, he had ordered the matter well, according as I would have had him, and bestowed every man in his owne place, we should not have bene condemned for our oversight and disorder in this behalfe, especially by such a person who hath the skill

*Horsemen to range in comely battell ray,
And targetiers on foot, to leade the way.*

For it is reported that Paulus Aemilius (him I meane, that defeated Perseus king of Macedonie, after that glorious victory) made many great and magnificent feasts; wherein (besides the wonderfull furniture and provision that he ordeined) he observed in all points a singular order & discipline, saying: That to one & the same man belonged the knowledge, as well how to set out a most friendly and merry feast, as to range a most terrible battell; for both the one and the other required great discretion and good order: which was the reason that Homer the poet was wont (when he spake of right valiant warriours and most roial personages, deserving best the highest place of command) to rearme them κατακτάμενοι κἀνδράσι, that is to say, the disposers and setters of the people in order. Yea, and you that are philosophers, doubt not to say and affirme: That the great God of heaven (in making and creating the world) did nothing but change disorder into good order, without putting to or taking away ought that was before, by disposing and setting every thing in place, meet and convenient; and so, by giving a most beautifull forme to that confused masse or Chaos in nature, which had no forme at all, wrought this admirable piece of worke, which we call the World. As for these great & high points indeed of doctrine, we learn them of you; but we our selves are able to see and observe thus much; that how sumptuous soever a feast be otherwise, yet if it want good order, there is no grace or pleasure at all in it. A very ridiculous thing it is therefore, and a mere mockery, that cooks, clerks of the kitchen, and sewers, should be so careful what dishes ought to be served first, second, in the middle, or in the last place; yea, and (beleeve me) to looke unto it very diligently, that there be a convenient place ordeined for perfumes and sweet odours, when they are to be brought in; for chaplets also, and garlands, that are to be distributed & dealt about; and last of all, for a minstrell wench (if any be there) to sing & play, where she may be best heard; & in the mean while the master of the feast, suffer those who are bidden to all this, for to sit pell-mell at the table at a venture, as if they came onely to fill and cram their bellies, without giving (either to age, or to dignity, or to any matter of like qualitie) that rank and order which is fit, decent, & meet for every one: in the keeping of which discretion, the best man in the place hath his due honor in sitting highest; he that is second & inferior, is by use and custome acquainted and well contented to sit accordingly; and the huiher, who hath the ordering of the matter, is well exercised, to distinguish and judge that, which is befitting every one according to his estate and degree. For it can not stand with any reason, that in the Counsell-house there should be a place knownen, either of sitting or standing, more or lesse honourable, according to the quality and dignity of the person; and that for setting men at the table, there should be the like order observed. And is it meet, that the host or master of the feast should drinke to one before another, and yet have no regard at the first, in placing of his guests? putting no difference nor observing any distinction at all? making of a feast, even in the very beginning, one μυκνος (as they say in the common proverbe) which is as much as a mish-mash and confused mingle-mangle of all. And thus much of the reasons and allegations of my father, for his plea. But Timon my brother, on the contrary side, answered: That he was not wiser than sage Bias; and considering, that he refused alwaies to be arbitratour or umpire betweene two of his owne friends, though they requested him; why should himselfe become a judge at once, among so many kinsfolke and friends, yea, and other persons besides? especially, where the question is not about money and goods, but as touching preeminence and superiority; as if he had sent for them all, not to be merry and make good cheere, but to disquiet them, and set them out one with another, who were good friends before? For if (quoth he) Athenes in olde time, committed one great absurdity, in so much as there grew upon it, a proverbe and by-word, in that he intruded himselfe unsent for, into the counsell of Agamemnon? far greater reason theris, that he should be thought more absurd, who constituteth and maketh himselfe, of a courteous host and civill master of a feast, an austere judge and precise censurer of those that require no such matter, nor willingly desire, that one should determine and judge of them, who is the better man or the worse; seeing they are not cited peremptorily to a iudiciall court for triall of a controverisie, but invited friendly to a good supper, for to mak merry? Over and besides, no easie matter it is, to make distinction aright; for that some go before in age, others, in degree of kindred and linage; and therefore, he that should take such a taske or charge in hand, ought evermore to be studying upon the degrees of comparison, or els of the argument in logicke, A comparatis, that is to say, drawn from comparifon; and to have alwaies in his hand, either the Topiques of Aristotle, or els the Precedences of Thrasymachus, a booke which he entitleth Hyperbollantes, wherein a man should doe no good at all; but contrariwise much harme, by transferring the vain-glorie about higher place, from iudiciall courts, common halles and theaters, ters, to sitting at feasts; and when he hath endeavored to abate and repress other passions of the foote by good fellowship and company-keeping, now stirre up and set on foot pride and arrogance; of which in mine advice, we ought to studie more for to cleanse our soules, than to wash and scoure away the dirt and filth from our feet: to the end that wee may converte familiarly and fellowlike at the table, with all mirth and singlenesse of heart. But now, when we goe about and do what we can with one hand, to take away from our guests all rancor and enmity, bred either upon anger, or some worldly affaires that they have had together, in making them eat at one table, and drinke one to another, wee doe as much as lies in us, with the other hand to stir an old fire, and kindle a new fire of grudge and malice by ambition, in debasing one, and exalting another: but if withall, according to the preference which wee have made in the placing of them, we take the cuppe also and drinke othner, or set better meat and daintier dishes to some than to others; if I say we make more of this man than of that, cheere one up, and speake unto him after a more familiar manner than to another; surely, in stead of a feast of friends and familiars, it will be a stately assembly altogether of lords and potentates. But if in all things else we are careful and precise in our feasts, to observe and maintaine equalitie of persons; why beginne we not at the first, in the placing of our guests, to accustome and acquaint them for to range themselves, and take their seats simply and familiarly one with another? considering at the first entrance into the hall or great chamber, they see that they were nor summoned aristocratically to a senate house of lords and great States, but invited democratically and after a popular manner to supper, where the poorest may take his place with the richest, like as in the state of a citie and common-wealth, called Democratic. After these opposite reasons were alledged, and that all the company there present demanded my sentence, I said: That taking my selfe chosen as an arbitrator, and not as a judge, I would deale indifferently, and with an equall hand in the middle betweene both: As for those (quoth I) who feast young men their equals, all friends and of familiar acquaintance, they ought to accustome them (as Timon saith) to carie themselves so void of pride and arrogance, that they may take contentment in any place whatsoever that falleth out unto them; and to think this facilitie & singlenesse of heart, to be a singular meanes and provision for the feeding and nourishing of amity: but in case the question be of entreteining strangers, or worshipfull personages of high calling & great place in common-wealth, or of elder persons; I feare me, that as wee shut out at one dore in the forefront pride and arrogance, so we let it in at another backe-gate behinde, by our indifference and making no distinction. Heerein therefore we ought to give somewhat unto use and custome, or else we must altogether forbear all manner of cheereing up, drinking to, and saluting of our guests, which fashions we use not without judgement and discretion hand over head, to such as we meet with or see first; but with as great regard and respect as we can, honoring them according to their worth and qualitie:

*With highest place, with friends of the best,
With most cups full, and those not of the least.*

as said Agamemnon that great king of the Greeks, putting as you see the seat in the first and 40 cheefe place of honor. We commend also king Aleimus, for that he placed the stranger who came in, next unto himselfe,

*And caus'd his sonne Laodamia, a gallant, for that guest
To rise, who close to father sat, and whom he loved best.*

For to displace a best beloved sonne, and in his roome to set an humble suppliant, was a singular example of rare courtesie, and humanitie. And verily the gods themselves doe observe this distinction of place, and of sitting: for Neptune although he came last into the assemblie of the gods in counsell,

50 *Yet took he his owne place for all that,
And in the mids of them he sat.*

as being the feat which of right appertained unto him. And Minerva seemeth alwaies to challenge as proper and peculiar to her above all others, the very next place to Jupiter: which the poet Homer doth after a sort covertly insinuate unto us, speaking of dame Thetis in this manner:

*By Jupiter she sat, of speciall grace
And favour; For Minerva gave her place.*

But Pindarus significth as much in expresse tearmes when he saith:

To lightning next thus flasheth fire
Sat Pallas, close unto her fire.

Howbeit, Timon said: That we ought not to take from others, for to gratifie and pleasure one; and take he doth away, who maketh that vulgar and common, which by right is proper; & proper there is nothing more than that which is meet and befitting the dignitie of each person: moreover, in giving that superioritie and preeminence to running first, and making most haste, which is done unto vertue, kinred, magnificence, and such other qualities, in seeming to avoid the opinion of being odious or offensive, to his bidden guests, he draweth upon himself, so much more trouble and heart-burning of others; for he offendeth them in depriving everie one of that honour which he deserveth, or is wont to have. For mine owne part, I doe not thinke it so hard a piece of worke to make this distinction, as hee would have it to be: for first and formost, it is not ordinarie nor often scene, that many men of like degree and dignitie, are bidden to one and the same feast; besides, being as there are, many honorable places, a man of judgement and discretion, hath good meanes to dispose of them accordingly, among manie, if there be occasion: for one of them he may content in setting him highest and above the rest; another he may please with a place in the midst; to one he may doe the favour, as to set him next unto himselfe; another he may gratifie by placing him close to some friend or familiar of his, or else fast by his master and teacher: in this order, I say, he may satisfie many of them who seeme to be of better reputation, in distributing the places also which are of more respect among them; as for the rest, I leave them meanes also for their contentment; namely certaine gifts, favours, civilities, and kindneses, which may in some sort make amends for the want of some honorable place. But say, that their deserts and dignities be hard to be distinguished, or the persons themselves not easie to be pleased; marke what a device I have in such a case to serve the turne: My father (if he be present) I take by the hand, and set him in the most honourable place of all; if not, I do the same by my grand-father, my wives father, or mine uncle by the fathers side, or my colleague and companion in office, or els my fellow-senator and brother-alderman, or some one of those who hath some speciall and inward prerogative above others of honour and account, with the master of the feast himselfe, that biddeth the guests; taking this for a rule in the cases borowed out of the books of Homer, which are presidents of duties, and shew what is becoming every man to do; and namely, in that place where Achilles seeing Meneleus and Antilochus debating the matter very hotly, about the second prize for horse-running, and doubting how farre forth their anger and contention might proceed, would needs give the said prize in question, to a third man; pretending in word, that he tooke pitie of Eumelus, and that he was minded to doe him some honour; but indeed and trueth, it was to take away the occasion of difference and quarrell betweene the other two. As I was thus speaking, Lamprias, who was set close in an odde corner of the chamber, upon a low pallet, thundering out his words after his wonted manner, demanded of the assistance or companie, in this wife: My masters, please it you to give me leave for to reprove and rebuke a little, this fottish judge here? and when everie one made answer, saying: Good leave have you, speake your mind freely, & spare him not: And who can (quoth he) forbear that philosopher, who setteth out and disposeth of the places at a feast, like as he would do in some theater, namely, according to birth and parentage, wealth and riches, estate and authority in common wealth? yea, and as if he ordeined the seats and sitting places, for to opine or give voice in that solemne assembly of the States of Greece, called Amphictyones to the end, that even at the very table, where as we are met to drinke wine and be merry, we should not be rid of ambition, nor shake off the foolish desire of glory: for surely, the places at a feast ought not to be distributed so, as respective to honour, but rather to the ease and pleasure of the guests that are to sit in them; neither is the dignitie of each one by himselfe in degree to be regarded, but rather, the affection, disposition and habitude of the minde one to another, how they can fort and frame together like as our maner is to doe in some other things which are to meet in one common conjunction: for a good architect or mason will not (I trow) lay his first worke or forefront of the house, with Atticke or Lacedaemonian marble, before the Barbarian stone, because the same is in some sort of a noble kinde, and comming from the worthier place; neither will a cunning painter dispose his richest and most costly colour in the principal place of his picture; nor the carpenter or shipwright, employ before all other timber in the stem of his ship, either the pine tree wood of Palmos in Peloponnesus, or the cypresse of Cande: but so they order and distribute, their stone, their colours and their timber, that being joined and fitted well together one with another, the common worke arising of them all, may be be more firme and strong, faire and beautifull, good and commodious. And thus you see, God himselfe, whom our poet Pindarus calleth the best workman and principall artian, doeth not place the fire alwaies aloft, nor the earth below, but according as the use of bodies compounded doth require; like as Empedocles testifieth in these verses:

The oysters, murets of the sea,
and shet-fish every one,
With maske coat, the tortoise ke with cruell as hard as stone, And vaulted backe, which arch-wise he aloft doth hollow reare, Shew all, that heavie earth they do not in that place which nature ordeined for it in the first constitution and framing of the universall world, but in that which the composition of a new worke requireth: for disorder and confusion is bad enough in all things; but when it commeth among men, especially when they are drinking and eating together, it sheweth her badnesse most of all, by insolencie, outrages and other enonimities that can not be numbred; which to foresee and remedie, is the part of a man industrious, well scene in policie, good order and harmonie. And that is well said of you (answered we) but why envie you to this company that science of order, proportion and harmonie, and doe not communicate it unto us? Surely there is no envie at all (quoth he) in the way, in case ye will beleeve me and be ruled by me, in that which I doe change and alter in the order of the feast, like as you would be directed by Epaminondas, if he should range a battell in good order, which before was in disorder. We all agreed and gave him leave to do: then he voiding first out of hall or dining-place all the boies and lackies, cast his eie upon every one of us in the face, and said: Hearken and give care, how I meane to range and sort you one with another; for I would advertise you of it before-hand, because I am of this minde, that the Theban Pammenes, justly and upon good reason reprooved Homer, saying that he had no skill at all in * love-making, for that he ranged together in battell those who were of one and the same nation, and mingled such as were of the same race, lineage and bloud; whereas he should have joined the lover, and the beloved, to the end that the whole battell might be incited by one spirit, and draw in the same line, as linked by a lively bond. Semblably, will I doe in this feast of ours, not coupling at the table, one man with another; nor matching a young man with a young man; ne yet setting a magistrate or a ruler just by another; no, nor two friends together: for surely such an ordering as this, hath no life in it, no vigor and power at all, either to breed and imprint, or to nourish and augment the heat of mutuall benevolence and affection of one to another; but framing and applying to that which hath need, the thing that is fit and proper thereto, I would have a student to sit next unto a learned man; a milde and gentle person, unto one that is hard to be pleased; to an old prating fellow who loves to heare himselfe speake, a youth who is desirous to heare, I would place a boasting and glorious bragger, with a drie childe and soothing companion; with a testie and colerike man, one who is silent or of few words: if I see a rich or mighty personage, and withall, bountifull and free of gift, I will fetch out of one corner or other, some poore honest body to be his next-neighbour, to the end that from him (as out of a full cup) there might overflow some goodnesse, into another which is void and emptie: but I will be very wary and circumspect, that I doe not sort two orators or professed rhetoricians together, nor match one poet with another; for according to the proverbiall verse:

A begger can no begger well abide,
And chamer one by another is envied.

Howsoever these two heere Sesiles and Modestus, confirming in alternative course the speeches one of another:

Blow not the coles that ready are to dy,
But just accord together must friendly.

I sever also a sundrie busie and troublesome persons, such as take one another by the throat, injurious folk, testie and cholerike men; interposing alwaies some milde and modest nature betweene, as a emollitive of their hardnesse, for feare they should crush and bruse one another: contrariwise, I bring together, such as love wrestling and other exercises of the bodie, hunters also, and those that professe husbandry: for of similitudes and resemblances, two sorts there be; the one quarrellous and given to fight, as that of cocks; the other loving and amiable, as that of jaies or dawes. Also those that be good companions, and can drinke well, I use to set and match close together; yea and amorous folke:

*Not onely those who feele hot fantasies pricke
To boies, and of love masculine are sicke.*

As Sophocles saith, but such also as are pinched with the love of wives and maidens; for that being heat and enchaufed with the same fire, they will catch and take hold the sooner one of another; like as pieces of iron that cleave and be united together, when they beecd hot; provided alwaies, that their love doe not settle in one place, whether it be male or female.

THE THIRD QUESTION.

What is the reason, that the place at the table named Consular, is held honorable?

After this, there arose a question as touching the places of sitting at a table; for that some are reputed honorable in one countrey, and some in another. Among the Persians, the middle place is accounted best; for therein sitteth the king: In Greece the first is held chiefe and principall: and the Romans make most regard of the last in the middle pallet or table; and this commonly is called the Consular place; whereas contrariwise, certaine Greeks that inhabit the country about Pomus, & namely those of Heraclea, reckon the first of the said middle pallet, the highest place of honor: but we made most doubt of the the said place called Consular: for the same was in our time also counted honorable; but not in regard, that it was either the foremost or the middles; and besides, of the accidental qualities observed therein, some were not proper and peculiar to it alone, and others seemed to be of no importance at all: howbeit, three reasons alledged there were, which seemed somewhat to moove and induce us above the rest: the first was this: That the consuls having deposed and expelled the kings of Rome, and chaunged all into a more popular estate, withdrew themselves from the roiall place in the middes, to a lower roome, to the end, that by quitting and forgoing the place which to them appertained, they might avoid all occasions of making their power and authoritie odious unto those that conversed with them. Secondly, that seeing the two first tables or pallets being destined and appointed for the guests invited, the third, and namely the first place thereof, belonged properly to him who made the feast; for there sitteth he most commodiously, in manner of a coachman in a chariot, or pilot in a shippe; to see the whole order of the service: neither is he farre from other tables, but that he may cheere up & welcome all the company: for, of the places nere unto him, that underneath is appointed usually for his wife or children; and that above, ordinarily and by good right, was allowed for the most honorable personage of all them that were bidden, to the end, that he might sit neere unto the master of the feast. Thirdly, this place seemed to have this propertie by it selfe, that it was thought commodious for such as were employed and had any affaires in hand. For the Roman consull was nothing like unto Archias sometime the captaine generall of the Thebans; who if there had beene brought unto him any letters, newes, or advertisement of importance, in the middes of supper time; or if there fell out any serious occasions, would cry out aloud and say: To morrow morning will we thinke of earnest matters; the pacquet of letters he laid aside, and in stead thereof, tooke a boule of wine in hand: the Roman consull (I say) was not such an one, but even at these times especially he is most vigilant, and looketh circumspectly about him, for not onely according to the common proverbe in Aeschylus:

The night alwaies even to a pilot wife

Breeds wo, for feare lest tempests should arise.

But also amide all pleasures, feasts, and pastimes, is requisite in a wife captaine, and man of government, that he alwaies stand upon his guard, and carrie a watchfull eye about him; to the end therefore that he might evermore be ready to understand all occurrents, to command also, to direct, signe, or subscribe if need required: this place was allotted unto him of purpose above the rest: wherein, by reason that the second table stood close joined to the first, the corner within the turning, leaveth a space open, or void distance, giveth roome and meanes very handiome for a secretary, a notarie, a sergeant, or apparitor, a pencioner, or one of the guard, yea & to any messenger or pursuivant coming from the campe, to approach neere unto the consull, to declare his message, to aske any question, or to commune & confer with him, & that without troubling any body, or being molested by any person there met at the feast or banquet quet: for both his hand is his owne and at command, and also his voice at liberty, to say and doe whatsoever he would.

THE FOURTH QUESTION.

What manner of man he ought to be, who is chosen master of the feast?

Crato my sonne in law, and Theon our familiar friend, being with us at a certaine feast, where there beganne some misrule and disorder, upon large drinking of wine, which notwithstanding was soone appeased, tooke occasion thereby, to speake of the masterie and presidency of such feasts observed in old time, being of this opinion, and saying (withall to me) That I ought to weare a chaplet of flowers on my head, and not suffer the auncient custome of creating a king or governour of the feast; who is to give order in all things, and to see there be no misrule, by disuse and discontinuance to be utterly neglected and abolished; but rather that I ought to bring that laudable order up againe, and put it in practise. Of the same minde was the whole company, and liked very well of the motion; inso much as they all with a loud voice and one accord, requested me to take the thing upon me: Seeing then (quoth I) that you be all of this minde, I am content to chuse my selfe president, and master of this feast: and heere to beginne withall, I give commaundement to all the rest, that for this present they drinke at their owne discretion, and as it pleaseth themselves: as for Crato and Theon, who were the first that set this matter on foot, I will by vertue of my office and place, enjoin them summarily and in few words, to declare heere before us, what manner of person ought to be chosen for the president, and master of such a feast, and what he must aime at, when he is elected; as also how he is to carry himselfe towards those who have made choice of him; and this charge I laie upon them two, permitting them to divide it betweene them, and to handle it according to their good discretion. At the first, they made some semblance of refusal, praying me to hold them excused: howbeit when they saw the whole company crying upon them for to obey the president, Crato began first & said: That as the captaine of the guard or watch, ought himselfe especially to be a most diligent & vigilant warder, according to the saying of Plato; even so should he who hath the command of guests met together for to make merrie, be himselfe of all other a right good fellow, and a cheerefull companion; and such an one he shall be, in case hee be neither one that will quickly be cup-shotten, and overseene with wine; nor yet untoward and unwilling to drinke liberally; much like as Cyrus wrote sometime unto the Lacedaemonians: That as in all other points he was more woorthy to be a king than his brother; so in this respect especially, that he would take his wine in greater measure, and beare the same better than he: for hee that will bee soone drunke, groweth insolent, unseemly, and outrageous in his drunkennesse: and he againe, who is too too sober, and abstinent altogether, becometh unpleasant and unfociable, meeter indeed to be a schoole-master, and to have the bringing up of boies, than a president of a feast, to order guests. Pericles, so oft as he was chosen captaine generall of the Athenians; no sooner put on his mantle of estate, and was ready to set forward, but before any thing else, used thus to say unto himselfe, as it were to refresh his memorie by way of admonition: Looke about thee now Pericles; thou hast the command of free men; thou commaundest now the Greeks; nay thou art commaunder of the Athenians; even so should our master of a feast reason thus within himselfe: Thou hast the rule now of friends; to the end that he neither permit them to doe any unseemly or dishonest thing; nor bereave them of their delights and pleasures; for as he ought to be friendly affected unto them in their serious occasions, so he must be no enemy to their sports and pastimes, but framed indifferently, and as it were well tempered for the one and the other; & yet by his naturall disposition, he should, like good wine, be somewhat more inclined unto a kind of hardnesse or austeritie: for by this meanes the wine which he drinketh, will reduce his manners and behavior to a meane or mediocrity, by moistning as it were and softning it, that it may be more gentle and pliable: for as Xenophon said: That the sadde cheere, heavy and rusticall severitie otherwise of Cherchan, seemed to be more lightsome and pleasant in battell and conflict, by reason of his resolute confidence; even so, he who is by nature not bitter nor crabbed, but only grave and severe, by drinking, becometh more remissive, and not so straight laced; and by that meanes more lovely and amiable also. And thus much of his owne person.

Moreover, he ought above all things, to know by experience, every one of the guests: what alteration alteration there is wrought in them by drinking? into what accidents or passions they be ready to fall; and how they can beare strong wine? for wee are not to thinke, but if there be a proper temperature and severall mixture with water fit for every sort of wine; which kings tasteth, and cup-bearers know well enough, and in that regard can discern and distinguish, when they are to use more or lesse water to the delaying of wines; there is more reason that there should be a temperature likewise of man and wine, which our master or president of a feast ought to know, and when he knoweth it, to observe; that like an expert musician, by stretching as it were & setting up one, a note higher, in making him to drinke largely, and letting downe another by causing him as much to spare, he may bring and reduce different natures unto an uniforme equalitie & consonance, not measuring the same by waight & measure, pintes or quarts, to not by so many cups or glasses, but going by a certaine rule of time and age, as also by the strength of the bodie, giving to each one that which is meet and convenient. Now if peradventure this seeme an hard piece of worke, namely, to know all these particularities; yet meet it is at leastwise that he should be skilful in generalitie, as touching severall complexions & ages; as for example; that old folke are sooner and more easily made drunke than yong persons; those that be stirring and in continuall motion, rather than such as be in repose and rest; sadde, hea-vie, pensive, and melancholike men, more than those who are jocund and merry; lastly, those who are chaste, or use women modestly, much more than such as be dissolute or excessively given that way. He that is thus farre forth acquainted with these circumstances, may be a meet-er and fitter person a great deale to mainteine decencie, order, and agreement at a feast, than he who is ignorant therein. Furthermore, what is he who knoweth not very well, that the master of a feast ought to be well affected, and to carrie a loving minde unto all those who are invited to a feast; to carrie neither open malice, nor secret grudge to any one of them: for otherwise, if he commaundeth ought, it will not be well taken; if hee distribute and deale amongst them, he shall not be thought equal and indifferent; last of all, if he be disposed to mirth and jollitie, he shall hardly escape a rebuke and blame. Lo, Theon, what manner of president and master (quoth Crato) I have framed unto you by words, as if he were wrought out of waxe, and him I deliver into your hands. Then answered Theon: And I receive him from you so much the rather, as one shaped and fashioned indeed for a right governour of a feast, and a good companion besides: but whether I shall ever use him or no, or whether in so doing I shall shame my selfe; I wot not: howbeit, this I am assured of, that if hee be such an one as you have described, he will know how to order & governe a feast, & not suffer that one while it seeme a solemne assembly of a cite, another while a schoole of rhetorike, now a knot of dice-players or cheaters met together, and anon a scaffold forsooth for dauncers and singers, or a stage for plaiers and comedians: this I say, for that you see ordinarily some making orations, and pleading at the table, as it were in the court, or at the barre before judges; others exercising themselves how to speake in publike, or else rehearsing and reading certeine of their owne compositions; and others againe taking upon them like judges of dauncers and stage plaiers, who doe best for to winne the prize; and yet this is not the worst: for Alcibiades and Theodorus made of Politics feast, a very place of divine misteries, representing there the solemne carying of torches and other ceremonies, at the shewing of some sacred reliques; which I would not have a good master and president of a feast to be so carelesse as to abide; but to allow place and time for such talke, such spectacles, sights, plaies, and pastimes onely, which tend to that end for which feasts be made; that is to say, to breed and augment amitie betweene them that are present, by the meanes of the delight they take in eating together; for that in truth, a feast is nothing else but a pleasant recreation at the table, aiming at this marke, to contract friendship by the entercourse of mutuall drinking one to the other.

But forasmuch as in all things, varietie is very pleasing, and nature joiet in nothing more than in diversitie and change; but contrariwise, a simple uniformity alwaies, one and the same, is hurtfull, and bringeth tediousnesse with it incontinently; whereas the mixture of divers things applied in time and place with measure, taketh that away which is offensive to pleasure, and hurtfull to profit: therefore the master of a feast must devise for his guests, and exhibit unto them some mixed sport to passe away the time whiles they be drinking. I have heard many men say, that to walke by the sea side, as also to saile along the shore, is most pleasant; and even to a man must joine alwaies sport with serious affaires, and profit with pleasure, to the end that those who play, may in some sort be in good earnest; and likewise, when they be busie in serious matters, find some recreation; like as those who are sea-sicke, and ready ever & anon to cast up their their stomacke, recover their spirits and are revived, when they see how they be neere the land; even so a man may profit in mirth and laughter; he may likewise laugh and be merry in profit, and make his serious affaires pleasurable enough; for as the old proverbe goeth:

With calt brop thistles, and among the prickly rest-harrow,

The violets and soft wasflowes are alwaies wont to grow.

But as for all other sports & plaies, which without any profit at all, leape impudently into feasts, he shall command his guests expressly to forbear, lest ere they be aware, they become outrageous and furious, like as those who have taken the juice of henbane: they also abuse their power, & go too far in their commandements, (for so they be called at the wine) who enioine flouters, stammerers and mafflers to sing, or bald-pates to kembe their heads, or lame creeplees to go up-right on their feet without halting. Thus upon a time at a certeine merry meeting and feast, where Agamemnor the Academicke philosopher was, who had a withered legge, and nothing left thereof but skin and bone, all the company (by way of mockerie) insulted upon him, and made a law among themselves, that they should stand all upon their right leg, and every one drinke his boule of wine, or els pay a certeine piece of money, as a forfeiture: now when it came to Agamemnor turne, by right to command, he charged them all to drinke in that sort and maner, as they saw him to drinke: then called hee for an emptie earthen pitcher with a narrow mouth, to be brought into the place; into which when he had thrust his poore consumed legge afore said, he drunke up his cup of wine; and when all the rest had assaid, and found they could not do as he did, were all forced to pay the forfeit. Herein was Agamemnor to be commended: for after his manner, the master of a feast ought to be revenged, in a kinde of mirth and gentle sort; also to accustom himselfe to such commaundements, as tend to pleasure and profit both, charging each one to doe those things which be proper, possible and easie for him, and yet may commend the doer: as for example, to impose upon them who have good voices, and be professed musicians, to sing; oratours and rhetoricians, to declame; philosophers, to asseile darke questions, and cleere ambiguities; and poets, to pronounce some of their verses; for every one of these joietly and taketh pleasure, to be put to that

Wherein he knowes he can do well,

And other men farre doth excell.

There was some time a king of the Assyrians, who by voice of heralds, and found of trumpet, proclaimed a great prize and reward to him that could devise a new kinde of pleasure: but the king and governour of a feast, should doe very well, to propose an honourable reward unto him, that could invent an honest game or pastime, wherein were no insolencie, some delight or disport profitable, and procure laughter not accompanied with wanton reprooche and scornfull reproch, but such as carrieth a grace and pleasure with it: for this is it wherein most part of feasts suffer shipwracke, namely, when they are misgoverned, or not ordered as they ought to be. But the part it is of a wise and prudent man, to know how to avoid enmity and anger in the marketplace, gotten by avarice; in the publicke halles of bodily exercises, by contention and emulation; in bearing offices and suing for them, by ambition and vain-glory; and last of all, in feasts and banquets, by such plaies and pastimes.

THE FIFTH QUESTION.

What is meant by this common proverbe: Love teacheth musicke and poetrie.

The question was mooved one day in Sosim Severim house, after certeine verses of Sappho were chanted, how this saying of Euripides should be understood:

Love teacheth musicke, make when you will,

Tough one before, thereof had no skill.

considering that the poet Philoxenus reporteth, how Cyclops Polyphemus the giant, cured his love by the sweet tongued muses? Whereupon it was alledged, that Love is of great power to moove a man for to be bold, hardy and adventurous, yea, and ministreth a readinesse to attempt all novelties, according as Plato named it, the enterpriser of all things; for it maketh him talkative and full of words, who before was silent; it causeth the bashfull and modest person, to court it, and put himselfe forward in all maner of service; it is the meanes that an idle carelesse lubber, and a negligent, becometh diligent and industrious; and that which a man would most marvell at, a mitching hard-head and mechanicall penitather, if he fall once to love, doth relent and waxe soft as iron in the fire, and so proveth more liberal, courteous and kinde, than ever before: so that this pleasant and merry proverbe, seemeth not to be altogether ridiculous & impertinent, namely: that Loves purse is tied & knit up with a lecke or porret blade. Moreover, it was there spoken: That Love resembled drunkenesse, for that the one aswell as the other, doth set folke in a heat; it maketh them cheerefull, merry and jocund; and when as men be come once to that, they fall soone to sing, to rime, and make verses. And it is said, that the poet Aeschylus composed his tragedies, when he had well drunken, and was heat with wine. I had a grandfather also my selfe, named Lamprias, who seemed alwaies more learned, witty, and fuller of inventions, yea, and to surpass himselfe in that kinde, when he had taken his cups liberally; and he was wont to say: That at such a time he was like unto incense, which being set on fire, rendereth the sweet odour that it hath. Moreover, they that take exceeding great pleasure to see their loves, are no lesse affected with joy when they do praise them, than in looking upon them: for love, as it is in every thing a great prater, and full of words; so especially and most of all, in praises: in so much, as lovers would willingly persuade others to that, wherein they are themselves persuaded first; namely, that they love nothing but that which is perfect in goodnesse and beautie; and others they would have to be wimmes with them of it. This was it, that induced the Lydian king Candaules, to draw and traine Giges into his bed-chamber, for to see the beautie of his wife naked: for why? such are willing to have the testimonie of others. Lo, what the reason is, that if they write the praises of that which they love, they embellish and adorne the same with verses, songs and meeter, like as images with golde; to the end that the said praises might be heard more willingly, and remembered better by more people: for if they bestow a fighting-cocke, an horse, or any other thing whatsoever, upon those whom they love, their minde is principally, that this their present should be faire and beautifull in it selfe; afterwards, that it be most gallantly and in best maner set out; but above all, in case they be disposed to flatter them in words or writings, their chiefe care is, that the same run roundly and pleasantly, that they be also glorious and beautified with fine figures, such as is ordinarily the stile of poets. Then Sophus approving well of these reasons, said moreover: That it were well, if some would take in hand to draw and gather arguments out of that which Theophrastus left in writing, as touching musick: For long it is not (quoth he) since I read over that booke; wherein he delivereth thus much altera divine maner: That three principall causes or roots there be of musick, to wit, paine or griefe, pleasure or joy, and the ravishment of the spirit; of which three, every one doth bend and turne so the voice a little out of the ordinary tune: for griefs and sorrowes, usually bring with them, moanes and plaints, which quickly run into song; which is the reason that we see oratours in the perorations or conclusions of their speeches, the actors also in tragedies, when they come to make their dolefull lamentations, bring their voices downe gently to a kinde of melodie, and by little and little tune them (as it were) thereto. Also the great and vehement joies of the minde do lift up all the body, of them especially, who are any thing lightsome by nature, yea, and provoke the same to leape, skip, and clappe their hands, observing a kinde of motion according to number and measure, if they can not dance:

And otherwise in furious sort,
Like frantike folke they do disport;
They shake, they wag, they set out throat,
And send out many a foolish note.

according as Pindarus saith. But in case they be somewhat more grave and staied, than others, when they finde themselves moved with such a passion of joy, they let their voice onely go at liberty, speaking aloud and singing sonnets. But above all, the ravishment of the spirit, or that divine inspiration, which is called Enthusiasmus, casteth bodie, mind, voice and all, far beyond the ordinary habit; which is the cause, that the furious and raging priests of Bacchus, called Bacchae, use rime & meeter; those also, who by a prophetical spirit, give answeres by oracle, deliver the same in verse; and few persons shall a man see starker mad, but among their raving speeches, they sing and say some verses. This being to, if you would now display love, and view it well, being so unfolded and laied open abroad, hardly shall you meet with another passion, which hath either sharper dolours, or joies more violent or greater extasies and ravishments of the spirit, lying (as it were) in a trance; so that a man may discover in amorous persons, a foule much like unto that city which Sophocles describeth:

Full of songs and incense sweet,
Of sighs and groanes in every street.

No marvell is it therefore, nor a strange thing; if love (containing & comprehending in it selfe

all those primitive causes of musick, to wit, dolour, joy, and ravishment of spirit, be likewise in all other things diligent, industrious, talkative, and namely, inclined to making of verses and chanting songs as much or rather more, than any other passion which can enter into the heart of man.

THE SIXTH QUESTION.

Whether king Alexander of Macedonie were a great drinker.

<sup>20</sup> THERE was some speech upon a time, as touching king Alexander the Great, to this effect: That he dranke not so much, as far long at his meat, and passed the time away, in devising and talking with his friends: but Philinus shewed by certaine scroles, papers, and day-books of the said kings house, that they who held that opinion, knew not well what they said; for that this particular instance was ordinarily and usually found in those records: That such a day the king slept all day long, upon his liberrall drinking of wine; yea, and other-whiles it appeareth, that he slept the morrow after likewise; which is the reason, that hee was not so forward in venerous matters, nor given much to women, though otherwise he was battie, quick and courageous; great arguments of an inward heat of bodie: and it is to be seene upon record: That his flesh yielded from it, and breathed a passing sweet smell; in so much as his shirts and other clothes were full of an aromaticall sent and savour, as if they had bene perfumed; which seemeth also to be an argument and signe of heat. For we see, that those be the hottest & driest countries, which bring forth cynamon and frankincense, according as Theophrastus saith: That a sweet odour proceedeth of perfect concoction and digestion of humours; namely, when by naturall heat, all superfluous moisture is quite chased and expelled. And by all likelihood, this was the principall cause, that Callisthenes grew into disgrace, and lost the kings favour; for that he was unwilling to sup with him, in regard that he would impose upon him to drinke so much. For it is reported, that upon a time, the great boule or goblet, furnamed, Alexanders boule, having passed round about the table thorowout, untill it came to Callisthenes, he refused it, and put it backe; saying withall: I will not drinke in Alexander for to have need of Aesculapius. And thus much

<sup>30</sup> was said then, concerning king Alexanders much wine-bibbing. Moreover, king Alithridates, he who warred against the Romans, among other games of prize which hee exhibited, ordained one for those who could drinke best and eat most; and by mens saying, himselfe performed them both so well, that he won the prize in the one and the other: for he could eat and drinke more than any man living in his time: by occasion whereof, he was commonly furnamed Dionysus, that is to say, Bacchus. But as touching the reason of this surname, wee say it is an opinion rashly received: for when hee was a very infant lying in the cradle, the lightning caught the swadling clothes, and set them on fire, but never touched or hurt his body, save onely that there remained a little marke of the fire upon his forehead, which notwithstanding the haire did cover that it was not greatly seene, so long as he was a childe: and

<sup>40</sup> gaine, when he was a man grown, it chaunced that the lightning pierced into the bed chamber where he lay asleepe; and for his owne person it was not so much as singed therewith; but it blasted a quiver of arrowes that hung at his bed-side, and went through it, and burnt the arrowes within; which (as the soothsayers and wise men out of their learning did interpret) signified, that one day he should be puissant in archers and lightarmed men. But most men affirme, that hee gat his surname of Bacchus, or Dionysus, in regard of the resemblance and likenesse of such accidents of lightning, and blasting, as many times befall.

After these words passed, they entred into a speech as touching great drinkers; among whom was reckoned also one Heraclides, a famous wrestler, or champion, whom the men of Alexandria in our fathers daies, pleasantly called little Heraclides. This good fellow when he could not away, but the pure and hot part thereof, continueth behinde, and pierceth forward still, by reason of the subtiltie that it hath, untill it be presented unto the nostrils. But we, receiving and admitting the principle of Plato, affirme & hold: That there passeth from the eyes an illuminate spirit, which intermingleth it selfe with the cleerenesse and light that is about the bodies of visible objects; by which meanes there ariseth an united composition from them twaine, according in every point one with another, but congregate they be by measure and proportion; for neither the one nor the other, ought to perish, as being surmounted by his fellow, but of twaine contempered together in iust proportion, there is made one puillance and meane facultie betwene. Seeing then, that the thing which passeth thorow the eye-sight of those persons who be farre slept in yeeeres, be it some fluxion, light some spirit, or bright beame, (call it what you will) is in them, weake and feeble, there can not be a mixture and composition of it, with the shining aire abroad, but rather an extinction and suffocation, unless they remove the letters a pretie way off from their eyes, and by that meanes temper and resolve the exceeding brightnesse of the light, so as the same hit not upon their sight, so long as it is too radiant and resplendant, but measured and proportioned to the feeblenesse of their eyes. This also is the cause of that which befalleth to those living creatures which see best in the darke, and feed themselves by night; for their eye sight being naturally weake, is offuscate and darkened by the great light of the day; for that such weak raies proceeding from so tender a source or fountaine, will not well fort & agree with so strong and forcible light; but their eyes do fend forth beames sufficient and proportionable, to be mingled with a light more dim and dusky, like as the light of a starre in the night season appeareth best: and thus being incorporate with it, it is cooperative to the performance of sense.

THE NINTH QUESTION.

What is the cause that clothes be better washed in fresh water than that of the sea?

THeon the grammarian, upon a time when wee were feasted by Metrius Florus, demanded of Themistocles the philosopher, how it came to passe that Chrysippus having made mention in many places of strange positions and paradoxes, which seemed to goe against all reason; as for example: That salt fish, or powdered flesh, if it bee watered or washed in sea water, becommeth more sweet: also fleeces of wooll are lesse pliable, if they be plucked forcibly, than if they be gently handled, tooled and drawn in sunder. Item, that they who have fasted long, chew their meat, and eat more slowly at first, than after they have eaten a little; yendeth no reason of the one nor the other: unto whom Themistocles answered: That Chrysippus propounded them by the way onely, and as it were for example sake to advertise and admonish us; for that we are ever ready to beleeve, even without all reason, any thing that cometh with it some small likelihood and probability, and contrariwise to discredit that which at the first sight seemeth unlikely: But what reason I pray you (quoth he) my good friend have you to search & enquire into these matters? For if you be so contemplative and inquisitive in finding out the causes of naturall things, you need not to goe farre from that which belongeth to your profession: but tel me why Homer bringeth in Nausicaa, washing her clothes in the river, & not in the sea which was so neere unto her; yet notwithstanding that salt sea water being hotter, more transparent, & absterfivie than fresh water of the river, seemeth by all appearance better for to wash withall: As touching this probleme (quoth Theon) long since hath Aristotle resolved it, referring all to the terrestriety of the sea; for that in sea water there is mingled much earthlie substance, which causeth it to be so sale, by reason whereof, it beareth them up better who swim therein; also it carrieth a greater and heavier burden than fresh water, the which yeeldeth and giveth way, as it is more subtle, lighter, and feebler, as being more simple and pure: in which regard it pierceth sooner, and by this penetrative facultie, it scoureth and cleneth away all staines and spotted better than sea water: and thinke you not that this reason of Aristotle cometh great appearance of truth? Yes verily (quoth I) there is appearance and probability indeed thereof, but no truth at all: for this I see ordinarily that the manner is to incrassate fresh water with albes or gravel stones; or if there be none to be had, even with very dust, as if the roughnesse of terrestriall substance were more meet and apt, to cleanse all filthinesse, which simple and cleere water cannot doe so well, by reason of the thinne subtiltie thereof, and because it is very weake: and therefore it is not well and truly said, that the thicknesse of the sea water hinddereth his effect. But the true cause is, for that it is penetrant and piercing; for this acrimonie doth unbinde and open the small pores, and so draweth forth the ordure outwardly; whereas contrariwise, that which is grosse and thicke, is never good and meet for to wash withall, but rather it maketh spots & steines: now is the sea fattie and oileous, which may be a principal cause why it is not good to wash withall: and, that sea water is unctuous, Aristotle himselfe beareth witness; for even salt it selfe hath a certaine fattinesse and unctuousity in it; by reason whereof, it causeth those lampes to burne more cleere wherein it is put: yea and sea water if it be sprinkled or dropped upon the flame, will likewise be of a light fire and burne withall; neither is there any water that burneth so much as that of the sea; and in this regard I am of opinion, that it is of all other water hottest: howbeit there may be another reason yielded: for considering that the end and consummation of washing, is to drie; those things wee hold most neat and cleane which are driest; and therefore the moisture that doth wash, must goe away together with the ordure; like as the roote of Elleboro is sent out of the body with the melancholike humour: as for the humiditie which is sweet and fresh by reason of the lightnesse thereof, the sunne draweth it up very quickly; whereas the saltnesse of sea water sticketh fast to the small pores, & by reason of the asperitie thereof is hard to be dried. Then Theon: This (that you say quoth he) is nothing, but very false; for Aristotle in the same booke affirmeth, that those who walk in the sea, are sooner dry than they that wash in fresh water, if they stand in the sunne. He saith so indeed (quoth I) but I thought that you would sooner beleeve Homer, who holdeth the contrarie. For Ulysses after he had suffered shipwracke mette with ladie Nausicaa:

All terrible and fearefull to be seene

For that in sea all plunge d/ she had bene.

Yea and himselfe said unto her women and waiting maidens:

Retire aside and stand you farre from me,

Faire damosels, untill such time you see,

That I have washt from off my shoulders raine

The filth of sea, that now my skinneth doth staine.

And when he had thus said, he went downe into the river,

And there anon, he scow'd cleane away,

The salt sea-fome, upon his head that lay.

In which place, the poet hath marvelous well observed and exprest that which ordinarilie hapneth in such a case: for that, when they who come forth of the sea stand drying them in the sunne; his heat doth presently dissipate the most subtile and lightest substance of the humiditie, and then, that which is most foule and filthy, remaining behinde, sticketh to, is baked and felted to the skinneth, in manner of a salt crust, untill it be washed off with fresh and potable water.

THE TENTH QUESTION.

What is the cause that at Athens they never judged nor pronounced the daunce of the tribe Acantis to be the last?

AT the solemne feast which Serapion made for the victory of the daunce, which the tribe or lineage Acantis obtained, by his leading and conduct: to which feast we were bidden, as being of that tribe; for that the people had endued us with the priviledge and right of bourgeoisie in the same; much talke there was occasioned by the great emulation and strife which had bene for the honour of that present daunce: and indeed followed it was with much zeale and heat of affection, by reason that king Philopappus himselfe in person, was a most honourable and magnificent president thereof, having defraied the charges belonging to the daunces of every tribe; who being present also with us, invited guests to this stately supper (as hee was a prince no lesse courteous and full of humanitie, than studious and desirous of knowledge) had put to discourse, such a matter as this, by Marcus the Grammatician, namely: that Xenobes the Cyzicene wrote in his fabulous narrations of this cite, that the tribe Acantis had by especiall honour, this speciall priviledge above the rest, that their daunce was never adjudged to the last place. That writer (quoth the king) is not sufficient to authorize an history; but supposing that this were true, let us make it the subject-matter of our discourse at this present, and search the cause thereof. But admit (quoth our friend Milo) that this were a false tale. What then?

(quoth king Philopappus) there were no great matter in it, if the like befall unto us for love of learning, as sometime did to the wife philosopher Democritus; who feeding one day (as it should seeme) upon a coucumber, when he perceived the juice and liquor thereof to be verie sweet, and to taste of honie; demanded of his maid-servant who attended upon him, where she bought it: who named a certaine garden: whereupon he rose from the boord, and would needs have her to bring him thither, and to shew him the very place where it grew: but the wench woondering at her master, and asking him the reason what he meant to be gone in such haste: Why (quoth he) I must needs finde out the cause of this extraordinary sweetnesse, and finde it I shall, when I have well viewed and considered the place: hereat the maiden smiling: Sit you still, good sir (quoth she) and let this thing trouble your head no farther; for the truth is this: I chanced before I was aware, to put this coucumber into a vessell that had honie in it. Then Democritus seeming to be offended and displeased with her: Thou angrest me to the heart with thy prittle-prattle, I will (I tell thee) go forward in this my intended purpose; and search into the cause hereof, as if this sweetnesse were naturall and came of the coucumber it selfe; and even so we will not pretend this readinesse and facilitie of Neantus in delivering some matters incredible, as an evasion or excuse, to avoid this present disputation: for if none other good will come of our discourse, yet I am sure it will serve well to whet and exercise our wits the while. Then all the companie at once with one accord, fell to praise the said tribe Acantis, relating and collecting what commendable acts foever and glorious feats of armes had bene performed by that tribe. And here they failed not to rehearse the famous battell of Marathon, which is a State belonging to the tribe Acantis. They forgot not to alledge likewise, how Harmodius and Aristogiron were Acantides, borne in Aphiæne, a towne of that tribe. Also Glauces the orator affirmed, that the right wing or point of that battell of Marathon, was assigned to them of that tribe, proving the same by the Elegies or verses which the poet Aeschylus had composed in the praise of their good service, having himselfe in person fought valiantly in the said conflict. Moreover, he shewed that Callimachus the high marshall of the field, being one of that lineage, both bare himselfe right bravely that day, and was one of the principall authors (after capitaine Miltiades) of that fought field, gave his voice with him, and perswaded to strike this battell. unto this allegation of Glauces, I my selfe added moreover, and said: That the decree or commission, by vertue whereof Miltiades led forth the Athenian armie with banner displayed, into the field, was concluded at what time as the tribe Acantis was president of the counsell at Athens; as also that the same tribe in the battell of Plates, carried away the praise and prise for their brave service above the rest: and hereupon it is, that this tribe of Acantis solemnizeth every yeere a stately sacrifice, for that victorie, as being commanded and appointed so to doe by the oracle of Apollo, upon the mount Cithæron, and the same performed by nymphes or maidens * Sphagittides: for the celebration of which solemnity, the city furnisheth them with beasts and other things needfull for the same sacrifice. But yet you see (quoth I) that all the rest of the tribes may as well alledge for themselves many valiant acts by them achieved; and namely, Leontis, from which my selfe am descended, which in glorious renoume, giveth place to none whatsoever. Consider therefore my masters, whether it bee not very like and more probable, that this was attributed unto it, for to appeale and comfort that worthy person who gave the name unto this tribe; I meane Ajax the sonne of Telamon, who had not the patience to endure the overthrow in judgement, and losse of Achilles armour, but was so farre inflamed with envie, emulation, and wrath, that he cared for nothing, nor cared for the ruine of all: to the end therefore that he might not fall into another fit of furie, and be implacable; thought good it wasto ease him of the thing which might of all things offend and vex him most, in that disfavour and disgrace, to wit: That the tribe which beareth his name, should never be thrust downe into the lowest and last place.

THE SECOND BOOKE OF the Symposiaques.

THE FIRST QUESTION.

What be the things whereof Xenophon saith: That men love better to be asked and to be scoffed at for, when they sit at the boord, than otherwise no?

- 40 If those things (ô Saisius Senecio) which are provided to furnish the feasts, and set out feasts and banquets, some are to be ranged as altogether necessarie; namely, bread, wine, viands, meats, both flesh and fish, benches, stools, formes, and tables; others be but accessories and may be spared, devised only for pleasure, and not upon any urgent necessity; as plaies, shewes, and pastimes brought in, either to be heard or seene; some pleasant buffon also or mery jester to make folke laugh, such an one as Philip in Kallatis his house, which disports men are delighted in otherwhiles, if they be presented, and if they be not, they are not greatly missed, nor much cared for, neither is the feast thought defectuous for want thereof. The same may be said of table talke: for one kinde there is which modest and civill men doe embrace and entertaine, in regard of their proper use fitting and agreeable for meales and meat indeed; another sort they admit, and allow as containing some gentle speculation, and the same becometh rather the time imploied in hearing musick, of flute, hautboies, lute and viall. And of both these, our first booke contained certaine miscellane examples one with another; as namely, of the first sort were these questions: Whether it be good and commendable, to treat and dispute of philosophicall matters at the table or no? Also, whether it be better, that the master of the feast himselfe place his guests, at the board, or permit them to sit at their owne discretion? Of the second kind be these; whereupon arose this common saying: That love teacheth musicke or poetrie; as also the question concerning the tribe Aeantes and such like. For mine owne part, I would call the former Symposica, as properly belonging to a feast; the other by the generall name Symposiaca, as becoming rather a banquet after the feast is done: howbeit set downe they are by me pell-mell, and not distinctly, but according as every one of them came into my minde and remembrance: neither must the readers marvell if I collect and gather certaine speeches for to dedicate unto you, which have bene haply held heretofore by others, or by your owne selfe: for albeit our learning is not alwaies a calling to remembrance, yet oftentimes it falleth out, that to remember and to learne, concur and meet together in one subject matter. Moreover, having digested in every booke ten questions, the first of this second is one, that Xenophon a disciple of Socrates, hath in some sort proposed unto us, when hee writeth: That Gobryas being upon a time at supper with Cyrus, as he praised many other fashions of the Persians, so he commended them especially in this: That they demanded one of another such questions, wherewith they stood better pleased, than if they had not bene asked at all; and betwene whiles, let sic such pleasant scoffes and jestes, as that the parties so scoffed at, liked thereof better, than otherwise if they had bene let alone. For if it be so, that other men, even with their praises many times offend us, why should we not greatly admire the seemly grace and wittie conceit of those, whose scoffes and jests yeeld pleasure and contentment to those who seeme to be mocked therewith? This is the reason why Sopater having one day invited us to a feast at Patrae, mooved this talke and saide: Gladly would I know what kinde of questions and interrogatories they were? of what nature, and what the manner of them was? For no small part it is (quoth hee) of our entercours and mutuall communication one with another, to have the dexteritie and skill, both to know and also to observe the decencie and congruities in such pleasant demands and facetie jests. Nay, (quoth I againe) a great matter it is; but marke, if Xenophon himselfe as well in the Symposium or banquet of Socrates, as in those of the Persians, giveth not us to understand what was the order thereof: and if you thinke good that we enter into this discourse, and that I should adde somewhat of mine owne. First and formost this is mine opinion: That men are well enough pleased to be asked those questions, to which they are able easily to answer, and namely of such things as they have best skill and experience of: for if one should demand of them, matters that they know not, either they be offended and grieved if they can say nothing unto them (like as those who are called upon to pay debts which they are not able to discharge) or if they bring out crosse, impertinent, and untoward reasons, they are much troubled, dismayed, and perplexed: whereas if their answers be not onely readie and easie, but also wittie and exquisite, so much the more pleasant and agreeable it is to the answerers: now those I count wittie and exquisite, which carie somewhat with them, that the common multitude knoweth not, or which few men have heard of; such as be the points of astrologie or logicke, especially if they be well seene therein, and have as it were the habit of them: for everie man is well pleased and appaied, not onely in practising and spending his time, as Euripides saith:

Whereby he may quit him so well,

That even himselfe he may excell.

but also in reasoning and discoursing of that wherein he hath best skill and knowledge. For men take great contentment when they be asked questions of that which they have an insight in, and knowing so much by themselves as they doe, loth they bee to have their cunning hidden, and to be thought of others ignorant therein: therefore those who have bene great travellers, and failed in many voyages, cannot be better pleased, than when others enquire of them as touching farre countries, strange seas, the manners, fashions, and customes of barbarous nations; and you bring them to bedde (as they say) when you put them to discourse of such matters; as being most willing to describe and draw upon a table the coasts, places, straights, gulfs by which, and through which they have passed, reputing it to be no small fruite of all their travels, and an easement of the paines which they have endured: in one word, looke whatsoever we of our selves are wont, without the demand and intreatie of others to recount and relate willingly; the same are we desirous that men should aske us questions of, and howsoever we seeme to doe pleasure unto the company, yet indeed we have much adoe to hold, and with great paine forbear to utter the same. This is a very maladic incident to failers and fea-men above all other. As for those that be of a more modest and civill nature, they are desirous to be asked those things, which they are willing enough to utter, but that they be abashed, and in reverent regard of them that be present, passe over in silence those exploits which they have performed happily and with great honour: and therefore good olde Nestor in Homer did very wittily, who knowing well the ambitious humour and desire of glory which was in Ulysses, spake unto him:

*Ulysses, flower of noble chivalrie,
Renowned knight, and all the Greeks glorie,
To tell us now, I pray (good sir) begin,
How ye both twaine didt those great battles win.*

- 10 For unwilling men are to heare those who praise themselves or recount their owne worthy acts, if there be not one or other of the company that is urgent with them so to do, or unlesse they be in manner forced unto it; and therefore they are glad, when they be asked concerning the ambassages wherein they have bene imployed; of their acts during the time of their government of State, especially, if they have performed some great and honourable service therein; and withall, perceive that it is not for envie nor malice, that such demands be made: for otherwise, such as be envious or malicious, weepe at those reports, and be ready to put them by, not willing to give place unto any narrations, nor to minister occasion or matter of talke, that may turne to the honor and commendation of him that delivereth the same. Moreover, this is another meanes to gratifie those who are to answer; namely, to move question of such things as they wot well enough, that their enemies and ill-willers are loth to heare. And verily, Ulysses said to Aleinu in this wise:

*A minde you have, to heare me tell my woofull miserie;
Thas I might still sigh, groane and waille for my hard destinie.*

Even so Oedipus in Sophocles answered thus to the company of the Chorus:

*A woe it is (my friend) to raise and wake
A griefe that long hath slept and rest doth take.*

But contrariwise, Euripides wrote after this sort:

*How sweet is it to one for to remember
The paine now past, which sometime he did suffer!*

- 30 True it is, but not to those who still wander, and (being tossed in trouble some seas) do yet meet with new misfortunes and calamities. But to returne againe to our former purpose; we ought to beware how wee demand ill newes: for men are grieved at the heart, to make report either how they have bene cast & condemned in any sure, or that that they have buried their children, as also, how infortunate they have bene in their traffique either by sea or land: contrariwise, they are well pleased to rehearse and repeat often times (if they be asked the question) how they have had good audience given them from the publike place of making orations, and obtained whatsoever they there demanded; how they have bene saluted and honourably entreated by some king and potentate; and how, when other passengers and travellers with them, have bene plunged into dangers of tempest or thieves, they onely escaped the perill: and for that in the bare relation, they seeme (as it were) to enjoy the thing it selfe, they can not be satisfied with the discourse and remembrance thereof. Also men rejoice and take delight, when they be asked as touching their friends, who are fortunate and doe prosper in the world, or of their owne children that profit well in learning and good literature, or have sped well in pleading causes, or otherwise are of credit in the court and with princes: semblably, they be very well content and pleased, to be moved for to relate, and so are more willing to make report of the losses or shameful disgraces of their enemies and ill-willers, whom either they have overthrowen at the barre and caused to be condemned, or who otherwise are fallen into any disastrous calamity: for of 40 themselves, loth they are, unlesse they be required thereto, to recount such things, lest they might be reputed malicious, and glad to heare of other mens harmes. A hunter loveth very well, to have speech and question mooved unto him as touching hounds; so doth a champion, and one that delighteth in bodily exercises, to be trained to talke of gymnasticall pastimes and seats of activitie, like as an amorous lover, of such persons as be faire and beautifull; a devout and religious man discourseth ordinarily of dreames and visions that hee seeth, and what good successe he hath had in his affaires, by observing the direction of oracles, the pretiges of augurie and omens, by doing sacrifice, and generally, by the grace and especial favour of the gods: and such be well pleased for to be asked questions as concerning these matters. As for old folke, you shall do them a high pleasure, if you put them to it, for to make any discourse whatsoever; for although the narration concerne them nothing at all, nor be to any purpose, yet if one aske them questions, he tickleth them in the right veine, and scratcheth them (as they say) where it itcheth. This appeareth by these verses out of Homer:

O Nestor, sonne of Neleus, tell me in veritie,
How Agamemnon, elder sonne
of Atreus, did die?
Where was his younger brother then,
for Menelaus might?
Lives he or no, in Achaea,
at Argos citie bright?

Here you see Telemachus asketh him many questions at once, giving him occasion and matter of much speech, not as some do, who restraining olde folke to answer to the point only which is necessarie, and driving them within a narrow compasse, bereave them of that which is their greatest pleasure. In sum, they that would rather please and delight, than displease and trouble, propose such questions, the answers whereunto, draw with them, not the blame and reproofe, but the praise and commendation; not the hatred and spight, but the amitie and good will of the hearers. And thus much may serve for interrogatories and demands.

As touching scoffes and merry jests, he that knoweth not how to use and handle them with dexterity, good discretion and skill, according to time and place convenient, I would advise him altogether to forbear them. For like as if men be in a slippery or ticklish ground, they that touch them never so little in running by, are able to overturne and lay them along; even so at the table, when we are drinking, in danger we be upon every small occasion in the world offered (by a word not well placed, or untowardly delivered) to fall into choler; yea, and many times, more moved we are with a scoffe or pleasant gibe, than with a reprochfull taunt or meere slander; for that ordinarily it is scene; that a reprochfull word proceedeth from a violent fit and sudden passion of anger, even against his will that giveth it; but we take more to the heart, a mocke or scornfull flout, as coming from a prepened malice, and a voluntary minde set upon mischief, without any necessity at all enforcing thereto; and to be brieve, we are in generall more offended with those that can give a drie frumpe in good sadnesse, than such as cast forth words at random. And this we hold for certaine, that every one of such frumps birteth fore, and seemeth to be an artificiall kinde of reproch devised and thought upon of purpose before-hand: as for example, if one call another salt-fish-monger, by that word he gives him openly a plaine reproch; but if he say, we remember well, that you are wont to wipe or snuffe your nose upon your sleeve, he mocks him covertly, and calles him as much by craft. The like frumpe it was, that Cicero used to one Octavius, who supposed to be an African borne: for when he seemed to excuse himselfe that he heard not what Cicero spake: And that is a great wonder (quoth Cicero againe) considering that you have an hole bored through your eare. And Aelantius being flouted and made a mocking stocke by a comedie maker: You have (quoth he) given me a reward that I never deserved, and paid me that which you owed me not: such gibes therefore and mocks as these, doe prick the worse, and much like to arrowes with barded heads, sticke longer by them who are thus flouted; and for their wittinesse more delight those who are present, than for any other pleasure else, seeme to winne credit unto him that useth them. For to speake a truth, a scoffe or mocke is nothing else but a covert and dissimuled reproch for some fault, according to Theophrastus: so as he that standeth by and heareth it, can make construction thereof, and ghesse how to adde more unto it, as knowing and beleiving all the rest behinde to be true. For no doubt he that laugheth heartily as if he were tickled, when he heareth the answer of Theophrastus to one, who being named for a common stripper of men out of their garments, as they went late in the streets, asked him if he went forth to supper? Yes mary doe I (quoth he) but I meane to lie there all night: such an one (I say) seemeth to confirme the opinion of the fore-said crime, for which the partie was suspected; inso much as hee that mocketh and scoffeth impertinently and without grace, possesse the standers by and hearers with malice, as if they insulted over the partie mocked, and were abettors themselves, as being glad that hee is thus derided or reproched. But in that noble citie Lacedaemon, among other good disciplines in times past there taught, men learned also to jest at others without biting, and not to count themselves selves nipped, when themselves were jested with: and if peradventure a man shewed himselfe discontented with some broad jest, and could not beare it well, the other partie presently gave over and was quiet. How then can it chuse but be an hard matter, to finde that kinde of scoffe or taunt which may content and please the party mocked: considering that it is a point of no small arte, nor meane experience and dexteritie to be able for to discern and judge, what it is that in the fear of mockerie which is not offensive. Howbeit to open a little the meanes thereto: First and formost it seemeth, that as these jestes touch and sting them most who know themselves to be guilty of those vices for which they be mocked: so the same frumps if they note men for such fautes of which they be most cleere, must needs in some sort be pleasant and acceptable unto them upon whom they be discharged. Thus Xenophon jesting pleasantly with that foule and illfavoured fellow above all others, all hairy, and as rough as a beare; said: He was the minion and love of Sambaulas. You may call to minde also Quintus a good friend of ours, who when he lay sicke in bedde, complained that his hands were cold: But you brought them warm enough not long since (quoth Aufidius Modestus), when you returned out of the province: which quippe being banded upon him, an honest and upright pretor, ministred occasion of mirth, contentment, and laughter; the same if it had light upon a proconfull that had used extortion or oppression, would have beene a girding and nipping reproch. This is the reason that when Socrates chalenged Critobulus the fairest young man then living, to compare their beauties, jested merrily with him, but scorned and derided him not. And Alcibiades himselfe was pleasantly disposed with Socrates, when he said: That jealous he was of faire Agathon. And even kings and great princes verily otherwhiles joy and take pleasure when they be spoken of, as if they were poore or private persons; like as one of these pleasaunts or parasiticall jesters, when king Philip seemed to gird and scoffe at him, returned upon him againe this word: What sir, know you not who I am, do not I keepe & mainteine you? For in reproching such persons with vices and defects, as which are not in them, they doe after an oblique manner give them to understand, and doe make knowne the vertues and perfections which they have. But heere wee must take heed and be sure in any wise, that such good parts they be indued withall indeed, and without all doubt; otherwise that which is spoken to the contrary, buzzeth in their heads, and breedeth a doubtfull suspicion in themselves: for hee that faith unto a rich and great monied man, that he will be his broker, and helpe him to some usurers of whom he may take up money at interest; or unto a sober person, who drinketh nothing but water, that he is a drunkard, or hath taken his wine too liberally; or he that calleth a liberal man, well knownen to spend magnificently, and ready to please all men, a base mechanickall kumbix, and a pinching peni-father; or he who threatneth a famous advocate or counsellor at the barre, who hath a great name for lawe and eloquence in all courts of plea, and besides for policie and government is in high authority, that he will bring him to a non-sure, or overthrow him judicially, he (I say) ministreth matter of good spirit and laughter unto the partie whom he seemeth so to chalenge or menace. After this manner king Cyrus became very lovely and gracious, by his singular courttesie, in that he would seeme to provoke his familiars for to performe those feats, wherein he knew himselfe inferior to them: and when Ismenias the famous musician plaid one day upon his lute, during the time of sacrifice, but so, as for all his musick there appeared no good prognosticks and signes, in the beast sacrificed, testifying that the gods were propice and well pleased; another mercenary minstrell, taking the instruments in his hand, kept a foolish and ridiculous tooting, full untowardly; and when all the company there in place reprooved him for it: To found an instrument (quoth he) to the contentment of the gods, is an heavenly gift: whereat Ismenias laughed a good, and made this answer: You take the matter amisse (quoth he) and cleane contrary, for whiles I plaid, the gods tooke so great pleasure in my musick, that they intended it onely, & had no while to accept of the sacrifice; but when thou beganest to meddle with the pipes, they received it immediately, and made haste to be ridde and delivered of thy absurd piping. Moreover, they who call such things as bee simply good, by odious and opprobrious names, and that in mirth, if they doe the same with a good grace; please more than those who directly praise the same; like as they doe nippe and bite more shrewdly, who give reproches under faire and lovely tearmes, as for example: such as call wicked persons, Aristides, or base cowards, Achilles: after the manner of Oedipus in Sophocles, when he said:

Creon who had beene always kind
And even at first her faithfull friend.

Another kinde there seemes to be of ironicall praise, opposite unto the former; namely, when semblant is made of blame and reproofe : which maner of praise, Socrates often used ; as for example, when he called the indolitious meane that Antisthenes practised to reconcile men and make them friends, as also to gaine good will and fauour, broakage, bauds-craft, enticement and allurements : as also, for that the philosopher Crates, had a good grace with him wherefoever he went, and because he was ever welcome, honourably received, and kindly entertained into what house soever he came, he was commonly named Thyrepanacles, as one would say ; The doore-opener. Furthermore, that mockerie is pleasing, which goeth in maner of a complaint, and yet carrieth with it a kinde of gratitude and thankfulness. Thus Diogenes speaking of his master and teacher Antisthenes,

*Who clad me in a cloake thred bare,
And made me ragged clothes to weare;
Who forced me to beg my food,
And houselesse for to wake abroad.*

For nothing so good a grace it would have had, in case he had used these words: He who made me wife, contented, and happy. Also a certaine Laconian, who making a shew, that he blamed the warden of the publicke stoupes and halles of exercises, for giving him wood so drie, that it would not so much as smooke, said thus of him : Here is one, by whose meane we can not be suffered to shed a teare. Semblably, if a man should call him who kept a bountifull table, and feasted him every day, a tyrant and taker of men perforce, saying withall, that he would not suffer him to eat his meales at home, nor to see so much as once his owne table in so many yeeres space : like as if one should complaine of the king, for making him, of a poore man, rich and wealthy, in these tearmes : That he had laied wait for him to doe him a shrewd turne, in taking from him his repose and leasure, and bereaving him of his sleepe and naturall rest : or as if some man having gathered plenty of good wine, turning againe upon the gods Cabeiri in Aeschulus, should accuse them, for that they had caused him to have scant of vineger in his house, as they themselves in boud and mirth had menaced to doe. For these kinds of covert, secret and diffinuled praises, enter farther, carrying with them a greater grace and more effectually by farre, in such sort, as they who in this wise perceive themselves to be commended, are nothing offended thereat, nor take it in ill part.

Over and besides, it behooveth him who would give a frumpe or scoffe with a grace and dexterity, to know also the difference of a defect and imperfection, from studies and recreations whereto men are given : as namely, to distinguish betwene avarice or a contentious humour, and the love of musicke or of hunting : for as men can not abide to be twit by those, so they are very well contented to be scoffed at for these ; as Demosthenes the Mitylenæan plaied in this kinde pleasantly upon a time : for when he went to visit a familiar friend of his, who loved musicke passing well, and was much addicted to play upon the harpe ; after that he had knocked at the doore, and the other hearing that it was he, willed him to come in : But first (quoth he) I would have you tie up your harpe. But the parasiticall bassau of king Lysimachus, contrariwise rejoined in this sort as rudely and uncivillly ; for when the king had throwen a counterfeite scorpion made of wood, upon his coat, wherewith he first started and was afraied ; but when he perceived once that the king was merrily disposed, and did but make sport, came upon him againe : And I will fright you, sir king, as well (quoth he) come on, and give me a talent from you. The like regard ought to be had, and the same difference made, as touching the defects or imperfections of the bodie, at least-wise in many of them : for if men be jestled at, for that they be long-nosed and hawked, or otherwise have short snut-noses, they will but laugh thereat. Thus one of the minions of Cassander, was nothing offended with Theophrastus, when he said : I wonder at your eyes, that they fall not a finging, and make good musicke, considering your nose is set and hidden within them : meaning, that he had a nose so flat and sunken. To his head. And Cyrus seeing one with a long nose and hawked withall, willed him to marrie a wife with a short and flat nose : For then (quoth he) you would match well, and make a good medly betwene you. But so in case we jest and make game at those whose nostrils stinke, or who have a strong and unfavoury breath, they take it not well at our hands, but are displeased. On the other side, if they be plaied upon for their bald-pates, they can abide it well enough, and put it up ; but say a man mocke them for having but one eye or being blinde, they will not endure it. In deed king Antigonus would jest pleasantly with himselfe for the losse of one eye ; as namely, when there was presented unto him a supplication written in great capital letters : Why (quoth he) a man may see this, if hee were starke blinde, and had never an eye in his head : but Theophrastus of Chios his prisoner, he put to death, for that, when one to comfort him, came and said : That if the kings eyes once had a sight of him, he should be pardoned, and save his life : Why then (quoth he) God have mercie upon me ; for impossible it is for me to escape death : which he said, because king Antigonus had but one eye. Leo the Bizantine, when Pasades objected unto him his bleered eyes, saying : Mine eyes before with looking upon yours : Goe to (quoth he) you twit and reproch me, for a bodily infirmity that I have, and never looke your selfe upon a sonne of your owne, who carrieth the vengeance of God upon his shoulders : now this Pasades had a sonne, who was crumpled shouldered and bunch-backed. Likewise Archippus, who in his time bare a great sway in Athens, as being one of the oratours who led the people, and ruled the State, was very angry with Melan-thius, who alluding to his bunch backe, and scoffing thereat, used these tearmes : That he did not stand manfully upright in the defence of the citie, but *stouped and bended forward, as if he had suffered it likewise to leane, reele, and sincke downward. And yet some there be, who can carrie these broad jets patiently, and with good moderation ; as one of the minions of king Antigonus, who having craved of him a talent in free gift, and seeing that he was denied it, required at the kings hands, that he would allow him a good strong guard to accompanie him : For feare (quoth he) that I be forsaid by the way, and rifled by him, who enjoined me to carrie a talent of silver at my backe. See, how men are diversly affected in these externall things, by reason of the inequalitytie of their maimes, some after one sort, and some after another. Epanimondas sitting at a feast with his companions and colleagues in government, dranke wine as sharpe as vineger, and when they asked him why he did so, and whether it made for his health ? I know not that (quoth he) but well I wot this, that good it is to put mee in minde of my home diet. And therefore in casting out of jests and pleasant taunts, regard would be had of mens natures and dispositions, for that some have broader backs to beare scoffes than others : and endeavour we must, so to converse with men both in boud and in earnest, that wee offend no person, but be acceptable unto all.

As for love, a passion very divers it is, and passing variable, as in all other things, so in jests and gibes especially : for that some will take offence and be soone angry, others will be merrie and laugh it out, if they be touched in that point ; and therefore above all things the opportunitie of the time would be well observed : for like as when a fire is newly kindled and but weak 30 at the first, the wind will put it quite out, but when it hath gotten strength and burneth forth, it maintaineth, feedeth, and augmenteth the flame ; even so love, when it is a breeding, and whilst it lieth secret, and sheweth not it selfe, quickly taketh displeasure and offence against those that discover it ; but when it is once broken forth, and is made apparent and known to all, then nourished it is, and taketh delight to be blown (as it were) and enflamed more with scoffes and merry jestes : and that which pleaseth lovers best is this, when they be jestled with, in the presence of those whom they love, and namely in love matters, otherwise not ; and if the case stand so, that they be woonderfully enamoured upon their owne wedded wives, or young laddes by the way of honest and vertuous love, then they joy exceedingly, they glory and take a pride, in being scoffed at for the love of them. Heereupon Archippus being upon a time in 40 his schoole ; when one of these professed lovers and amorous persons, chaunced in communication, to give him these words : Me thinks this that you have said toucheth none of this companie ; replied thus and said : No more than you are touched and mooved ; and withall, shewed him a faire and well favoured youth in the prime of his yeeres sitting by him. Furthermore, good regard and consideration would be had, who they be that are present and in place, for otherwhiles, men are disposed to take up a laughter at merry words which they heare among friends and familiars, who would not take it well, but be offended thereat, if the same were delivered before wife, father, or schoole-master, unlesse it were some thing that agreed verily well with their humour : as for example, if one should mocke a companion of his before a philosopher, for going bare-footed, or sitting up at his booke all night long, studying and 50 writing ; or in the presence of his father for being thriftee, and spending little ; or in the hearing of his owne wife, that he cannot skill of courting and loving other dames, but is altogether devoted and serviceable unto her alone : thus Tigranes in Xenophon, was mocked by Cyrus, in these tearmes : What and if your wife, should heare say that you made a page of your selfe, and caried your bedding and other stuffe upon your owne necke ? She shall not (quoth he) heare it, but be an eye witness thereof, and see it in her presence. Furthermore, when they who give out such merrie taunts as these, be partakers therein, and in some sort doe include themselves withall, lesse blame-worthy they are, and nothing so much to be reprieved ; as for example : when * Cræcæmelion.

*I count all one, to make of* beanes, our meat,
As if the heads of parents we did eat.*

As who would say, that the Epicureans by this word zoogon, that is to say, beanes, meant arbitrarily and covertly, egges, because that the breeding of yong, or conception, in Greeke, is called zoogon, as if there were no difference at all, but they thought it all one to eat egges and the living creatures which lay them. Now if I had alledged my dreame unto them, for my defence, as the very cause of mine abstinence, certes, mine answer would have seemed more absurd and ridiculous, than the dreame it selfe, especially, to this Epicurean: and therefore I stood not greatly upon excusing my selfe unto the said Alexander, playing upon me so merily, but suffered him to feed and mainteine that opinion conceived of me: for surely, a pleasant man he was, honest, civill, and well learned. Howbeit, he tooke occasion hereupon, to set on foot that doubtfull question of the egge and the bird, which had busied and amuzed the heads so much of great naturallists, and searchers into the causes of naturall works, and namely to know, whether of the twaine was before? Whereat Sylla our familiar friend said: That with this little question of the henne and the egge, as with a small lever, screw, or such like engine, we shaked the great frame and weightie fabricke of the generation of the whole world, and therefore willed him to surcease and proceed no farther, to speake thereof. But when Alexander laughed at it, and made no more reckoning of it, than of a ridiculous question of no importance, nor consequence at all depending thereof; my sonne in law Firmus began in this wise: I must here borrow (quoth he) the indivisible elements of Epicurus, and make use of those mores or atomi of his; for it be true which he supposeth and laith for a ground: That small principles should alfoord beginning to great bodies; it soundeth by all likelihood to great reason, that the egge was before the henne: for as farre forth as by our senses we are able to judge, it is more simple, whereas the henne is a body mixt and compounded; and to speake in generalitie, the principle or element is ever first: the seed is a principle, and the egge full of seed, and lesse, than the chicke or living creature that is hatched of it: for like as the progresse and proceeding unto vertue is of a middle nature, betwene the first disposition and the final habit and perfection thereof; even so it should seeme, that the egge is a certaine proceffe and advancement forward of nature, tending to make a living creature of the seed disposed thereto: moreover, as in a beast or such a living creature it is commonly said and received, that the arteries and veines bee formed first;
semblable, good reason there is to hold, that the egge was before the bird, as the continent before the thing contained within: for so it is with very arts, which make the first draught of their works grossly without forme & fashion; but afterwards give distinct figure and shape to every part thereof, according to that which Polysetus the famous imager was wont to saie:
That their workmanship in potterie was then most difficult and hard, when the claie and the finger naile mette together: that is to say, when the worke was at the point to be finished: and therefore it standeth well to good reason, that the matter yeelding and obeying but slowly unto nature at the beginning, when she mooveth and frameth by little and little, produceth at the first, rude lumpes and masses, not as yet brought into shape and fashion, such as egges be; but as the frame grow to receive the impression of some forme, there is afterwards wrought out and framed a living creature within: for like as there is engendered first a grub, which in time growing hard by reason of drinelle, cleaveth and openeth in the end, and putteth forth another little winged flie, which we call Nympha, before it is a perfect bee; after the same manner, the egge here is the first subsistent matter of generation; for necessarie it is, that in every change and transmutation, that must precede and have a being first, which is to be alkered and turned into another: see you not how cankers or caterpillers are bred in trees, and wormes in wood, either by the purefaction, or concoction of humiditie? and will any man deny that the said moisture went before; and that by order of nature, that which ingendred is more auncient than that which is ingendered? for as Plato saith: The matter in all things that breed, serveth in stead of mother & nourice; and that is to be counted the matter, whereof the thing is composed, & con-sisteth which is bred. And now for that which remaineth (quoth he, and therewith he laughed)
I will sing unto those that be skillfull and of understanding, one holy and sacred sentence, taken out of the deepe secrets of Orpheus, which not onely importeth thus much, that the egge was before the henne, but also attributeth and adjudgeth unto it, the right of elderhip and priority of all things in the world: as for the rest, let them remaine unspoken of in silence (as Herodotus saith) for that they be exceeding divine and mysticall; this onely will I speake by the way:
That the world containing as it doeth, so many sorts and sundry kinds of living creatures, there is not in manner one I dare well say, exempt from being ingendered of an egge, for the egge bringeth forth birds and fowles that flie; fishes an infinite number that swimme; land creatures, as lizards; such as live both on land & water, as crocodiles; those that be two footed, as the birds;

such as are footlesse, as the serpents; and last of all, them which have many feet, as the unwinged locust. Not without great reason therefore is it consecrated to the sacred ceremonies and mysteries of Bacchus, as representing that nature which produceth and comprehendeth in it selfe all things.

When Firmus had discoursed in this wise, Senecio opposed himselfe and said: That the last similitude and comparison which he brought, was that, which first and principally made against him: For you marke not o Firmus (quoth he) how ere you were aware, you opened the world like a gate, as the proverbe saith, even upon your selfe; for that the world was before all other things, as being most perfect, and reason would, that whatsoever is perfect, should precede the unperfect; the entier and found goe before that which is wanting and defectious; and the whole before the part, for that there can be no parcell, but the whole thereof went before: for no man useth to speake thus: The seeds-man, or the egges henne; but contrariwise we say: The mans seed, and the hennes egge, as if both generative seed and egge did succceed and follow them, taking their owne generation in them first, and afterwards paying againe (as it were a debt unto nature) a successive generation from them: for need they have of that which is proper and familiar unto them, and thereupon are endued with a naturall desire and inclination, to produce such another thing as that was from whence they came: and hereupon it is, that seed is thus defined, to be a geniture or thing bred, having need and desire of new generation. Now there is nothing that either standeth in need or hath an appetite to that which is not, or hath no being: and wee may plainly see, that egges have their totall essence and substance, from that compact knot and composition which is gathered within the body of a living creature, and faileth herein onely, that it hath not such organs, instruments, and vessels as they have; which is the reason that you shall never finde written in any historie, that an egge was ingendered immediately of the earth; for even the poets themselves doe say: That the egge out of which sprang Cassio and Pollux, fell from heaven; whereas the earth even at this day produceth many comel and perfect creatures; as for example, mice in Aegypt, and in many other places, serpents, frogges, and grasshoppers, by reason that the principle and puissance generative, is infused and inserted into it from without. In Sicilie during the time of the Servile warre, much carnage there was, and a great quantitie of blood shedde and spilt upon the earth, many dead bodies corrupted and pu-trified above ground, lying unburied; by occasion whereof, an infinite number of locusts were engendered, which being spread over the face of the whole island, spoiled and destroyed all the come in the countrey: all these creatures therefore are bred and fedde of the earth; and of their nourishment they yeeld a generall superfluitie, apt to ingender the same kind, and that is called, seed; and for to be discharged thereof, by meanes of a certaine mutual pleasure, the male and the female match and couple together; and so some according to their nature, breed and lay egges; others bring forth yong ones alive; whereby it is evidently seene, that the primitive generation came first and immediately from the earth, but afterwards, by a certaine conjunction of one with another; in a second sort, they breed their yong. In summe, to say that the egge was before the hen, is as much as if the matrice were before the woman; for looke what relation there is betwene the said matrice and the egge, the semblable hath the egge unto the chicken that is ingendered and hatched within it. So that, to demand how birds were made when there were egges, is all one, as to aske how men and women were created, before the naturall parts and general members of the one sex and the other were made? And verily the members for the most part, have their subsistence and being together with the whole; but the powers and faculties come after those members; the functions succceed the faculties, and consequently, the effects or complements follow upon the said functions and operation: now the accomplished worke or perfection of that generative facultie in the naturall parts, is the seed or the egge: so that we must of necessitie confesse, that they be, after the generation of the whole. Consider moreover, that, as it is not possible that there should be concoction of meats or any nourishment, before the living creature be fully made and compleat, no more can there be any feed or egge; for that both the one and the other, is made by certaine concoctions and alterations:
neither is it seene, how before the full perfection of a living creature, there should be any thing that hath the nature of the superfluitie or excrement of nutrition; and yet I must needs say, that naturall seed otherwise, in some sort, may go for the principle and beginning of life; whereas the egge

egge in no proportion answereth to such a principle, for that it hath not a subsistence first, nor any reason or nature of the whole, because it is imperfect. And hereupon it is, that we never say, that a living creature had any being or subsistence, without an elementarie beginning: but we affirme, that there was a principle of generation, to wit, the power or facultie generative, by which the matter was transmuted, and wherein there was imprinted a generall temperature; and that the egge afterwards, is as it were a certain supergeneration, much like unto the bloud & milke of a living creature, after nourishment & concoction: for never shall you see an egge engendred of mud; for that an egge hath the generation and concretion within the bodie onely of a living creature; whereas there be an innumerable sort of creatures procreated & bred of mud and within mud. And to seeke no further for allegation of other examples to prove this, there be taken every day an infinit number of eeles, and yet never saw any man one eele, either milter or spawner, or that had any row in it. And more than that, if one let out all the water forth out of the poole, and cleanse it from all mud and mire, yet after the water is returned thither againe into the place, there will be eeles soone engendred. And therefore we may conclude necessarily, that whatsoever in generation hath need of another, can not chuse but be after it; and that which otherwise may be of it selfe, and without the other, must of necessitie precede and go before in generation: for this is that prioritie wherof I speake. To prove this, marke how birds do build and make their nests before they lay egges; women also provide cradles, clouts, beds, and swadling-clothes for their little babes, before they cry out, or be delivered; and yet you will not say (I trow) that either the nest was before the egge, or the swadling cloths before the infant. 20 For (as Plato saith) the earth doth not imitate a woman, but a woman the earth; and consequently, all other females. And very like it is, that the first procreation out of the earth, was performed entire, and accomplished by the absolute vertue and perfection of the Creatour, without need of such instruments, vessels, or secondines, which nature deviseth now, and frameth in parents, by reason of their imbecillity and weaknesse.

THE FOURTH QUESTION.

Whether wrestling were of all the exercises and games of prize, most ancient or no?

WE made a feast in the honour of Soficles the Coronean, for joy of the victorie which hee obtained at the Pythicke games, over all other poets. And when the time drew neere at hand, wherein the Gymnicke matteries and feats of activity, were to be performed; the greatest talke was at table, as touching the wrestlers; for that many of them resorted thither, and those the most renowned champions of all Greece. In our company was Lysimachus, one of the agents or procuratours of the high commissioners, called Amphictyones, who moved speech, and said, how not long before, he heard a Grammarian say: That wrestling was the most ancient combat of all those exercises that were named Gymnicke, for that they were performed by men naked; and he added moreover: That the very name thereof in Greeke, imported no lesse; for milus, aludeth neere unto milus, which is as much as [of olde] or [in times past.] And it may seeme 40 (quoth he) that ordinarily, the things that be moderne and newly devised, borrow the names imposed upon those that be of more antiquity: for so we say that aulo, that is to say, the fluit or hautboies, is turned, borrowing the tearme of aulos, which is a psalterie or stringed instrument: and we call even at this day, aulomata, i. the playing upon the pipe or hautboies, by the name of κενυματα, that is to say, striking with the fingers, which no doubt is a tearme fetched from the harpe or lute. And even so, the very place where they do exercise, who performe all feats of activitie naked, is named milusces, of milus, that is to say, wrestling; which (no doubt) was a denomination given to it at the first, and time out of mind, howsoever it be retained still, and extendeth to other exercises invented since, & taken up long after. Then began I, and said: That this argument and testimonie, was not sufficient to conclude thereupon: For admit (quoth I) that Palaestra was derived of milus, which signifieth wrestling, yet it was not because of all others it was most 50 ancient, but for that it is the only exercise that requirith cley, called milos; dust also and ceroma, which is a composition of oile and waxe, wherewith wrestlers be anointed. For surely, in these places, called Palaestra, there is practised neither running a race, nor fist-fight or combat with buffets, but only wrestling, called milus, and Paneration, wherein they go to it with hand and foot, yea, and by the very teeth and all: for that in these two exercises, the champions lie along other-whiles, and wallow in the dust and mire, named milos. And evident it is, that Paneration is is a mixt exercise of wrestling and fist-fight. Again: What likelihood or reason is there (quoth I) that wrestling, which of all combats is most wittie and artificiall, should likewise be of greatest antiquitie? for need and necessitie produceth that first, which is simple, plaine, and without arte; performed rather by fine force and maine violence, than by rule and method. When I had thus delivered my conceit, Soficles seconding my words: True it is (quoth he) that you say, and the better to confirme your opinion; it seemeth unto me, that milus is derived of the verbe μιλῶν, that is to say, to overthrow or lay one along by craft and deceit. Nay rather (quoth Philinus) it tooke the name of milus, that is to say, the flat palme of the hand, because this part especially of both the hands is most employed by them that wrestle; like as those, who 10 go to buffets, use their two fists or hands clutched together; wherupon, that maner of fight is called πύγμη, that signifieth, a fist; and the other, μῆλον of milus, that is to say, the broad palme of the hand. Howbeit, forasmuch as the poets use this verbe παλῶν, for πύγμη and μῆλον, that is, to firew and sprinkle dust, which wee wrestlers for to practise more than any other championions, it may be very well, that the word milus, was derived from παλῶν. Consider yet moreover (quoth he) how the curriers or runners in a race, do all that lies in them, to leave their concurrents a great way behind, and be as farre before them as possibly they can; those also that fight at buffets, though other-whiles they be very desirous to buckle and close together, yet the wardens and judges of the games will not permit them once to catch hold: but we see that wrestlers onely doe clasp about, and imbrace one another with their armes; and the most part of 20 their striving one against another, whether it be performed by taking hold either directly or indirectly, by tripping, by coping and tugging, doe all bring them together, and enterlace them: so that it is not unlike, that by reason they approach so as they do, and be neere one to another, their wrestling was first called milus, of milus, which signifieth neere at hand.

THE FIFTH QUESTION.

What is the reason that Homer among the combats of prize, setteth alwaies in the first place: The fight at buffets; in the second, wrestling; and last of all, running the race?

WHEN these words had passed to and fro, and after that wee had commended Philinus, Lysimachus began againe, saying: And which of all the games of prize should a man say was first performed? The race or carriere, as at the Olympique solemnities; for heere at the Pythique games, the manner is to bring in certaine champions at every severall game or plaie: first boies to wrestle, and after them, men-wrestlers also; then those that performe fist-fight, one after another; and likewise the champions called Panerationists: but there, after that children have achieved all their combats, the men grown were called in: Mary, this I would have you to consider well (quoth he) whether Homer hath not done very expressely, to shew the order which was observed in his time? for alwaies in his poemes the fight with fist among all the Gymnick combats, standeth first; wrestling second; and the running of a course last: Heere- 40 at Craes the Thesalian, woondring (as if he had beene amazed) O Hercules (quoth he) what a number of things are we ignorant of! but I beseech you, that if you have readily under your hand any of his verses, you would not thinke much to call them to our remembrance, and recite them: Why (quoth Timon then) it is well known in manner to all the world, and none there is but his eares resound againe with this; that in the honorable funerals of Patroclus, the same order of combats was precisely observed; and the poet keeping the same order still, and never missing it, hath brought in Achilles speaking unto good Nestor in this manner:

Heere father old, I give to thee,
This gift of meere gratiuee:
For now with fist thou maist not fight:
To wrestle still thou hast no might:
Thou canst no more the javelin lance,
Nor in the race thy selfe advance.

And anon he inferreth the aged grey-beard, answering with along traine of words, as the maner is of these old folke, after this sort:

The time was when at buffet fight,
the prize I wonne in field,

*And with my fist made Clitomedes for Oenops sonne, to yeeld:
Ancaeus the Pleuronien
in wrestling gave me place,
And Iphiclus by foot-man'ship,
I overranne in race.*

Afterwards in another place he speaketh of Ulysses, challenging the Phaeocians to combat in this wise:

*At buffets dry with good hard clutched fist,
At wrestling, or at running if you list.*

But of Aleinos making a kinde of excuse, and in sort condemning himselfe, in these words: 10

*At buffets hard we fight not well,
Ne yet in wrestling doe excell:
But swift of foot, and light we are,
And runne a course with you we dare.*

Thus you may see his order, he changeth not upon any occasion or occurrence presented, neither rashly, and as it came into his head, now in one sort, and then in another; but following from point to point, as it were by a certaine rule and prescript, what was the use in those daies, and what was done then; he keepeth himselfe to the same method, according as they likewise observe still in the said aunient order. After that my brother had finished his speech, I said: 20 That in mine advice he had spoken very well and truly to the point; but yet for all that, I could not conceive the reason of the said order: and some other were there present, who thought it unlikely, and were not perswaded, that in case of combat and achieving feats of activitie for victorie, either fighting with fists, or wrestling, should goe before running: and therefore they requested me to search farther into the matter, and to fetch the reason thereof from the verie original: whereupon I set in hand presently and ex tempore, spake to this effect: That I thought all these combats to be the very representations and exercises of warfare; for proofe whereof, the custome was and is at this day, after that these combats be performed, to bring into the place a foot-man in compleat harness, and armed at all pieces, as it were to witnesse, that this is the end whereunto tend all these exercises of the body, the contentions also and amulations, 30 for to gaine the prize, and the priviledge graunted unto the victours when they returned with triumph to those cities where they were borne; namely, to make some breach in the wall, and to throw downe some part thereof: the mystery and meaning whereof is thus much; that the wall of a citie serve in small stead, if there be no men in it who are able to fight, and know how to winne the victorie. In Lacedaemon they that once had gained the prize at these sacred and crowned games; by a speciall priviledge of honour, were allowed a certaine place in the battell, to be raunged neere unto the kings person, and there to fight: and of all living creatures, there is none but the horse onely that can obtaine the crowne in such games; for that he alone of all beasts, is by nature framed, and by discipline trained to accompany men in battels, and with them to fight: now if this be true, and to the purpose: VVe observe moreover (quoth I) 40 that the first and principall worke of those who fight in the field, is to strike the enemy; and to ward his blowes; the second is, when they be come to clofe and to grapple with hand-gripes, to thrust and assay how to overturne and lay one another under-foot: which by report was the vantage, that our countymen being well practised in the feat of wrestling, had over the Spartans, at the battell of Leuctra, whereby they overthrow them, & bare them to the ground: this also was the cause that Aeschylus the poet in one place, speaking of a valiant warrior, nameth him:

*A wrestler stout, and tried in field,
To fight it out with sword and shield.*

And Sophocles in one of his tragedies speaking likewise of the Trojanes, reporteth thus much of them in these rearmes: 50

*They love great horses for to sit,
as valiant men at armes;
Bowes banded at both ends they bend,
and draw with strength of armes;
They fight so close, they catch such hold,
and gripe fast with hands twaine,*

That

That in their wrestling, all their shields resound and ring againe.

The third is this, when all is done, either to flie and runne away apace, if they be vanquished, or else to follow hard in chase, if they be conquerors. By good right therefore, the fight with fists goeth first; wrestling followeth in the second place; and running commeth in the last; for that buffeting representeth the charging of the enemy, and the avoiding of his recharge; wrestling may be compared with the violent bukkling and conflict pell-mell in the medly; and by running, they learne how to pursue, or to escape by good footman'ship.

THE SIXTH QUESTION.

Why the pine, sapine, or pitch tree, and such other as yeeld rosin, will not abide to be grafted in the cutcheon, or by way of inoculation.

Soclarus feasting us upon a time within his orchards, which were well watered, and environed all about with the river Cephus, shewed unto us trees carrying armes and branchs of sundry sorts, after a very strange manner, and all by the meanes of a kinde of grafting in the budde, called inoculation: for there saw wee olive boughes growing out of lentiske or mastick trees; pomgranats out of myrtles; oakes there were which put forth faire perries or pearce-trees; and 20 plane-trees that admitted and adopted apple trees; figge-trees also which were grafted with mulberry impes and cions; other mixtures there were besides of wilde plants, so ramed and made gentle, that they bare frute: whereupon some other of the guests began to jest and be merry with Soclarus, saying: That he nourished certaine kinde of beasts, more monstrous than the fabulous Sphinges or Chimeraes of the poets. But Craton proposed this question: What the cause might be, that those trees onely which be oileous and full of rosin, admit not any such mixtures and compositions? For never shall you see pine tree that beareth the nuts, cypres tree, pitch tree or sapine, to maintaine or feede the graffe of a tree different in kinde. Then Philo, there is (quoth he) one maxime or principle held among the learned, and the same confirmed by the experience of husbandmen: That oile is an enemy to all plants; and there is not a readier way 30 to kill what tree soever a man will, than to rubbe or besmeare it with oile; like as bees also by that meanes are soone destroyed: so it is therefore, that all those trees which have bene named, are of a fattie substance, and have a soft and unctuous nature, inso much as there distilleth and droppeth from them pitch and rosin; and if a man make a gash or incision in any of them, they yeeld from within, a certaine bloudie liquor or gumme, yea, and there issueth from the torch staves made of them, an oileous humour, which shineth againe, because they are so fattie & unguinous: This is the reason why they will not joine and be incorporate with other trees, no more than oile it selfe be mingled with other liquors. When Philo had done with his speech, 40 Crato added thus much moreover: That in his opinion, the nature of their rinde or barke, made somewhat for the said matter; for the same being thinne and drie withall, yeeldeth neither a sure seat & socket as it were to the impes or buds (which there dies) to rest in, nor meanes to get sappe and nutriment for to incorporate them; like as all those plants which have barks verie tender, moist, and soft, whereby the graffes may be clasped, united, and foddered with those parts that be under the said barke. Then Soclarus himselfe said: That whosoever made these reasons, was in the right, and not deceived in his opinion; to thinke it necessarie, that the thing which is to receive another nature, should be pliable and easie to follow every way; to the end, that suffering it selfe to be tamed and overcome, it might become of like nature, and turne the owne proper nutriment, into that which is set and grafted in it. Thus you see, how before wee sow or plant, we eare and turne the earth, making it gentle, soft, and supple, that being in this manner wrought to our hand, and made tractable, it may be more willing to apply it selfe, for 50 to embrace in her bosome whatsoever is either sowed or planted; for contrariwise, a ground which is rough, stubborne, and tough, hardly will admit alteration: these trees therefore consisting of a light kinde of wood, because they are unapt to be changed and overcome, will admit no incorporation with others: And moreover (quoth hee) evident it is, that the stocke in respect of that which is set and grafted into it, ought to have the nature of a ground which is tilled; now it is well knownen, that the earth must be of a female constitution, apt to conceive and beare; which is the cause that we make choise of those trees for our stocks to graffe upon, which are most frutefull; like as we chuse good milch women that have plenty of milke in their brests, to be nurses for other children besides their owne, who we put unto them: but we see plainly, that the cypresse tree, the sapin, and all such like, be either barren altogether, or else beare very little frute: and like as men and women both who are exceeding corpulent, grosse and fatte, are for the most part unable either to get or beare children; for spending all their nourishment as they doe in feeding the body, they convert no superfluitie thereof into generall seed; even so, these trees employing all the substance of their nouriture to fatten as it were themselves, grow indeed to be very thicke and great; but either they beare no frute at all, or if they doe, the same is very small, and long ere it come to maturitie and perfection: no marvell therefore that a stranger will not breede or grow there, whereas the owne naturall issue thriveth but badly.

THE SEVENTH QUESTION.

Of the stay-sharp fish, Echeneis.

CHarmonianus the Trallicen, upon a time when divers and sundry small fishes of all sorts were set before us, shewed unto us one with a long head, and the same sharpe pointed, and told us that it resembled very much the stay-ship fish, called thereupon in Greeke Echeneis, and he reported moreover, that he had scene the said fish, as he sailed upon the Sicilian sea, and marvelled not a little at the naturall force and propertie that it had, so sensible in some sort to stay and hinder the course of a shippe under saile, untill such time as the mariner who had the government of the prow or foredecke, espied it sticking close to the outside of the ship. upon the relation of this strange occurrent, some there were in place at that time, who laughed at Charemonianus; for that this tale and fiction, devised for the nonce to make folke merry, and which was incredible, went currant with him, and was taken for good paiment: againe, others there were, who spake very much in the defence of the hidden properties, and secret antipathies or contrarieties in nature. There you should have heard many other strange passions and accidents; to wit, that an elephant being enraged and fraike mad, becommeth appeased immediately, upon the sight of a ram; also, that if a man hold a branch or twig of a beech tree close unto a viper, and touch her therewith never so little, she will presently stay and stirre no farther; likewise, that a wilde bull, how wood and furious soever he be, will stand gently and be quiet, in case he be tied to a fig-tree; feimblably, that amber doth remove and draw unto it all things that be drie and light withall, save onely the herbe basil, and whatsoeuer is besmeared with oile; Item, that the Magnet or Lode stone, will no more draw iron, when it is rubbed over with garlick: the proofe and experience of which effects, is well knowne, but the causes thereof difficult, if not impossible to be found out. But I for my part, said: That this was rather a shift and evasion, to avoid a direct answer unto the question propounded, than the allegation of a true cause pertinent thereto: for we daily see that there be many events and accidents concurring, reputed for causes, and yet be none; as for example, if one should say or beleve, that the blowing of the withie called Chast-tree, causeth grapes to ripen, because there is a common word in every mans mouth.

And grapes was ripe even at one hour.*

or that by reason of the fungous matter scene to gather about the candle-snuffes or lamp-weeks, the aire is troubled, and the skie overcast; or that the hooking inwardly of the nailes upon the fingers, is the cause, and not an accident, of the ulcer of the lungs or some noble part within, which breedeth a consumption. Like as therefore, every one of these particulars alledged, is a consequent of divers accidents, proceeding all from the same causes; even so I am of this mind (quoth I) that one and the same cause, staith the shippe, and draweth the little fish Echeneis to stick unto the side thereof; for so long as the ship is drie, or not overcharged with moisture soaking into it, it stands with great reason, that the keele glideth more smoothly away, by reason of the lightnesse thereof, and cutteth merrily thorow the waves, which yeeld and give way willingly unto it, all the while it is cleane and void of filth; but after once (by being long drenched and soaked in the water, it hath gotten about the keele a deale of mosse, reits, kilpe, and tangle, wherewith it is overgrown and furred; then the wood of the said keele or bottoome, becommeth more dull, and not able to cut the waves so easily; and the water beating upon the mosse and filth there engendred, resteth there still, and passeth not so easily away. The mariners therefore,

therefore, seeing this, use to cleanse the sides of the ship, and to scrape off this mosse, reits, and such like baggage, from the planks and ribbes thereof, unto which it is like that the said filth will cleaveth, as being a matter soft and tender: so that we may very well thinke, that by reason of it, as the principall cause the ship is staied, and that it is not a consequent or accessorie of that which causeth the slownesse thereof.

THE EIGHTH QUESTION.

What is the cause that the horses named Lycospades, be more courageous, and fuller of stomacke, than others?

10

Some are of opinion, that these horses Lycospades tooke their denomination of certaine strough and hard bits, called in Greeke, Lycei, by meanes whereof, being so stomakefull otherwise, and hard to be ruled, they were wont to be tamed and restrained: but my father, who was not a man so prompt and ready of speech as others be, and given to speake rashly and without advisement, howbeit, one who had not the least skill in horfmanship, and loved alwaies to keepe the best horses that might be come by, said: That those horses (which being but colts) were set upon and assaulted by wolves, and yet were rescued, escaped the danger of them, proved good mettall, and swift of pace; and there upon were named Lycospades. And for that many approved this reason of his, and gave testimonie with him that he spake a trueth, occasion was ministred thereby, to search into the cause thereof; and namely, how and by what reason such an accident as this might make horses more generous and better spirited; and verily, the most part of the company there present, were of opinion, that the said, occurrent bred cowardlife in horses, rather than stomacke and generositie; and so, by reason that they became timorous thereby, and apt to be frighted upon every occasion, therefore their motions were more quicke and lively; like as other wild beastes also, when they chance to be entangled within net and toile: but I my selfe inferred, and said: That it would be well and thorowly considered, whether it were not cleane contrary to that which appeared at the first sight, and which they opined; for colts become not more swift and fleet of foot for avoiding the perill of being worried and devoured by wolves that set upon them, but rather, if they had not bene nimble and full of courage before, naturally, they could never have gotten away cleere, as they did, from the wolfe; no more than Ulysses proved a wise man, because he avoided the danger of that giant Cyclops Polyphemus; but for that he was by nature prudent and wise, he found meanes to save himselfe.

THE NINTH QUESTION.

What is the cause that the flesh of those sheepe which have bene wolfe-bitten, is tenderer, but their wooll more subject to breed lice and vermin, than others?

VPon the former discourse of horses, inferred there was a speech also, concerning sheepe that had bene bitten by the wolfe; for that it is a received opinion, that this biting of theirs maketh their flesh more delicate in the eating, but their wooll apt to engender lice. As for the reason that my sonne in law Patrocles yeilded, as touching the sweetnesse of their flesh, it seemed to be true; for thus he argued: That this beast by meanes of his biting, causeth the flesh to eat more short and tender, for that his breath is so ardent and fierie-hot, that it is able to resolve and digest within his stomacke, the hardest bones that be; which is the reason (quoth he) that such flesh as the wolfe hath bitten, is sooner mortified, and doth putrifie more quickly than others: may, for the wooll we were not so well resolved, as supposing that the same did not breed lice, but rather draw them forth, and let them out to be scene, by a certaine incision or absterfitive faculty that hath, as also through the hear thereof, whereby it openeth the pores of the skinnie; which propertie is infused into the wooll of a sheepe, by meanes of the tooth and breath of the wolfe, which altereth not onely the flesh, but even the very wooll and shag-haire of the beast which he hath worried and killed. And this reason is confirmed by experience and example; for it is well knowne unto us all, that hunters, butchers, and cooks, sometimes with one blow knocke downe their beasts, and lay them along some dead and breathlesse in a moment; others againe, hardly and with much ado are able to kill them, after many a stroke; and that which yet is more wonderfull than so, some of them insufe together with the axe or knife of iron, wherewith the beast is flaine, such a qualitie that the same putrifieth presently, and will not last sweet one day to an end: others againe, though they be not longer about the killing of a beast than the other, yet the flesh of beasts so flaine, doth not so soone corrupt, but continueth sound and sweet a good while after. And that true it is, that the varietie & alteration occasioned by the sundry sorts of death, and killing of beasts, passeth and extendeth as farre as to their very skin, their haire, nailes, houfes and clees; Homer himselfe doth testifie, who of their hides and skinnes is wont thus expressely to write:

Sticked with knife, or brain'd by knocks.

For the skinn of those beasts which die not for age, nor of long maladie, but are killed violently, is more firme, fast, and tough: and true it is, that of those tame-living creatures, which have beene bitten by wilde beasts, the houfes, clees, and nailes turne blacke, the haire theadeth, and the skinnes become riveled, soone teare and fall a pices.

THE TENTH QUESTION.

Whether our unceftors did better, who when they were at supper, fedde every man by himselfe, and knew his owne part, than we in these daies who eat our vittuals all together, and feed in common?

That yeere wherein I was head magistrate in my countrey, and bare that provostship whereof the yeere tooke name, most of the suppers were private repasts of sacrifices, where every man had his part and portion set out; wherewith some were woonderfully well pleased; but others blamed the manner thereof, as uncivill, unfociable, and illiberal, saying: That so soone as the garland or coronet of the beast sacrificed was taken off his head, and laid down, we ought to reduce our tables to the ancient order and old accustomed fashion againe: For it is not I suppose (quoth Agias) for to eat and drinke simply, that we invite one another, but for to eat and drinke together for companie and good-fellowship; whereas this parting and division of flesh and other viands into portions, doth abolish all communication & societie, making indeed many severall suppers, and many men to sit at supper apart, but not one supping with another, or fellow-guest in one messe; when every man takes as it were from the butchers stall his own joint of meat, or a piece of flesh by just waight, or at a certaine size, & so sets his part before him. For is not all one I pray you, and what difference is there I would faine know, to allow each one of the guests at table his owne cup by himselfe, & to fill every man his Congious or gallon of wine, yea, and to allow him his table apart from others? like as by report the linage of Demophon sometime served Orestes, and so to bid them drinke without any regard or heed of others? what diversitie (I say) is in this, and the manner of these our daies; namely, to set before every man his lofe of bread, and piece of flesh, for to feed by himselfe, as it were at his owne manger? Surely all the oddes is, that we have no commaundment to keepe silence and say never a word when we are at our meat, as those had who interteined and feasted Orestes, and verily even this haply ought to provoke and bring us that are met, to the communion & participation of all things at a feast or banquet; namely: that we talke there one to another, that we be partakers together of one song of a minstrell wenchs musicke delighting us all, and one as well as another, with her playing upon a psalterie or pipe, & singing thereto. Moreover, that standing cup of amitie and good-fellowship, which is set in the very middles of the company, for to drinke out of it, one to another, and that without any limitation or restraint to certaine bounds, standeth as it were a source and lively fountaine of love and good will, and hath no other stint and measure, but the thirst and disposition of every one, to drinke at his pleasure: not like to this most unjust distribution of bread and flesh to every one, which masketh it selfe with a false colour of equality among those who are unequal; for even that, as even and equall as it seemeth 50 and in manner all one, is too much for him that needs but a little, and too little for him, who hath need of much. Like as therefore (my good friend) he is a ridiculous and foolish leech, who to many and sundrie patients, sick of diverse and different diseases, exhibith and giveth medicines just of one weight, and exactly of the same measure; even so were the matter of a feast woorthy to be laughed at, who having invited to his table sundry persons who are not hungry or thirsty alike, would enterteine and serve them all indifferently after one order, measuring the equalitie of his distribution, by proportion arithmetical and not geometrical. True it it is (I confesse) that we go or send al of us to the taverne for to buy our wine, by one & the same measure just, which is allowed and set downe by the publicke State; but to the table, every man brings his owne stomacke, the which is filled not with an equal quantitie of meat or drinke, to all others, but with that which sufficeth each one. As touching those * banquets that Homer speaketh of, wherein every man had his part cut out; to what purpose should we bring them hither from military discipline, and the custome of a campe, to the manner and fashion of these daies? but more reason it is that we resolve and propose unto our selves, for to imitate heerein the humanity & courtesie of those in old time, who highly honored, not only those who lodged ordinarily, and made their abode with them under one roufe, but also such as drunke of the same 10 cuppe, eat of the same meat, and fedde out of one dish with them, inasmuch as they enterteined and revered their societie in all things. Away therefore (I pray you) with those thort meales and slender pittances of Homer; which in my conceit are somewhat too scant and pinching, and as a man would say, over hungry and thirtie; as having kings and princes for the masters and makers of them, who be more sparing of their purses, and looking more neerely to their expences, than those good hostes and keepers of ordinaries in Italy; as who being in armes and arranged in batell rale, and ready to joine in conflict with the enemy, could remember precisely, how many times each one of their guests who dined or supped with them, tooke the cuppe and dranke. Yet commend me to those banquets and feasts which Pindarus writeth of, for surely they are much better; in which, as he saith:

Full oft a prince, and person honorable,

Among them all, sit at some stately table.

For why? such feasts had the communication of all things together: and verily this was the fellowship and knot indeed of true friends, whereas the other was a distraction and separation of persons, who made semblance to be the greatest friends, and yet could not agree and communicate together, so much as in the feeding of one dish of meat. Agias had good audience given him, and was well commended for the reasons which he alledged; and then we set one of the company to come upon him in this manner, saying: That Agias thought it very strange and was offended that he should have an equal portion which others allowed him, carying as he did before him such a grand-paunch; and in truth, a great eater he was, and given exceeding much to belly cheere: For a common * fish (as Democritus was wont to say) hath no bone. And yet this is that (quoth I) which especially and above all induceth us to the use of these portions, and not without good reason, considering that we acknowledge fatall necessitie by the name of 30 justice: for according as the old lady Jocasta laid in Euripides:

That which uniteth cities and great States,

is nothing els but equalitie: and nothing in the world hath so much need thereof, as the societie and communion at the table; which is grounded upon nature, and law of necessitie, nothing so much; the usage whereof, is not newly taken up, nor drawn in, as needful, by opinion of others, but right necessarie in it selfe. For at an ordinary or common repast, where folke feed together 40 of one dish; if one eat more than his fellowes, certes, he that can not plie his teeth so fast, and cometh short of him, doth maligne and repine at him for it; like as that galley which maketh way, and skuddeth before others, is spighted by those that come dragging behinde. For mee thinks it is not an auspicate beginning of a feast, nor agreeable to amitie and good fellowship, to snatch or lurch one from another, to have many hands in a dish at once, to crosse one another with the elbow, and to be with hand or arme in his fellowes way, striving a vie who should be more nimble with his fingers, but surely, all these fashions are absurd, unseemely, and (as I may say) dog-like, ending many times in snarling, jarring, bitter taunts, revilings, and cholerick brawles, not onely of the guests one with another, but also against those that furnished the board, and the masters of the feast. But so long as these wise sagies, Justice and Astaxos, that is to 50 say, portion and partition, had the ordering of suppers, dinners and great feasts, dispensing and setting out an equalitie for to maintaine the societie there, a man should never see any ill-trall or mechanical disorder: for in those daies, suppers were called Antis, guests at the table, Antipais; the carvers serving at the table, Antipais; not that they divided, cut out, and gave to every one their due portions. And verily, the Lacedaemonians had among them certaine distributors of flesh, whom they called Xepodaimas, and those were no meane men of the vulgar sort, but principall persons of the State, inasmuch as Lysander himselfe was by king Agis ordained and created Xepodaimas in Afus, that is to say, an officer for the distribution of flesh-meat in the campe there.

That is to say, if a fish be eaten in common, it is not known how much one hath eaten of it more than his fellowes, by the bones lying upon his trencher.

there. But downe went these distributions and diuisions, when superfluities and costly cares crept into feasts, and were served up to the table; for they could not then (as I suppose) so handsomely cut into even portions, their pie-meats, pasties, tarts, marchpaines, and such devices of pastrie; they might not so well diuide ther flaws, custards, egge-pies, florentines, and daintie puddings, going under the name of οὐροὶ and εὐφροῖναι, ne yet their blamangers, jellies, chaw-dices and a number of exquisit saues, and delicate junkets of all sorts, sent up and brought to the boord: but being overcome with the pleasure of such lickorous viands, they tooke to them, an abandoning of all equall distribution of parts and portion. A good argument and sufficient prooffe hereof, a man may gather by that which we see yet at this day; namely, that the feasts at sacrifices, and some publike banquets, are made after the antique maner, and served up by even portions, to shew the simplicitie and pure feeding that was in olde time: so that I suppose, whosoever would bring up againe that distribution, should withall revive the ancient frugalitie.
 But some man haply, will say: That where private proprietie is in place, publike communie is turned out of doores. True indeed, in case that propriety reitene not equalitie: for it is not the possession of a mans owne, and of a thing in proper; but the usurping of another mans right, or the covetous encroching upon the common, that hath brought iniustice, debate and trouble into the world; which enormities, the lawes do repress, by the bounds, limits and measure of that which a man holdeth as proper & his owne, and thereupon they be called in Greeke, νομος, of the power and authoritie which they have to part equally unto every one, that which was common among all. For otherwise, if you admit not this distribution, you have no more reason to allow that the master of the feast should deale among his guests, to every one his coronet or chaplet of flowers, nor his owne place to sit at the boord. Nay, if any one peradventure, bring with him his fliee-friend and sweet-heart, or a minstrell wench to play and sing, they mult be common to him and his friends, that all our goods may be huddled pell-mell, and made so, that is to say, one, according as Anaxagoras would have all. But if it be so, that the challenge in proprietie of this or that, is no trouble nor hinderance of societie and communion, considering, that other matters of principall regard and greatest importance, are allowed for to be common, (I meane conference in talke, courtesies and kindeesses of drinking one to another, and mutual invitings) let us surcease and give over, thus to despise, discredit and condemne this laudable maner of portions, and the lotterie in partage, which (as Euripides saith) is the daughter of Fortune, which giveth not the prerogative and preeminence, either to riches, or credit and nobilitie; but going (as it happeneth) alwell one way as another, cheereth up the heart of a poore and abject person, and depriveth no sort and condition whatsoever, of libertie; but by acquainting the great, wealthy and mighty person with an equalitie, so as he repine not and grudge thereat, reclaimeth him unto temperance and moderation.

THE THIRD BOOKE OF SYMPOSIAQUES OR BANQUET QUESTIONS.

The Contents, or Chapters thereof.

1. Whether it be commendable to weare chaplets of flowers upon the head, at a table.
2. Of the true, whether it be her or cold by nature.
3. What the reason is, that women be hardly made drunke, but old men very soone.
4. Whether women by their naturall constitution and complexion, be hotter or colder than men.
5. Whether wine of the owne nature and operation be colde.
6. Of the meet time and season to company with a woman.

7. What

7. What is the cause that Most or new wine, doth not easily overturne the braine or make one drunke.
8. How it cometh to passe, that those who be thorow drunke indeed, are lesse troubled in the braine, than such as are but in the way unto it, and as it were halfe drunke.
9. What is the meaning of this old proverbe: Drink five or three, but never four.
10. Why flesh-meats corrupt and purrifie sooner in the moone shene, than in the sunne.

The Preamble or Proëme.

Imonides the poet, & Sofinus Senecio, seeing upon a time a stranger at the table, sitting still, and saying never a word, when others were merrie, and dranke liberally, said unto him: My friend, if you be a foole, you doe wisely; but if you be a wise man, you do as foolishly: for it is a great deale better for a man (as Heraclius was wont to say) to hide his own folly and ignorance, than to discover the same; and that wis is a very hard matter to doe; when we are set upon a merrie pinne, and drinking wine lustily: for as the poet Homer said very well:

*Wine makes a man, were he both wise and grave,
 One while to sing, and otherwhiles to rave:
 To sport, to play, and laugh full wantonly
 To leape, to dance, and foos it demity:
 Words to let fall, and secrets to reveale
 Which better were to hold in and conceale.*

In which verses, the poet if I be not deceived, doth covertly and by the way imply a difference betweene liberall drinking of wine, or being somewhat cup-shotten, and drunkennesse indeed: for to sing, to laugh, and to daunce, be ordinarie matters, incident to those who have taken their liquor well, and be heat with wine, but to prate like a foole, and * blurt out that, which better had beene kept in, be the effects and acts of such as have powred in too much, and be stark drunken; and therefore Plato said: That the affections and conditions of the vulgar sort of men be discovered farre better in drinking than otherwise. And when Homer saith:

*They had not yet by wine and words,
 Knowne one another at their boards.*

it is evident that he wist well enough of what power and force wine was; namely, to engender and multiply many words: for surely, we come not to the knowledge of men and their maners, by eating and drinking, in case they eat and drinke and say nothing. but for that drinke induceth and draweth on folke to speake much; and much speech detegeth and layeth open many things, which otherwise would have lien hidden; therefore by good consequence, drinking together giveth a great light and knowledge one of another: and therefore wee may by good right reproove Aesop in this wise: What meane you good sir, to seeke for those windowes, through which one man might looke into another, and see into his neighbours heart? for wine fetteth the doores wide enough open unto us, and bewraith what we have within; not suffering us to be still and silent, but taking from us the maske and visour of all dissimulation, and shewing what we are in our colours, as if we stood in no feare at all of law, but were a great way out of the sight of our tutors and schoole-masters that kept us in awe. Wine then is enough for Ae-sopus, for Plato, and for all those who search after meanes to discover the secrets of mens hearts: but such as desire not in this wise to trie and sift one another, but rather be willing to converse together with mirth and recreation, these men (I saie) are wont to propose questions, and entertaine such discourses when they meet; whereby the ill parts and imperfections of the soule, if they have any, may be concealed and hidden; but the best gifts thereof, and that which favoureth most of civilitie and erudition, may appeere and gather more strength, as being conducted and trained by the guidance of learning and good literature, to the faire meadows and pleasant pastures wherein the taketh delight to walke and feed; in which regard, I have for your lake compiled this third Decade of banquet-questions and table discourses; whereof the first concerneth chapters of flowers:

THE FIRST QUESTION.

Whether it be commendable to weare upon the head, flower-garlands at the table.

There was a solemne feast or banquet one day at Athens, which Eraton the professour in musicke made, having sacrificed before unto the muses: and to this feast he invited many; among that faire company, certaine questions were mooved, and much good talke passed 10 as touching chapters of flowers: for by occasion that after supper was done, many such coronets of all sorts went about, and were dealt round among the guests; Ammonius beganne to scoffe and laugh at us; who in stead of laurell chaplets, did set upon our heads rose-garlands: For that (quoth hee) these chaplets of flowers be girlish gaudes, and more meet indeed for plaifull maidens and yoong women, than the assembles of philosophers and learned men: And I wonder much at this Eraton, that reprooving and detesting as he doth the flower-works, (as it were in long and musicke, and blaming faire Agathon; who by report first brought up the Chromaticke musicke; and when he set out the tragædie of the Mysians, inserted it within other plaine musicke) should himselfe as you see, heape upon us at this feast a number of wreathes, garlands, and chaplets of flowers, filling the whole place with sweet smells and plea- 20 sant favours; and when he shutteth up the dore of our eares, against the delights and pleasures of musicke; should in the meane while set open the windowes of our eies and noses, giving entrance thus another way unto them, for to pierce unto the soule, making a coronet and garland to serve for pleasure and loosenesse; which should be a matter of religion and devotion: and yet I must needs say, that these oiles and perfumes yeeld a sweeter favour, and more exquisite pleasant odour, than these chaplets of flowers, that fade and wither in the hands of the garland-makers: howbeit, for all that, they are allowed no place in banquets and assembles of philosophers; being an idle pleasure, not accompanied with any profit whatsoever, nor arising from any source of naturall necessitie or appetite: for like as those who come as shadows to a feast, being brought thither by some friends, who are themselves bidden guests, according to 30 the ordinarie custome of courtesie, finde themselves no lesse welcome and well intreated than the rest, as Arctodemus was, whom Socrates brought with him to a feast, which Agathon made; but if one goe of himselfe presumptuously, not invited nor brought thither by a friend, he is wel worthy to have the dore shut upon him: even so the pleasures of eating and drinking, which necessitie hath invited, and doe accompanie the naturall appetite, are admitted and have place among wise men: but as for others which come before they bee bidden or sent for, and presse to get in without any reason, onely upon a disordinate lust, are to be kept out and excluded.

At these words of Ammonius, certaine yoong men who were not as yet acquainted with his fashions, being distained and abashed; began gently, and without more ado to plucke off 40 and pull in sunder their coronets. But I (who knew well enough that he mooved this talke onely by way of exercise, and because hee would draw us on to debate the matter) addrest my speech unto Tryphon the physician in this wise: Of all loves Tryphon, be so good as lay downe as wel as we, this goodly chaplet which you have upon your head, so fragrant & flagrant, both of most beautifull red roses; or else declare presently as you are wont to do many times among us, the profit and commodity that this flower garland doth conferre unto our drinking of wine so freely. But here Eraton interposing himselfe: How is it ordeined (quoth he) that we receive no pleasure free, but it bringeth alwaies one salarie or other with it; & ever as we solace our selves and be merie, we are displeased and discontented, in case wee enjoy not our delights with some hire or reward to cheere the same: as for sweet smells or costly oiles, and compounding perfumes, 50 there is some reason peradventure why we should be somewhat ashamed of them; as also for the rich purple colours we may be abashed, in regard of the affected curiositie and superfluous expence thereof; which we are to reject, as being odours deceitfull, and fraudulent robes and colours; as sometime said that barbarous Scythian: but colours and odours such as be naturall, are simple, pure, and sincere, not differing in that respect from the fruits of trees which nature bringeth forth. Were it not then meerely folly to gather the juice and liquor of such fruits, and in the meane time reject and condemne the fairer colours and sweet favours, that the seasons of the yeere do yeeld, onely for the delightfome aspect and pleasure that floweth (as it were) out of them, if they afford not otherwise some vertue and propertie which is good and profitable? It seemeth rather yet, that we should do the contrary; namely, if it be true as you philosophers say, that nature doth nothing in vaine and for no purpose, that (she hath created and produced these things, for the pleasure onely of man, as serving to no other purpose, but onely for to cheere up our spirits, and content our outward senses. Marke this moreover and besides, how unto trees and plants that prosper and grow, nature hath given leaves, to save and defend their fruits; as also that under their covert, themselves (one while warmed and another while cooled and refreshed) might be able the better to endure the injuries of the aire, and 10 change of seasons. As for flowers, they yeeld no commoditie at all, by their tarrying upon the plant, unlesse it be this, that we have delight in smelling, and pleasure in beholding them for a time, in that there exhale and breathe from them, woonderfull sweet favours; and they discover unto us an infinit sort of tinctures and colours, by no art of man imitable. And therefore, when we strip trees of their leaves, they seeme displeased and grieved thereat; they feele (as it were) the smart and paine of a wound; and there is left (by that meanes) a hurt and fore like an ulcer; and being thus despoiled of their naturall beauty and heart, they are ill-favoured to see to, and deformed: so that we ought not onely (as Empedocles saith)

And to abstaine her branches for to wear.*

20 but also we are to spare the leaves and boughs of all other trees, and not by their deformitie to adorne our selves, robbing and spoiling them perforce and against nature; whereas, if we gather and crop their flowers, we do them no hurt nor wrong at all. For this manner of dealing with them, resembleth vintage and gathering grapes from the vine; and if they be not plucked in due time, they shed of their owne accord, all faded and withered. Like as therefore, they be barbarous people, who clad themselves with the felles and skinnies of sheepe, in stead of making cloth of their wooll, to apparell their bodies; even so me thinks, that they who twist and plait their chaplets, of leaves, rather than flowers, doe not use plants so well as they ought to doe. Thus much I thought good to deliver unto you, in defence of those that make and sell flower garlands; for Grammarian I am not, nor much read in poets, to alledge testimonies out of their 30 poems; wherein it is to be found, that in olde time, the victors who won the prize of the sacred games, were crowned all with chaplets of flowers; howbeit, thus much I will be bold to avouch out of them: That the rose-garland was peculiarly destined and appropriat to the muses; for so I remember, I have read in one place of Sappho the poetresse, where speaking of a great rich woman, yet altogether ignorant, unlettered, and a meere stranger to the muses, she writeth thus:

*All dead thou shalt intombed lie,
And leave no name nor memorie:
For roses none thou couldst come by,
That flower on mountaine Pierie.*

But now it is time to heare what testimonie Tryphon will alledge out of his physicke. Then 40 Tryphon taking in hand the matter in question: Our ancients (quoth he) in alder time, were not ignorant of all these points; neither forgot they to treat thereof, as having exceeding great use of plants in the practise of physicke. For proofe whereof, there remaine at this day, most evident arguments; for the Tyrians offer unto Agemonides, and the Magnesians unto Chiron (who were the first that professed and practised physicke in those parts) the primies and first gatherings of those herbs and roots wherewith they were wont to cure and heale their patients; and prince Bacchus, not onely for the invention of wine (a most puissant medicine, I may say to you, and a pleasant) was esteemed a sufficient physician; but also for that he taught those who were surprised into honour and reputation by that meanes; for that it hath a propertie in nature repugnant 50 and contrary unto the qualitie of wine, repressing and quenching the coldnesse which it hath, the predominant heat thereof, that men might take lesse harme thereby, and so withstand drunkennesse. And verily, the names of certaine plants, do plainly shew the great industrie and careful diligence of our forefathers in this behalf. For the walnut-tree they called in Greeke **Kasia*, * Of Kasia, the head, or quercus, drow-linette, in the * reyn, be-nummedin the
it

it the ancient coronet of the great gods, meaning thereby the gods terrestrial. Moreover, it is said that the herbe Rue had the denomination in Greeke ῥυαῖος, of the vertue which it hath; by reason that with the drinelle wherewith it is endued, and the same occasioned by excessive heat, it is so astringent, that it * knitteth, bindeth and hardeneth the naturall seed of man, and is a great enemy to conception and women with childe. As for the * Amethyst, aswell the herbe as the stone of that name, they who thinke that both the one and the other is so called, because they withstand * drunkenness, miscount themselves, and are deceived; for in trueth, both are named so of the colour: and as for the leafe of the herbe, it hath no fresh and lively hew, but resembleth a * winelesse weake wine, as one may say, that either drinketh flat and hath lost the colour, or els is much delaied with water. Many other plants may be alledged to this purpose, whose properties and naturall vertues have imposed their names: but these examples may suffice to shew the studious industrie and great experience of our ancetours; in regard whereof, they used to weare chaplets of leaves and flowers upon their heads, whiles they sat drinking wine; for strong wine and pure of it selfe, having begun to assaile the head, and to enervate or enfeeble the whole body, by seizing upon the originall fountaine of the nerves and senses, to wit, the braine, doth mightily trouble and disquiet a man: for the remedie of which inconvenience, the sent and smell, breathing from flowers, serveth marvellous well, for that the same doth defend and fortifie as with a rampar, the castle and citadell (as it were) of the head, against the assaults and impressions of drunkenness. For these flowers, if they be hot, gently untop and open the pores, and in so doing, make way and give vent for the heady wine to evaporate and breathe out all fumosities; and contrariwise, if they be temperatly colde, by closing gently the said pores, keepe downe and drive backe the vapours steaming up into the braine. And of this vertue are the garlands of violets and roses, which by their smell and comfortable sent, repress and stay both ache and heaviness of head. As for the flower of * Privet, Saffron and Baccaris, that is to say, Our Ladies gloves, or Nard Rusticke, bring them sweetly to sleepe, who have drunke freely: for these send from them a milde aire, breathing after a smooth and uniforme manner; the which doth softly comprise and lay even, the unequall distemperatures, the troublesome acrimonies and disorderly alperities, arising in the bodies of those who have overdunk themselves; whereupon there ensueth a calme, and thereby the strength of the headie wine is either dulled, or else rebated. Other sorts of flowers there be, the odours whereof being spread and disper'd about the braine, purge mildly the pores and passages of the senses and their organs, subtiliat and discusse gently, without trouble and offence, with their moderate heat, the humors and all moist vapours, by way of rarefaction, and warme the braine comfortably, which by nature is of a cold temperature: and for this cause especially those pettie garlands or poesies of flowers which they hung in old time about their necks, they called coronulae, as if one would saie summigations, and they anointed all their breast-parts with the oiles that were expelled or extracted from them. Aleyn also testifieth as much, where hee willeth to powre sweet oile upon his head that had suffered much paine, and upon his breast all grey; for even so such odors are directed up as farre as to the braine, being drawn by the sense of smellling. So it was not because they thought that the soule, which the Greeks call ψυχή was seated and kept residence within the heart, that they called these wreathes and garlands about their necks coronulae, as some would have it, for then more reason it had bene to have tearmed them Embruyantes, but it was as I said before, of the exhalation or evaporation upward from the region of the breast, against which they were worne pendant: neither are we to wonder, that the exhalations of flowers should have so great force; for we finde it written in records, that the shadow of * Smilax especially when it is in the flower, killeth them that lie a sleepe under it; also from the Poppie there ariseth a certaine spirit, when the juice is drawn out of it, which they call Opium, and if they take no better heed, who draw the same, it causeth them to swoone and fall to the ground: there is an herbe called Alysson, which whofever hold in their hands, or doe but looke upon it, shall presently be ridde of the yexe or painfull hickot; and they say, it is very good also for sheepe and goates, to keepe them from all diseases, if the same be planted along their cotes and folds: the Rose, also named in Greeke ῥόδον, was so called, for that it casteth from it an * odoriferous smell, which is the reason that it quickly fadeth, and the beautie passeth soone away; cold it is in operation, although it carie the colour of fire, and not without good cause; for that the little heat that it hath, flieth up to the superficies of it, as being driven outwardly from within, by the native coldness that it hath.

THE SECOND QUESTION.

Whether Ivie of the owne nature be cold or hot.

This speech of Tryphon we greatly praised: but Amonius smiling: It were not meet (quoth he) to kicke and spurne againe, nor to overthrow so beautifull and gay a discourse as this was, embellished and adorned with as great varietie as the garlands whereof it treated, and which he undertooke to defend and mainteine: but that I cannot tell how it is come to passe that the Ivie is enterlaced in the chaplet of flowers, and said by the naturall coldness that it is to have a vertue and propertie to extinguish and quench the forcible heat of new wine: for contrariwise, it seemeth to be hot and ardent, and the fruit which it beareth being put into wine, and infused therein, giveth it power to inebriat and make drunke, yea, and to trouble and disquiet the body by the inflammation that it causeth: by reason of which excessive heat, the very body thereof groweth naturall crooked, after the manner of wood that curbeth and warpeth with the fire; of growth naturall crooked, after the manner of wood that curbeth and warpeth with the fire; alio the snow which oftentimes continueth and lieth many daies upon other trees, flieth in great haste from the Ivie tree; or to speake more properly, is presently gone, thawed and melted, if it chance to fettle upon it, & that by reason of the heat; and that which more is, (as Theophrastus hath left in writing) Harpalus the lieutenant general under Alexander the Great, in the province of Babylon, by expresse order and direction from the king his master; endeavored and did what he might to set in the kings orchard there, certaine trees and plants which came out of Greece, and such especially as yeelded a goodly shade, caried large leaves, and were by nature cold; for that the countrey about Babylon is exceeding hot and scorched with the burning heat of the sunne; but the ground would never entertaine nor abide the Ivie onely; notwithstanding that Harpalus tooke great paines, and employed most careful diligence about it: for plant it as often as he would, it dried and died immediately; and why? hotte it is of the owne nature, and was planted in a mould farre hotter than it selfe, which hindered it for taking roots for this is a generall and perpetuall rule: that all excessive enormities, of any object, destroy the force and powers of the subject: in which regard, they desire rather their contraries; in such sort, as that a plant of cold temperature requirith an hot place to grow in; and that which is hot demaundeth likewise a cold ground: and this is the reason, that high mountaine countries, windie, and covered with snow, beare ordinarily trees that yeeld torch-wood and pitch, as pines, cone trees, and such like: And were it not so, my good friend Tryphon, yet this is certeine; that trees which by nature are chill and cold, shedge their leaves every yeere; for that the small heat which they have, for very penurie retirith inwardly, and leaveth the outward parts naked and destitute: whereas contrariwise, heat and unctuous fatinesse, which appeareth in the olive, laurell and cypresse trees, keepe themselves alwaies greene, and hold their leaves, like as the Ivie doth for her part. And therefore good father Bacchus hath not brought into use and requit the Ivie, as a preservative and present helpe against the encounter of drunkenness, nor as an enemy to wine, who directly calleth wine uino and furnameth himselfe uivivator thereupon: but in mine opinion, like as they who love wine, if they cannot meet with the liquor of the grape, use a counterfet wine or barley broth, called beere & ale, or els a certeine drinke made of apples, named cydres or els date-wines; even so, he that gladly would in winter season weare a chaplet of vine branches, seeing it altogether naked and bare of leaves, is glad of the Ivie that resembleth it; for the body or wood thereof is likewise writhed and crooked, and never groweth upright, but shuneth out heere and there, to and fro at a venture; the soft fatie leaves also after the same manner grow disper'd about the branches without all order; & besides all this, the very berries of the Ivie growing thick & clustered together like unto greene grapes, when they begin to turne, doe represent the native forme of the vine: and yet albeit the same yeeldeth some helpe and remedie against drunkenness; we say, it is by occasion of heat, in opening the pores and small passages in the body, for to let out the fumes of wine, and suffer them to evaporate and breathe forth, or rather by her heat helpeth to concoct and digest it, that for your sake (good Tryphon) Bacchus may still continue a physician. At these words, Tryphon staid a while, and made no answer, as thinking with himselfe, and studying how to reply upon him. But Eraton calling earnestly upon every one of us that were of the younger sort, spurned us forward to aide and assist Tryphon our advocate, and the patron of our flower-chaplets, or els to plucke them from our heads, and weare them no longer. And Ammonius assured us (for his part) that if any one of us would take upon him to answer, he would not recharge againe, nor come upon him with a rejoinder. Then Tryphon himselfe moved us to say somewhat to the question. Whereupon I began to speake and said: That it belonged not to me, but rather unto Tryphon, for to prooue that Ivies was colde, considering that he used it much in physicke to coole and binde, as being an altringent medicine: but as touching that which ere-while was alledged; namely, that the Ivie berie doth inebriate, if it be steeped in wine; it is not found to be true; and the accident which it worketh in those who drinke it in that maner, can not well be called drunkennesse, but rather an alienation of the mind and trouble of the spirit; like to that effect which henbane worketh, & many other plants, which mightily disquiet the braine, and transport our senses and understanding. As for the tortuositie of the bodie and branches, it maketh nothing to the purpose and point in hand; for the works and effects against nature, can not proceed from faculties and powers naturall; and pieces of wood do twine and bend crooked, because fire (being neere unto them) draweth and drieth up forcibly, all the native and kindly humour; where as the inward and naturall heat, would rather ferment, enterteine and augment it. But consider better upon the matter and marke rather, whether this writhed-bunching forme of the Ivie wood (as it groweth) and the basenesse, beating still downward and tending to the ground, be not an argument rather of weaknesse, and bewray the coldnesse of the bodie, being glad (as it were) to make many rests and staies; like unto a pilgrim or wayfaring traveller, who for wearinesse and faintnesse sitteth him downe and reposeth himselfe many times in his way, and ever and anon riseth againe and beginneth to set forward: in regard of which feeblenesse, the Ivie hath alwaies need of some prop or other to stay it selfe by, to take hold of, to claspe about and to cling unto; being not able of her owne power to rife, for want of naturall heat, whose nature is to mount aloft. As touching Snow, that it thaweth and passeth away so soone, the cause is, the moisture and softnesse of the Ivie leafe; for so wee see that water dispatcheth and dissolveth presently, the laxitie and spongyous raritie thereof, being (as it is) nothing els but a gathering and heaping of a number of small bubbles couched & thrust together: and hereof it cometh, that in over-moist places, slobbered and soaked with water, snow melteth as soone as in places exposed to the sun. Now for that it hath leaves alwaies upon it, and the same (as Empedocles saith) firme and fast, this proceedeth not of heat, no more than the fall and shedding of leaves every yeere, is occasioned by colde. And this appeareth by the myrtle tree and the herbe Adiantum, that is to say, Maiden-haire, which being not hot plants, but colde, are alwaies leaved and greene withall: and therefore some are of opinion, that the holding of the leaves, is to be ascribed to an equality of temperature: but Empedocles (over and besides) attributeth it to a certaine proportion of the pores, thorow which the sap and nourishment doth passe and pierce equally into the leaves; in such sort, as it runneth sufficiently for to mainteine them: which is not so in those trees which lose their leaves, by reason of the laxitie or largenesse of the said pores and holes above, and the straightnesse of them beneath; whereby, as these doe not send any nourishment at all, so the other can hold and retaine none, but that little which they received, they let goe all at once: like as we may observe in certaine canals or trenches, devised for to water gardens and orchards, if they be not proportionable and equall; for where they be well watred and have continuall nourishment, and the same in competent proportion, there the trees hold their owne, and remaine firme, alwaies greene, and never die. But the Ivie tree, planted in Babylon, would never grow, and refused there to live. Certes, it was well done of her, and she shewed great generositie, that being (as she was) a devoted vassalle to the god of Babylon, and living (as it were) at his table, she would not goe out of her owne countrey, to dwell among those Barbarians: shee followed not the steps of king Alexander, who entred alliance, and made his abode with those strange and forren nations, but avoided their acquaintance all that ever she could, and withstood that transmigration from her native place: but the cause thereof, was not heat, but colde rather; because shee could not endure the temperature of the aire, so contrary to her owne: for that which is so sensible and familiar, never killeth any thing, but receiveth, nourisheth and beareth it; like as drie ground, the herbe thyme, how hot soever the soile be. Now for the province about Babylon, they say, the aire in all that tract is so foultric hot, so stuffing, so grosse, and apt to stifle and stop the breath, that many inhabitants of the wealthier sort, cause certaine bits or bagges of leather to be filled with water, upon which, as upon featherbeds, they lie to sleepe and coole their bodies.

M m m from

THE THIRD QUESTION.

What the cause is, that women hardly are made drunke, but olde men, very soone?

Lorius one day seemed to marvell, that Aristotle having in his treatise of drunkennesse, set downe this position: That olde men are soone surprized and overteene with wine, but contrariwise, women, hardly and very seldome; rendred no reason thereof, considering that his manner otherwise, is not to propose any such difficulties, but hee doth decide and cleere the same. And when he had made this overture, he mooved the companie to inquire into the cause thereof, and a supper it was, where familiar friends were met together. Then Sylla said: That the one was declared by the other: for if we comprehend the cause aright, as touching women, it were no hard matter to finde out a reason for old men; considering that their natures and constitutions be most opposit and contrary, in regard of moisture and drinessse, roughnesse and smoothnesse, softnesse and hardnesse: for first and foremost, suppose this of women undoubtedly, that their naturall temperature is very moist, which causeth their flesh to be so tender, soft, smooth, slicke and thinning; to say nothing of their naturall purgations every moneth: when as therefore wine meeteth with so great humiditie, being overcome by the predominancy thereof, it loseth the edge and tincture (as it were) together with the force that it had, so as it becometh dull, every way discoloured and waterish. And verily to this purpose, somewhat may be gathered out of the words of Aristotle; for he saith: That those who make no long draught when they take their wine, nor drinke leasurly, but powre it downe at once (which manner of drinking they called epithymia) are not so subject to drunkennesse as others; for that the wine maketh no long stay within their bodies, but being forcibly thrust forth, soone passeth thorow: and ordinarily we may observe, that women drinke in this manner; and very probable it is, that their bodies by reason of continual attraction of humours downward, to the nether parts for their monthly termes, is full of many conduits and passages, as if they were divided into chanelles, pipes, and trenches, to draw forth the said humours; into which the wine no sooner falleth, but away it passeth apace, that it cannot settle nor rest upon the noble and principall parts, which if they be once troubled and possessed, drunkennesse doth soone ensue. Contrariwise, that old men want naturall humiditie, their very name in Greeke seemeth to implic sufficiently, for called they are gerontes, not because they are gerontes in gera, that is to say, inclining and stooping downward to the earth, but because they are already in their habitude of bodie gerontes and gerontes, that is to say, earthly: Moreover, their stiffenesse and unpliant disposition, the roughnesse also of their skinnie, argueth their dry nature and complexion: it standeth therefore to good reason, that when they liberally take their wine, their bodies which are rare and spungious within, by occasion of that drinessse, quickly catcheth and sucketh up the same, and then by long staying there, it worketh up into the head, causeth the braine to beat, and breedeth heavinesse there; & like as land-floods gently glide over those fields which be solide & hard, washing them onely aloft, and making no mire & dirt; but if the ground be light and hollow they enter and soke farther in; even so wine being soone caught, and drawne by the drinessse of old mens bodies, staideth there the longer time: and were not this so, yet we may observe that the verie nature of old men admitteth the same symptomes and accidents which drunkennesse maketh. Now these accidents occasioned by drunkennesse, are very apparent, to wit, the trembling and shaking of their limbes, faltering in their toong, and speaking double, immoderate and lavish speech, pettishnesse and aptnesse to choler, forgetfulnessse and alienation of the minde and understanding; the most part whereof being incident to old men, even when they are belt in health and in most sober, a little thing God wot will fet them cleane out, and any small agitation whatsoever will doe the deed: so that drunkennesse in an old man engendreth not new accidents, but so setteth on foot and augmenteth those which be already common and ordinary with them. To conclude, there is not a more evident argument to proove and confirme the same than this; that nothing in the world resembleneth an old man more, than a young man when hee is drunke.

THE FOURTH QUESTION.

Whether women by their naturall complexion be colder or hotter than men?

WHEN Sylla had delivered his minde to that effect; Apollonides an expert professoer and well scene in raunging a battell in array, seemed by his words to approve well of that which had bene alledged as touching old men; but he thought, that in the discourse of women, the onely course was left out and overlit, to wit, the coldnesse of their constitution, by means whereof, the hottest wine is quenched, and forgoeth that fierie flame which flieth up to the head, and troubleth the braines: and this was received as a very probable and sufficient reason, by all the company there in place. But Athrilatus the physician, a Thasian borne, interjected some staie off farther searching into this cause: For that (quoth hee) some are of opinion that women are not cold, but hotter than men; yea, and others there be, (and that is a greater matter) who hold, that wine is not hott at all but cold. Florus woondering, and amazed heereat: This discourse and disputation (quoth he) as touching wine I refer to him there; and with that pointed at me; for that not many daies before wee had disputed together about that argument: But as for women (quoth Athrilatus) that they bee rather hot than cold, they argue thus: First and foremost, they are smooth, and not haire on their face and bodie, which testifieth their heat, which spendeth and consumeth the excrement and superfluitie that engendreth haire. Secondly, they proove it by their abundance of blood, which seemeth to be the fountaine of heat in the body; and of blood women have such store, that they are ready to be inflamed, yea, to frie and burne withall, if they have not many purgations, and those quickly returning in their course to discharge and deliver them thereof. Thirdly, they bring in the experience observed at funerals, which sheweth evidently, that womens bodies be farre hotter than mens; for they that have the charge of burning and enterring of dead corpes, doe ordinarily put into the funerall fire one dead body of a woman to tenne of men: For that one corpe (say they) helpeth to burne and consume the rest; by reason that a womans flesh containeth in it I wot not what unctuositie or oileous matter, which quickly taketh fire, and will burne as light as a torch, so that it serveth in stead of drie sticks to kindle the fire, and set all a burning. Moreover, if this be admitted for a truth, that whatsoever is more frutesfull and apter for generation, is also more hot: certaine it is, that yong maidens be ripe betimes, readier for marriage, yea and their flesh pricketh sooner to the act of generation, than boies of their age; neither is this a small and feeble argument of their heat, but for a greater and more pregnant prooffe thereof, marke how they endure very well any chilling cold, and the injurie of winter season, for the most part of them lesse quake for cold than men doe, and generally need not so many clothes to wear.

Heereat Florus began to argue against him and said: In my conceit, these very arguments will serve well to confute the said opinion; for to beginne with the last first, the reason why they withstand cold better than men, is because every thing is lesse offended with the like: besides, their seed is not apt for generation, in regard of their coldnesse, but serveth in stead of matter onely, and yeeldeth nourishment unto the naturall seed of man. Moreover, women sooner give over to conceive, and cease child-bearing, than men to beget children: and as for the burning of their dead bodies, they catch fire sooner I confesse, but that is by reason that commonly they be fatter than men; and who knoweth not, that fatte and grease is the coldest part of the bodie; which is the cause that yong men and those that use much bodily exercise, are least faine of all others: neither is their monthly sicknesse & voidance of blood, a signe of the great quantity and abundance, but rather of the corrupt qualitie and badnesse thereof; for the crude and uncocted part of their blood being superfluous, and finding no place to settle and rest, nor to gather confidence within the bodie by reason of weaknesse, passeth away, as being heavy and troubled, altogether for default and imbecillitie of heat to overcome it: and this appeereth manifestly by this, that ordinarily when their monthly sicknesse is upon them, they are very chill, & shake for cold, for that the blood which then is stirred and in motion, ready to be discharged out of the bodie, is so raw and cold. To come now unto the smoothnesse of their skinned, and that it is not haire; who would ever say that this were an effect of heat? considering that we see the hottest parts of mans bodie to be covered with haire? for surely all superfluities and excrements are sent out by heat, which also maketh way, boring as it were holes through the skinned, and and opening the passages in the superficies thereof. But contrariwise wee may reason, that the sleeknesse of womens skinned is occasioned by coldnesse, which doth confitate and close the pores thereof. Now that womens skinned is more salt and close than mens; you may learne and understand by them (friend Athrilatus) who use to lie in bedde with women, that annoint their bodies with sweet oiles, or odoriferous compositions; for even with sleeping in the same bed with them, although they came not so neere as to touch the women, they finde themselves all perfumed, by reason that their owne bodies which be hot, rare, and open, doe draw the said oinments or oiles into them: Well, by this meanes (quoth he) this question as touching women hath bene debated pro & contra, by opposit arguments right manfully.

THE FIFTH QUESTION.

Whether wine be naturall cold of operation?

BUT I would now gladly know, (quoth Florus still) whereupon your conjecture and suspition should arise, that wine is cold of nature? why? And doe you thinke (quoth I) that this in an opinion of mine? Whose then (quoth the other?) I remember (quoth I) that not of late, but long agoe, I light upon a discourse of Aristotle as touching this probleme: and Epicurus himselfe in his Symposium or banquet, hath discussed the question at large; the summe of which disputation (as I take it) is thus much: For (he saith) that wine is not simple of it selfe hot, but that it containeth in it certaine atomies or indivisible mores causing heat, and others likewise that engender cold; of which some it casteth off and loseth when it is entred into the bodie, others it taketh unto it, from the very bodie it selfe wherein it is; according as the same petite bodies be of nature and temperature, fitted and agreeable unto us; in such sort, as some when they be drunke with wine, are well heat; others againe contrariwise, be as cold. These reasons (replied Florus) directly bring us by Protagoras into the campe of Pyrho, where we shall meet with nothing but incertitude, and be still to seeke, and as wise as we were before: for plaine it is, that in speaking of oile, milke, hönie, and likewise of all other things, we shall never grow to any particular resolution of them, what nature they bee of, but still have some evasion or 30 other, saying: That they become such and such, according as each of them is mixed and tempered one with another: But what be the arguments that your selfe alledge, to prove that wine is cold? Thus I see well (quoth I) that there be two of you at once, who presse and urge mee to deliver my mind ex tempore, and of a sudden: the first reason then that cometh into my head is this, which I see ordinarily practised by physicians upon those who have weake stomachs: for when they are to corroborate and fortifie that part, they prescribe not any thing that is hot; but if they give them wine, they have present ease and helpe thereby; semblable, they repress fluxes of the belly, yea, and when the bodie runneth all to diaphoreticall sweats, which they effect by the meanes of wine, no lesse, nay much more than by applying snow, confirming and strengthening thereby the habit of the bodie, which otherwise was ready to melt 40 away and resolve: now if it had a nature and facultie to heat, it were all one to apply unto the region of the heart; as fire unto snow: furthermore, most physicians do hold, that sleepe is provoked by cooling; and the most part of soporiferous medicines which provoke sleepe, be cold; as for example, Mandragoras and poppie Juice: but these I must needs confesse, with great force and violence doe compresse, and (as it were) congeale the braine to worke that effect; whereas wine cooling the same gently, with ease and pleasure represseth and staith the motion thereof; so that the difference onely betweene it and the other, is but in degree, according to more and lesse. Over and besides, whatsoever is hot is also generative and apt to ingender seed; for howsoever humiditie giveth it an aptitude to run and flow, it is spirit, by the meanes of heat, 50 that endueth it with vigor & strength; yea, and an appetite to generation: now they that drinke much wine, especially if it be pure of it selfe, and not delaid, are more dull and slow to the act of generation, and the seed which they sow, is not effectuell, nor of any force and vigor to ingender; their medling also and conjunction with women, is vaine, and doth no good at all, by reason that their seed is cold and feeble: furthermore, all the accidents and passions which colde worketh, doe befall unto those that be drunke; for they tremble and shake, they are heave and mooveth dull of motion, and looke pale; the spirit in their joints and members, is unquiet, and mooveth disorderly; their tongues falter, stur and be double; last of all, their finewes in the extremities of the bodie, are drawn up in manner of a crampe, and benumbed; yea, and in many, drunkennesse endeth in a dead pallie or generall resolution of all parts; namely, after that the wine hath utterly extinguished and mortified their naturall heat. Physicians also are wont to cure these symptomes and inconveniences procured by excessive drinke and surfer, by laying the patients presently in bedde, and covering them well with clothes, for to bring them to an heat; the next morrow they put them into the baine or hot-house, and rub them wel with oile; they nourish them with meats which do not trouble the masse of the body; and thus by this cherishing, they gently fetch againe and recover the heat which wine had dissipated and driven out of the bodie. And forasmuch as (quoth I) in things apparent and evident to the eie, we search for the like faculties which lie hidden and secret, how can we doubt what drunkenness is, and with what it may be compared? for according as I have before said, drunken folke resemble (for all the world) old men: and therefore it is, that great drunkards soone wax old, many of them become bald before their time, and grow to be grey and hoarie ere they be aged; all which accidents seeme to surprize a man for defect of heat.

Moreover, vinegar (in some sort) resembleth the nature and propertie of wine: now of all things that are powerfull to quench, there is none so repugnant and contrarie to fire, as vinegar is; and nothing so much as it, by the excessive coldness that it hath, overcommeth and representeth a flame. Again, we see how physicians use those fruits to coole withall, which of all others be most vinous, or represent the liquor of wine; as for example, pomegranates and other orchard apples. As for honie, do they not mix the substance thereof with raine-water and snow, for to make thereof a kinde of wine, by reason that the cold doth convert the sweetness for the affinity that is between them, into austeritie, when it is predominant and more puissant? what should I say more? have not our ancients in olde time, among serpents, dedicated the dragon? and of all plants, consecrated Ivie to Bacchus, for this cause, that they be both of a certaine colde and congealing nature? Now if any doe object for prooffe, that wine is hot; how for them that have drunke the juice of hemlocke, the soveraigne remedie and counterpoise of all other, is to take a great draught of strong wine upon it; I will reple to the contrary, and turne the same argument upon them; namely, that wine and the juice of hemlocke mingled together, is a poison incurable, & presently killeth those who drinke it, remediless. So that there is no more reason to prove it hot, for resisting hemlocke, than colde, for helping the operation of it; or els we must say, that it is not coldness whereby hemlocke killeth those that drinke it so presently, but rather some other hidden qualitie and propertie that it hath.

THE SIXTH QUESTION.

Certeine yoong men, who were new students, and had lately tasted of the learning contained in ancient books, were ready to reare Epicurus in pieces, and inveighed mightily against him as an impudent person; for proposing and moving speech which was neither seemly nor necessarie, in his symposium or banquet, as touching the time of meddling with a woman: for that an ancient man, well steeped in yeres as he was, should make mention & begin talke of venerous matters, and namely, at a banquet, where many yoong men were in place, to particularize and make question in this sort: Whether it were better for a man to have the use of his wife, before supper or after; seemed to proceed from a lascivious minde, and incontinent in the highest degree. Against which, some there were, who alledged the example of * Xenophon, who after his supper or banquet, brought his guests (not on foot, but on horse-backe, riding a gallop away home) to lie with their wives. But Zopyrus the physician, who was very well seene and conversant in the books of Epicurus, said: That they had not read diligently and with adveintment, his booke called Symposium, that is to say, The banquet: For he tooke not this question (quoth he) to treat of at the beginning, as a theme or subject matter expressly chosen and of purpose, whereto all their talke should be directed, and in nothing els to be determined and ended: but having caused those yoong men to rise from the table for to walke after supper, he entred into a discourse, for to induce them to continence and temperance, and to withdraw them from dissolute lust of the flesh, as being at all times, a thing dangerous, and ready to plunge a man into mischief, but yet more hurtfull unto those who use it upon a full stomacke, after they have eat and drunke well, and made good cheere at some great feast. And if (quoth Zopyrus) he had taken for the principall subject, the discourse of this point, is it pertinent and becoming a philosopher, pher, not to treat and consider at all of the time and houre proper and meet for men to embrace their espoused wives: or much better so to doe, in due season and with discretion? and is it (I pray you) not discommendable, to dispute thereof elsewhere and at other times? and altogether dishonest, to handle that question at the table or at a feast? for mine owne part, I thinke cleane contrary; namely, that we may with good reason reprove and blame a philosopher, who openly in the day time, should dispute in publicke schooles, of this matter, before all comers, and in the hearing of all sorts of people; but at the table, where there is a standing cup betwixt familiars and friends, and where other-whiles it is expedient to vary and change our talke, which otherwise would be but lewke warme or starke colde for all the wine, how can it be unseemely or dishonest, either to speake or heare ought that is holisome and good for men, as touching the lawfull company with their wives in the secret of marriage? for mine owne part, I protest unto you, I could with all my heart, that those Partitions of Zeno, had bene couched in some booke entituled, A banquet or pleasant treatise, rather than bestowed (as they are) in a composition so grave and serious, as are the books of policie and government of State. The yoong men at these words, were cut over the thumbs; and being abashed, held their tongues, and sat them downe quietly. Now when others of the company requested Zopyrus to rehearse the words and reasons of Epicurus, as touching this point, I am not able (quoth he) in particular, to decipher, and precisely to set them downe as he delivered them; but I suppose the philosopher feared those violent concussions and motions, which are felt in the time of that conjunction; for that our bodies by that means, be woonderfully stirred and disquieted, in regard especially of the wine, which being of it selfe stirring and causing much turbulent agitation, it setteth the bodie ordinarily out of quiet repose: if then the full masse thereof, being in such an agitation, meet not with a settled calme and rest, by sleepe, but runneth on still headlong to other troublesome motions, caused by the sports of Venus, so that the cords and ligaments, which are wont to hold our bodies entire, and mainteine them firme and strong, be slackted and loosed, great danger there is, that the foundation being thus shaken, the whole edifice will fall to the ground: for surely at such a time, the very genitall seed is not so apt and ready to passe away with ease, being so pent and confitiate (as it is) by reason of repletion; so that it must be fetched away perforce, all troubled and confused. In which regard (quoth Epicurus) a man is to goe about this business, when the bodie is at quiet and well settled; namely, after that the concoction and digestion both, of our food, is perfectly finished, which all that time runneth to and fro, and willingly avoideth all such disquietness, untill (I say) the bodie have need of new nourishment. And for to confirme this opinion of Epicurus, a man may adjoine a reason out of physicke; namely: That the opportunity of the morrow-morning, when the concoction is thorowly performed, is most safe and sure; whereas to struggle or meddle with a woman immediately after supper, is never without danger: for who can tell (before the meat be well concocted) whether after the paining agitation by the act of Venus, there will not ensue another cruditie and indigestion, so as a double inconvenience and surfer upon surfer may follow thereupon? Then Olympicus taking his tyme to speake and opine: As for me, I am (quoth he) infinitely well pleased with that sentence of Climas the Pythagorean; who being demanded the question, when the best time was to embrace a woman? Maric (quoth he) when thou art minded to do thy selfe most harme: for that which Zopyrus said even now of the fit time, carrieth some reason with it: and as for the other, it hath (I see well) many and sundry difficulties and inconveniences, and is altogether unseasonable for this purpose. Like as therefore, Thales the wife, being importuned by his mother (who pressed hard upon him) to marrie; prettily put her off, shifting and avoiding her cunningly, with words: for at the first time, when she was in hand with him, he said unto her: Mother, it is too soone, and it is not yet time: afterwards, when he had passed the flower of his age, and that she set upon him the second time, and was very instant: Alas mother, it is now too late, and the time is past; even so, it were good for every man to carry and governe himselfe in these amorous games of Venus, that when he goes to bed at night, he say to himselfe: It is not yet time; and when hee riseth in the morning: Now there is no time left. Hereupon Socrates: These be indeed (quoth he) Olympicus, the parts of champions, and require such as would enter combat for to win a prize at the sacred games: these matters (I say) altogether, are for those to performe, who can drinke wine freely, and make a game of it, yea, and eat flesh as lustily: but surely, this speech of yours, little becometh this time and place; for heere are a sort of fresh and lustie yoong men newly married, * See Xenophon in the end of his Symposium or banquet.

*By whom, not well, the works, in some degree,
Of love and Venus, must performed be.*

Neither is dame Venus as yet, retired and fled altogether from us; for we stil in chanting hymnes unto the gods, pray devoutly other-whiles unto her, in this wise:

O Venus, laide deere and goddesse faire, Hold aske olde age, keepe from us boarie faire.

But let us consider now (if you thinke it good) whether Epicurus hath done well and decently, as he ought to doe, in taking away Venus from the night season; or whether he hath not rather offended against all right and reason in so doing; considering that Menander, a man well scene in love-matters, saith: That hee is acquainted with her above all other gods and goddeses: for in mine opinion, well ordeined was this vaile and shade of darkenesse, to cover those that are minded to performe these acts, and in some sort to hide the pleasure from them, and not to come unto this game by day-light, thereby to chafe from out of their eie-sight all shame and to give meanes unto lascivious wantonnesse, for to be bold and confident; and finally, to imprint the memorie of the act so lively, that it may remaine long after in the minde, for to kindle and revive still, new lusts and fleshly desires: For the eie-sight (as Plato saith) passeth most swiftly thorow the fleshly affections of the body into us, that is to say, into our soule, and evermore awakeneth and raiseth fresh and new concupiscence, representing with great force and vehemencie, the images of pleasure, and putting us in minde to pursue the same; whereas contrariwise, the night taking away the greatest part of such acts as be most furious, lulleth nature asleepe, and bringeth her (as it were) to bed, in such sort, as it doth not exorbitate or breake forth by meanes of the sight, into lascivious loosenesse. But over and besides all this, what reason or sense is there in this, that a married man, returning all jolly, fresh and merry, from a festivall supper, and peradventure with a gay chaplet of flowers upon his head, yea, and perfumed with sweet and odoriferous oiles, should come home, go to bed, turne his backe unto his wife, pull the clothes about him round, and so lie to sleepe all night; and the morrow after, in broad day-light and in the mids of household occasions and other affaires, send for his wife out of the nourse or womens roome, for to come unto him about such a matter; or in the morning, turne unto her and imbrace her in his armes, at such a time as the cocke treads his hennes? for the even-tide (my good friend Olympicus) is the end and repose of all out day-labours past, and the morning is the beginning of new travels. Of the evening, god Bacchus is the superintendent and president, who is surnamed Lysus or Liber, for that hee freech us from all paines-taking; and accompanied he is in this presidencie of his, with the mules, to wit, faire Terpsichore, who loveth daunces, and pleasant Thalia, who delighteth in feasts and banquets; whereas the morning riseth betimes by the breake of day, to do service unto Athena, surnamed Ergane, the work-mistresse or patronesse of artificers; to Mercurie likewise, the master of merchants and occupiers: and therefore upon the evening, attend songs, musicke, minstrelsie; plaies, daunces, weddings,

Musiques, mommeries, feasts and banquets,

Noise of h. w. boies, flutes, and cornets,

In the morning a man shall heare nothing but the thumping sounds of the smiths hammer and sledges, bearing and knocking upon the anvill; the grating noise of sawes; the morrow-watch of Publicans, Customers and Toll-gatherers, crying after those that come in or go forth; the journeymen of serjeants and criers, calling for apparance in the court before the judges; publications of edicts and proclamations; summons to attend and be ready to make court, and to do duetie unto some prince, great lord or governour of State; at which time, all pleasures be gone and out of the way.

*Of Venus then there is no talke,
The slaves of Bacchus do not walke
With Iove light: the game some sport
Of gallant youth is, is all a-mort:
For why? as day grows on apace,
Cares and troubles come in place.*

Moreover, you shall never reade, that the poet Homer reporteth of any worthy prince and demi-god, that in the day-time he lay either with wife or concubine; onely he saith, that Paris, when he fled out of the battell, went and couched himselfe in the bosome and lap of his Helena; giving us thereby to understand, that it is not the part of an honest minded husband, but the act of a furious and wanton-given adulterer, to follow such pleasures in the day-time. Neither doth it follow (as Epicurus saith) that the bodie takes more harme by performing this duetie of marriage after supper, than in the morning, unlesse a man be so drunke or overcharged with meates, that his bellie is ready to cracke; for certainly, in such a case it were very hurtfull and dangerous indeed: but if one have taken his meat and drinke sufficiently, be wel in health, and in some measure cheerefull; if his bodie be apt and able, his minde well disposed thereto; if hee interpose some reasonable time betweene, and then fall to clip and imbrace his wife; he shall not thereby incurre any great agitation that night, nor feare the heavie load and repletion of meat; neither will this action worke him any damage, or coole him too much, ne yet disquiet and remoove out of their place, the atomies (as Epicurus saith); but if hee compole himselfe afterwards to sleepe and repose, he shall soone supplie againe that which was voided, and replenish the vessels with a new afflux of spirits, which were emptied by the said evacuation. But of all things, especiall heed would be taken, not to play at this game of Venus in the day time; for feare lest the body and minde both, being troubled already with the cares and travels of fundry affaires, be by this meanes more exasperat and inflamed, considering that nature hath not a sufficient and competent time betweene, to repose and refresh her selfe: for all men (my good friend) have not that great leasure which Epicurus had, neither are they provided for their whole life-time, of that rest and tranquillity, which he said, that he got by good letters and the study of philosophy: nay, there is not one in maner, but every day he finds himselfe amused and employed about many affaires and busineses of this life, which holde him occupied; to which, it were neither good nor expedient for a man to expose his body, so resolved, enfeebled and weakened with the furious exploit of concupiscence. Leaving him therefore to his foolish opinion of the gods, that being immortal and happy, they have no care of our affaires, nor busie themselves therewith, let us obey the lawes, maners and customes of our owne country, as every honest man ought to do; namely, to be sure in the morning to go into the temple, and to lay our hands upon the sacrifice, if haply a little before, we have done such a deed. For in truth, well it were, that interposing the night and our sleepe betweene, after a sufficient time and competent space, we should come to present our selves pure and cleane, as if we were risen new men with the new day, and purposing to leade a new life, as Democritus was wont to lay.

30 THE SEVENTH QUESTION.

What is the cause that Must or new wine doth not inebriate or make folke drunke?

The maner was in Athens, to give the assay, and to taste new wines the eleventh day of the moneth [February] which day they named Pithugia; and verily in olde time, they observed this ceremonie, to powre out the first drawing thereof unto the gods, before they dranke of it, making their praies devoutly, that the use of this medicinable drinke might be holosome and healthfull, not noisome nor hurtfull unto them. But in our country this moneth is called Hyemivius, the first day of which moneth, the manner was to pierce their vessell first, and taste new wines, after they had sacrificed to good Fortune, and good Demon, and that the westerne winde Zephyrus had done blowing; for of all windes, this is it that most troubleth, disquieteth, and turneth wine: and looke what wine may escape this season, great hope there is that it will hold and continue good all the yeere after: according to which custome my father upon a time sacrificed as his maner was; and after supper finding that his wine was good & commendable, he propoed this question unto certene yong men that were students with mee in philosophy: How it came to passe that new wine would not make a man drunke: the thing seemed at the first unto many a very strange and incredible paradox: But Agias said: That this new sweet wine was every way offensive unto the stomacke, and quickly glured it; by reason whereof a man could hardly drinke so much of Must, as were sufficient to overturne his braines: so for that the appetite is quickly dulled and wearied, for the small pleasure that it taketh, so soone as it feelth no more thirst. Now that there is a difference betweene sweet and pleasant, the poet Homer knew well enough and gave us so much to understand when he said:

With cheefe and hony that is sweet:

With pleasant wine, a drunke most meet,

For in truth wine at the first is to be counted sweet, but in the end it becommeth pleasant, namely, after it hath age, and by the meanes of working, ebullition and concoction, passed to a certene harshnesse and austeritie. But Aristanetus of Nica said: That he well remembered how he had read in a certaine place in some books: That Must mingled with wine staith & represseth drunkennesse; he added moreover and said: That there were physicians who ordeined for them that had overdrunke themselves; to take when they went to bed, a piece of bread dipped in hony and to eat it? If then it be so, that sweet things doe mitigate and dull the force of wine: good reason it is, that new wine should not inebriate, untill the sweetnesse thereof be turned into pleasantnesse. We approved greatly the discourse of these two young men, for that they fell not upon triviall and common reason, but had devised new: for these be they that are alledged by every man, and ready at hand, to wit; the heaviness of Must or new wine, as Aristotle saith, which maketh the belly soluble, and so it breaketh thorow the quantitie of flatulent and muddy spirits that abide therein, together with the waterie substance, of which the ventosities directly get fourth, as expelled by force; but the aquositie by the owne nature enfeebleth the strength of the wine: like as contrariwise age augmenteth the power thereof, for that the warlike substance is now gone; by reason whereof, as the quantitie of the wine is diminished, so the quality and vertue is increased.

THE EIGHT QUESTION.

What is the reason is, that they who be thoroughly drunke, are lesse brasse-sicke than those who are but in the way of drunkennesse.

Seeing then (quoth my father) that we have begun already to disquiet the ghost of Aristotle, it shall not be amisse to trie what we can say of our selves, as touching those whom wee call drunken, that is to say, who are well heat with wine, but not yet starke drunke: for howsoever Aristotle was ordinarily very quicke and subtle in resolving such questions, yet in mine opinion he hath not sufficiently and exactly delivered the reason thereof; for as farre as I can gather out of his words (he saith) That the discourse of reason in a man who is sober, judgeth aright and according to the truth of things as they be: contrariwise, his sense and understanding who is cleane gone, & as they say dead drunke, is done and oppressed altogether: as for the apprehension and imagination of him who hath taken his wine well, and is but halfe drunke, is yet found, many his reason and judgement is troubled already and crackt: and therefore such judge indeed, but they judge amisse, for that they follow their phantasies onely: but what thinke you of this? For mine owne part (quoth I) when I consider with my selfe his reason, it seemeth sufficiently to have rendered a cause of this effect; but if you would have us to search farther into the thing, and devise some speciall new matter? marke first, whether this difference which hee maketh betweene them, ought not to be referred to the bodie: for in these that have well drunke, there is nothing but the discourse of reason onely troubled; because the bodie being not yet thoroughly drenched and drowned in wine, is able to doe service unto the will and appetite; but if it be once off the hookes, (as they say) or utterly oppressed, it forsaketh and betrayeth the appetites, and breaketh day with the affections, being so farre shaken and out of joint, that it can serve no more, nor execute the will: whereas the other having the bodie still at command, and ready to exorbitate together with the will, and to sinne with it for companie, are more seene and discovered, not for that they be more foolish, and have lesse use of reason, but because they have greater means to shew their follie. But if we should reason from another principle, and go another way to worke (quoth I) he that will consider well the force of wine, shall find no let, but that in regard of the quantitie, it altereth and becommeth divers, much like unto the fire, which if it be moderate, hardeneth and baketh the tile or pot of clai; but in case it be very strong, & the heat excessive, it melteth & dissolveth the same: and on the other side; the spring or summer season at the beginning breedeth fevers and setteth them on fire, which in the progresse and middes thereof being grown to their heights, decline and cease altogether. What should hinder then, but the minde and understanding which naturally is disquieted and troubled with wine, after it is once off the wheelles, and cleane overturned by the excessive quantitie thereof should come into order * againe, and be settled as it was before? Much like therefore as Ellebore beginneth his operation to purge, by overturning the stomacke, and disquieting the whole masse of the body; and if it be given in a lesse dose or quantitie than it should be; well it may trouble, but purge it will not: also as wee see some, who take medicines for to provoke sleepe, under the iust and full quantitie which is prescribed, in stead of sleepe and repose, finde themselves more vexed and tormented than before; and others againe, if they take more, sleepe soundly:

* Elebore by many is a purgative
but a man may drunke his effects etc.

soundly; even so it standeth to good reason, that the brain-sicknesse of him who is halfe drunke, after it is grown once to the highest strength and vigour, doth diminish and decay; to which purpose now wine serveth very well, and helpeth much: for being powred into the body with great abundance, it burneth and consumeth that spice of madnesse which troubleth the minde and use of reason; much after the manner of that dolefull song, together with the heavy sound of hautboies in the funerals of dead folke, at the first mooveth compassion, and setteth the cies a weeping, but after it hath drawn the soule so to pittie and compassion, it proceedeth farther, and by little and little it spendeth and riddeth away all sense of dolour and sorrow; semblably a man (shal observe, that after the wine hath mightily troubled, disquieted the vigorous & courageous part of the soule, men quickly come to themselves, & their minds be settled in such sort as they become quiet, and take their repose when wine and drunkennesse hath passed as farre as it can.

THE NINTH QUESTION.

What is the meaning of the common proverb: Drinke either five, or three, but not four?

When I had thus said, Ariston crying out aloud as his manner was: I see well now (quoth he) that there is opened a reentrance, and returne againe of measures into seats and banquets, by vertue of a most iust and popular decree: which measures by meanes of (I wot not what) sober season, as by a tyrant have bene this long time banished from thence: for like as they who professe a canonicall harmonie in sound, of the harpe, doe holde and say: That the proportion Hemiolios or Sesquialterall, produceth the symphonie or muscicall accord Diapenta, of the duple proportion ariseth that Diapason: but as for the musike or accord called Diatessaron, which of all others is most obscure and dull, it consisteth in the proportion Epitritos; even so, they that make profession of skill in the harmonies of Bacchus, have observed, that three symphonies or accords there are, betwene wine & water, namely, Diapenta, Diatrion, & Diatessaron, singing and saying after this manner: Drinke five, or three, and not four; for the fit standeth upon the proportion Hemiolios, or Sesquialterall to wit, when three parts or measures of water be mingled with two of wine; and the third containe the duple proportion; namely when two parts of water be put to one of wine; but the fourth answereth to the proportion of three parts of water powred into one of wine; and verily this measure or proportion Epitritos, may fit some grave and wise senators sitting in parliament; or the Archons in the counsell chamber Prætorum for to dispatch waightie affaires of great consequence: and it may be seeme well enough some logicians that pull up their browes, when they are busie in reducing, unfolding, and altering their Syllogismes; for surely it is a mixture or temperature sober and weake enough: as for the other twaine, that medley which carrieth the proportion of two for one, bringeth in that turbulent tone of the Acrothoraces before said; to wit, of such as are somewhat cup-shotten and halfe drunke:

Which stirs the strings and cords of secret hart,

That mooveth should not be, but rest apart.

For it neither suffereth a man to bee fully sober, nor yet to drench himselfe so deepe in wine, that hee bee altogether wideffe and past his sense: but the other standing upon the proportion of two to three, is of all others the most muscicall accord, causing a man to sleepe peaceable, and to forget all cares, resembling that good and fertile corne-field which Hesiodus speaketh of,

That dash from man all cares and curses drive,

And children cause to rest, to feed, and thrive.

It appeareth and stilleth all proud, violent, and disordered passions arising within our heart, inducing in the stead of them a peaceable calme and tranquillitie. These speeches of Ariston no man there, would crosse or contradict; for that it was well known he spake merily: but I willed him to take the cup in hand, and as if he held the harpe or lute, to tune and set the same, to that accord and consonance which he so highly praised, and thought so good. Then came a boy close unto him, and powred out strong wine; which he refused, saying, (and that with a laughter) That his musike consisted in reason and speculation, and not in the practise of the instrument. But my father added thus much moreover to that which had bene said: That as hee thought, the auncient poets also had to great reason feigned; that whereas Jupiter had two nurses nurses, to wit, Ida and Adrastia; Juno one, namely, Euboea; Apollo likewise twaine, that is to say, Aletheia, and Corythalia; Bacchus had many more; for that he was suckled and nursed by many nymphes, because this god forsooth had need of more measures of water, signified by the nymphs to make him more tame, gentle, witty, and wise.

THE TENTH QUESTION.

What is the reason that any killed flesh will be naught and corrupt sooner under the raies of the moone, than in the sunne?

Entydemus of Sunium, feasted us upon a time at his house, and set before us a wilde bore, of such bignesse, that all wee at the table woodred thereat; but he told us that there was another brought unto him farre greater; many naught it was, and corrupted in the cariage, by the beames of the moone-shine: whereof he made great doubt and question, how it should come to passe; for that he could not conceive, nor see any reason, but that the sunne should rather corrupt flesh, being as it was, farre hotter than the moone. Then Saryrus: This is not the thing (quoth he) whereat a man should marvell much in this case; but rather at that which hunters practise; for when they have stricken downe either a wilde bore, or a stagge, and are to send it farre into the citie, they use to drive a spike or great naile of brasle into the body, as a preservative against putrefaction. Now when supper was done, Entydemus calling to minde his former question, was in hand withall againe, and set it now on foot: And then Moschion the physician shewed unto them, that the putrefaction of flesh was a kinde of eliquation and running all to moisture; for that corruption bringeth it unto a certeine humiditie, so as what-ever is sappie or corrupted, becommeth more moist than it was before: Now it is well known (quoth he) that all heat which is mild and gentle, doth stirre, dilate, and spread the humours in the flesh: but contrariwise, if the same be ardent, fierie, and burning, it doth attenuate and re- streine them: by which appeereth evidently the cause of that which is in question; for the moone gently warming bodies, doth by consequence moisten the same; whereas the sunne by his extreme heat catcheth up and consumeth rather that humiditie which was in them: unto which Archilocus the poet alludeth like a naturall philosopher when he said:

*I hope, she dogge starre Sirius,
In fire heat so furious
With raies most ardent will them smite,
And numbers of them dry up quite.*

And Homer more plainly spake of Helior, over whose body lying along dead: Apollo (quoth he) displayed and spread a darke and shadowy cloud:

*For feare lest that the scorching beames,
Of sunne aloft in skie,
Should on his corps have power, the flesh and nerves to parch and dry.*

Contrariwise, that the moone casteth weaker and more sickeley raies; the poet Virg sheweth, saying:

*The grapes doe finde no helpe by thee,
To ripen on the vine,
And never change their colour blacke, that they might make good wine.*

These words thus passed: And then all the rest (quoth I) is very well said, & I approve thereof; but that al the matter should lie in the quantity of heat, more or lesse considering the season, I see not how it should stand; for this we find, that the sunne doth heat lesse in winter, & corrupteth more in summer: whereas we should see contrary effects, if putrefactions were occasioned by the imbecillitie of heat; but now it is far otherwise, for the more that the suns heat is augmented, the sooner doth it putrifie & corrupt any flesh killed: and therefore we may as well inferre, that it is not for default of heat, nor by any imbecillitie thereof; that the moone causeth dead bodies to putrifie, but we are to reterre that effect to some secret propertie of the influence proceeding from her: for that all kinds of heat have but one qualitie, and the same differing onely in degree, according to more or lesse: that the very fire also hath many divers faculties, and those not resembling one another, appeareth by daily & ordinary experiences: for gold-smiths melt and

and worke their gold with the flame of light straw and chaffe: physicians doe gently warme (as it were) in Balneo those drougues, and medicines which they are to boile together most all with a fire made of vine cuttings; for the melting, working, blowing, and forming of glasse; it seemeth that a fire made of Tamarix is more meet than of any other matter whatsoever; the heat caused by olive-tree wood, serveth well in drie stoupes or hot houses, and disposeth mens bodies to sweate; but the same is most hurtfull to baines and baths; for if it bee burned under a furnace, it hurtheth the boord-floores and feelings; it marreth also the verie foundations and ground-works: whereupon it cometh, that Aediles for the State, such as have any skill and understanding, when they let to ferme the publicke baines unto Publicans and Farmers, except ordinarily olive-tree wood, forbidding exprelly, those that rent them at their hands, nor to use the same; as also not to cast into the furnace or fire with which they give an heat unto them, the seed of Darnell; for that the smoaks and fumes which ariseth from such matters, ingender head-ach and heaviness of the braine, together with a dizziness and swimming in the head, in as many as wash or bathe in them. And therefore, no marvell it is, that there should be such a difference betwene the heat of the sunne and of the moone, considering that the one by his influence doth drie, and the other by her power dissolveth humors, and in somebodies (by that meanes) causeth rheumes: and therefore discrete and carefull nurses take great heed how they expose their sucking babes against the raies of the moone, for that such infants (being full of moisture, like to sappie-green wood) will (as it were) warpe, twine, and cast at one side by that meanes. And an ordinary thing it is to be seene, that whosoever sleepe in the moone-shine, be hardly awakened, as if their senses were stupefied, benumbed, and astoned: for surely, the humors (being dissolved and dilated by the influence of the moone) doe make bodies heavie. Moreover, it is said, that the full-moone (by relaxing and resolving humors in this wise) helpeth women in travell of child-bearing, to easie deliverance. Whereupon, in my judgement, Diana, which is nothing els but the very moone, is called Lochia or Ilithyia, as having a speciall hand in the birth of children; which Timotheus direct- ly testifieth in these verses:

*Therow azure skie, with starres beset,
By moone that giveth speed Of child-birth, and doth ease the paine of women, in their need.*

Moreover, the moone sheweth her power most evidently even in those bodies, which have nei- ther sense nor lively breath; for carpenters reject the timber of trees fallen in the full-moone, as being soft and tender, subject also to the worne and putrefaction, and that quickly, by reason of excessive moisture; husbandmen likewise, make haste to gather up their wheat and other graine from the threshing-floore, in the wane of the moone, and toward the end of the month, that being hardened thus with driness, the heape in the garner may keepe the better from being fustie, and continue the longer; whereas corne which is inned and laid up at the full of the moone, by reason of the softnesse and over-much moisture, of all other, doth almost cracke and burst. It is commonly said also, that if a leaven be laid in the full-moone, the paste will rise and take leaven better; for although it have but a little leaven, & lesse in quantitie than ordinary, yet it faileth not by the sharpnesse thereof (by meanes of rarefaction) to make the whole masse and lump of dow to swell and be leavened.

To returne now unto flesh that is caught, and beginneth to putrifie, it is occasioned by no- thing els but this, that the spirit which maineineth and knitteth the same fast, turneth into moi- sture, and so by that meanes, it becommeth over-tender, loose, and apt to runne to water: an ac- cident, which wee may observe in the very aire, which resolveth more in the full of the moone, than at any other time, yea, and yeeldeth greater store of dewes: which the poet Alcan signi- fied enigmatically and covertly unto us, when he saith in one place, that dew is the daughter

What things on earth, the dew as nows doth feed, Whom Jupiter and moone betwixt them breed.

Thus evident testimonies we have from all parts, that the light of the moone is waterish, and hath a certeine propertie to liquifie, and by consequence, to corrupt and putrifie.

As for the brasen spike or naile above mentioned, if it be true (as some hold and say) that be- ing driven into the body, it preserveth the flesh for a time from rottenhead and putrefaction: it seemeth to worke this effect, by a certeine attractive qualitie and vertue that it hath; for the flower

flower of brasse, called Ver-de-gris, physicians doe use in their astrigent medicines: and by report, those that frequent mines, out of which brasse-ore is digged, finde much helpe thereby for bleered and rheumaticke eies; yea, and some thereby have recovered the haire of their eie-lids, after they were shed and fallen off: for the small scales or fine powder in maner of flowre, which commeth and falleth from the brasse-stone Chakitis, getting closely into the eie-lids, staith the rheume; and represseth the flux of weeping and waterie eies: and thereupon it is said, that the poet Homer hath given these attributes and epithites unto brasse, calling it divines and ruynes. Besides, Aristotle saith, that the wounds inflicted by speares and lances with brazen heads, by swords also made of brasse, are lesse painfull, and be sooner healed, than those which are given by the same weapons of iron and Steele; for that brasse hath a kinde of medicinable vertue in it, which the said weapons doe leave behinde them immediatly in the wounds. Moreover, that astringent things be contrary unto those that purrifie; and that preservatives or healing matters, have an opposit facultie to such as cause corruption, it is very plaine and evident; so that the reason is manifest of the said operation: unlesse haply some one will alledge, that the brazen spike or nail in piercing thorow the flesh, draweth unto it the humours thereof, considering that there is evermore a flux in that part which is hurt and wronged. Over and besides, it is said, that there appeareth alwaies some marke or spot, blacke and blew, about that very place of the flesh, betwaying (as it were) some mortification; a probable argument, that all the rest remaineth sound and entire, when the corruption runneth and floweth thither as it doth.

* I suppose Homer used the words in a false other sense, by Mischion leave beir spoken, who was a better physician, than a grammarian, as it should seeme.

The Proeme.

Polybius in times past (6 Sextus Senecio) gave unto Serpio Africano this good advertisement: Never to depart out of the market or common place, where citizens daily assembled about their affaires, untill he had gotten one new friend or other, more than he had before: Where you must understand this name of friend, not precisely as the Stoicks doe, nor after the subtile acception of the word, according to curious Sophysters; namely, for him that continueth firme, fast for ever and immutable; but after a civill and vulgar manner, for a well-willer, as Diarchum meant, when he said: That we ought to make all men our well-willers, but honest men onely our friends: for surely, this true friendship and amitie can not be gotten and purchased, but in long time, and by vertue; whereas that good-will of civill persons, may be gained by affaires and dealings one with another, by conference and conversation, and other-whiles, by playing and gaming together; namely, when opportunities of time and place meeteth therewith, which helpeth not a little to the winning of humane affection and favour among men. But consider now, whether that lesson and precept of Polybius may be fitted, not onely to the market and common place aforesaid, but also to a feast or banquet; namely, That a man ought never to rise from the table, nor to depart from the company met at a feast, before he know, that he hath acquired the love and good affection of some one of those there assembled; and so much the rather, because men repaire ordinariely to the publike place of the citie about other negotiations and buisnesse; but to a feast, wise and discreet persons come as much to get new friends, as to do pleasure unto those whom they have already: and therefore (as it were) a base, absurd and libellous part, to seeme to carry away from a feast or banquet any thing whatsoever; so to goe from thence with more friends than he brought thither at his entrance, is a delectable, honest and honourable thing: like as on the contrary side, he that is negligent and carelesse in this behalfe, maketh that meeting and fellowship unpleasant and unprofitable unto himselfe, and so he goes his way as one that had supped with his bellie; and not with his minde and spirit; for he that commeth as a guest to supper among others; commeth not onely to take his part with them, of bread, wine, meats and junkets, but to communicate also in their discourses in their learning, yea, and their pleasant courtisie, tending all in the end, to good will and amitie. For wretchers to catch and take fast hold one of another, had need of dust strewd upon their hands; but wine at the table, especially when it is accompanied with good talke, is that which giveth meanes to lay holde upon friends, and to knit them together. For * speech doth transfuse and derive by discourse and communication, as it were, by conduits and pipes, courtisie and humanity, from the bodie to the mind; for otherwise, dispersed it is, and wandreth all over the bodie, and doth no other good at all, but onely fill and fatisfie the fauce. And like as marble taketh from iron red-hot, the fluxible moisture, by cooling it, and maketh that softnesse to become hard and stiffe, whereby it is more apt to retaine the impression of any forme received; even so honest discourse and talke at the table, suffereth not the guests that are eating and drinking together, to run endlong still, and be carried away with the strength of wine; but staith them, and causeth their mirth and jollitie (proceeding from their libell drinking) to be well tempered, lovely, well becoming, yea, and apt to be sealed (as it were) with the signet of amity and friendship, if a man know with dexterity, how to handle and manage men, when they are thus made soft and tender, yea, and capable of any impression, through kinde heat, by the meanes of wine and good cheere.

THE FIRST QUESTION.

Whether the food consisting of sundry sorts of viands, be easier of digestion, than the simple?

The first question then, of this fourth Decade of Table discourses, shall be concerning diversitie of meats: for by occasion of the solemne feast * Elaphobolia, for the celebration whereof

* That is to say, The Stag killing.

whereof we went to the city Hyampolia. Philon the physician invited us, who (as it should seeme) had made great preparation of good cheere, to entertaine us magnificently; and seeing with Philemus a yong lad his sonne, feeding heartily upon drie bread without calling for any other meat to it, tooke occasion to breake out into this admiration: O Hercules, now surely here is the common proverbe verified indeed!

*They fought in place all full of stone, and therewith he leapt forth, and ran into the kitchen to fetch some good victuals for them: and after he had staid a pretie while away, he came againe and brought nothing with him, but a few drie figs and some cheefe; which when I saw: This is (quoth I) the ordinary fashion of those, who having made provision of rare and exquisite things, which also be costly and sumptuous, do neglect those which be good and necessarie, whereof afterwards, they finde a misse and want. I never remembred (quoth Philon) that our Philemus heere, seemeth to feed after the maner of * Socratus, who never (by report) did eat or drinke any thing, all his lifetime, but onely milke: but as for him, very like it is, that upon some change of minde, he began this maner of diet, and that he had not alwaies lived so; but this Philemus here, like another Chiron, feedeth his sonne (like as Achilles was brought up from his very infancie) with such meats as have no blood in them, that is to say, of the fruits of the earth. And thinke you not, that by this certaine demonstration, he verifieth that which is written of the grasshoppers; namely, that they live of the aire and dew? I never thought upon a supper (quoth Philemus) or a feast of an hundred beasts killed for sacrifice, as they were when Arifomenes feasted his friends; for otherwise, I would have come from home well provided before-hand of simple viands, which be holisome and healthfull, as preservatives hanging about our necks, against these sumptuous, surfetous & feaverous feasts; for that I have heard many times physicians say: That simple viands are easier of digestion, than varietie of meats, like as they be also readier at hand, and sooner provided. Then Marcius directing his speech unto Philo: This Philemus heere (quoth he) marres all your provision of good cheere, frightening as he doth your guests, and (what lies in him) withdrawing them from eating thereof: but if you will request me, I shall answer in your behalfe, I will pawne my selfe also and be their warrant, yea and proove unto them afterwards, that the diversitie of meats is more easie to be concocted and digested, than their simplicitie and uniformitie, to the end that they may in the meane time be the bolder and better assured to fall unto their victuals, & make merry with that plentiful fare that you have ordered for us: Then Philo entreated Marcius so to doe.
But from the earth could lift up none.*

Now after that we had supped, we called upon Philemus to set in hand with the accusation of this multiplicitie of sundry and divers viands: Why (quoth he againe) I am not the author of this position; neither is it I that have said so; but this good host of ours Philo heere, who evermore telleth us: First and formost, that those beasts which feede upon a simple kinde of meat, and the same alwaies one, live more healthie than men; whereas they that be kept up and crammed in coupes, cages, mewes, & bartons, or otherwise franke-fed & fattened, are in greater danger to fall into diseales, & more subject to crudities, for that their meat is set before them mingled, compounded, and in some sort delicately condited. Secondly, there was never yet any physician so bold and venturesome in making new experiments, who durst offer unto his patient sicke of an ague, any meat or nourishment so compounded of divers sorts; but ordered there is for them alwaies the simplest that can be had, & least smelling of the kitchen and cooks craft; as that which is most easie to be concocted in the stomacke: for in truth our meats should suffer alteration, and be wrought by the naturall faculties within us: and like as the colours which are most simple doe strike the deepest die, and give the best tincture; and among oiles that which hath no sent at all, taketh best the aromatically drougues and odors of the perfumes, and sooner turneth or chaungeth than any other; even so the simplest nourishment is that, which most easily is altered and concocted by the vertue digestive: whereas if there be many and sundry qualities, and those of a contrary operation, they corrupt soone; for that they fight and runne one against the other, and so hinder concoction; much like as in a citie, the confused multitude of many nations huddled together from all parts, hardly will ever grow to any agreement, & consistence well united and accordant; for that ech partie leaneth to their owne rites, striveth to draw all to their owne commoditie, and followeth their private affections against others, hardly or never agreeing and framing well with strangers. Moreover, we may have a most evident and infallible argument of this by the familiar example of wine, for nothing there is that so doth inebriate, as varietie and change of wines; and it seemeth that drunkenesse is nothing els

but the indigestion of wine: and therefore our great professed drinkers avoid all that ever they can, mixt and brewed wines; yea & they that are the brewers and minglers thereof, doe it as secretly as it is possible; like to those that lie in ambush: for surely every change brings with it inequality, and a kinde of extasie, putting all out of frame; which is the cause likewise that musicians are very wary how they stire or strike many strings together, & yet there is no other harme at all to be suspected but the mixture and varietie. This I dare be bold to affirme, that a man will sooner beleve & consent to a thing where contrary reasons be alledged, than make good concoction, and digestion of divers and sundry faculties: but because I would not bee thought to speake in jest, leaving these prooves, I will come to the reasons of Philo: for wee have heard him oftentimes say: That it is the quality of the meat that causeth difficultie of digestion, and that the mixture of many things is pernicious, and engendreth strange accidents: and therefore we ought to take knowledge by experience, what is friendly and agreeable to nature, that we may use the same, and rest contented therein; and if peradventure there bee nothing of the owne nature hard to be concocted, but that it is the quantitie alone that troubleth and hurteth our stomacke, and there corrupteth, so much the rather in mine advice we ought to forbear divers sorts of viands, wherewith Phileas cooke exercising his art cleane contrarie to his masters, hath even now empoisoned and bewitched us, by diversifying our appetite and by novelties and change, not sufficing it to bee wearie, and to refuse any thing, feeding it still with one thing after another, and causing it by this varietie to passe the bonds of contentment in reason; much like unto the foster-father of lady Hippolyte:

*Who being set in meadow gay,
Flower after flower did crop away:
And yet his minde so childish was,
And in desire so furie did passe,
That bootie none would him content,
Vntill the flowers most part off went.*

In this case therefore it were good withall to remember the wise instruction of Socrates, who giveth us counsell to take heed and beware of those viands which draw men on to eat, when they are not hungry, wherein his meaning was this and none other; that we should avoid and feare the diversitie and pluralitie of meats: for this is it that causeth us to exceed the bounds of suffiance, farther than needfull is, and retaineth our pleasure in things that content the eie and the eare, in venerous matters, in plaies, games, and all kindes of sport, being continually refreshed and renewed still with a singularitie and superfluitie that hath many heads: whereas in simple and uniforme pleasures, the attractive delight never exceedeth the necessitie of nature. To be short, of this minde I am: That a man would better endure a musician, who commended a confusion of many strings discordant; or a master of wrestlers who praised the annointing of bodies for exercise, with sweet oiles and perfumed ointments; than a physician who recommended this multiplicitie and varietie of viands; for surely such alterations and changes from one dish to another, must needs force and drive us out of the right way to health.

After that Philemus had thus said: I am of this minde (quoth Marcius) that not onely they who disjoine and sever profit from honestie, incur the malediction of Socrates, but also those who distinguish pleasure and health a sinder, as if pleasure forsooth were repugnant, or an enimie unto it, and not rather a friend and companion thereof: for seldome and even against our wils (quoth he) doe we make any use of paine, as being an instrument too boisterous and violent; whereas no man, would he never so faine, can chase pleasures away, and banish them, but they will present themselves alwaies in our feeding, in sleeping, in washing, bathing, sweating, and annointing our bodies; they entertaine, foster, and cherish him that is over-travailed and wearie, putting away quite by a certaine familiar propertie, agreeable unto nature, whatsoever is strange and offensive: for what manner of paine, what want, what poison is there how strong soever it be, that riddeth or dispatcheth a maladie so soone or so presently, as the bath in due time; or wine given to those that have need, and when their heart doth faint: Our meat going downe into the stomacke merrily, and with pleasure, dissolveth incontinently all wambles, reducing and restoring nature againe into her owne estate; as if faire weather and a calme season were come againe; whereas on the contrarie side, the succors and remedies which are procured by dolorous and painfull means, by little and little, hardly & with much ado are brought about and effected, even with wrong and injurie offered unto nature: let not Philemus therefore set himselfe in opposition against us, in case we doe not hoise up and spread all our sailes, to flie away from pleasures: but endeavour and studie wee rather to draw delight and health together, for to make a marriage betweene them, for which we have more reason than some philosophers, to match pleasure with honesty. For first and formost (Philinus) mee thinks in the very entrance of your discourse, that you are greatly deceived; setting downe this supposal for a ground: That brute beasts feed more simply than men, and in that regard live more healthfully; for neither the one nor the other is true: and as for the former, disprooved plainly it is by the testimonie of the goates, of whom the poet Empolus writeth, who highly commend and praise their pasture, as being mingled, and consisting of the varietie of all plants and herbes, who sing and say in this manner:

*We feed in plenty everie where Upon the plants which earth doth beare;
The staty Firre we bark and bruse
The Holme likewise with mightie bowghes;
The tender crops of Arbutree
Which beares a fruite like Strawberry;
Do yeeld us fooode, and many mo
Which both on hilles and dales do grow;
As namly sweet tree Trifolie
On which we love to eate dailie;
The Juniper with fragrant smell,
The Yewgbye greene and leav'd as well;
Wilde Olives and fruitfull Lentisk,
Which yeelds the holtsome gumme Mastick,
Ash, Figge-tree, Oakes that high doe grow,
Ivie, Lings which creepes as low;
Whins, Tamarix, Gorse and Broome, Chaste-tree, Brambles, all and some,
Mollein, Longwoort, Asphodell,
Ladan for shrub that sweet doth smell:
Beech trees, with triangled Mast,
Thyme and Sav'ry, be our repast.*

For even these trees, shrubbes, and herbes, heere reckoned up, have no doubt infinit differences in taste, juice, & vertue; and yet there be a number more besides these left out unnamed: And as for the second point, Homer refuseth it by an evident experience, shewing that murrins and pestilent contagions, seized first upon brute beasts: besides, their short life witnesseth sufficiently how diseased they be, and subject to many accidents and infirmities; for there is not one of them to speake of, that liveth long, unlesse haply some man will give instance of the raven and the crow, which we know and see to eat much, and to feed of all sorts of victuals. Moreover, mee thinks that reasoning from the diet of sicke persons, you have not gone by a right rule to discern the meats which be of easie or heave digestion; for labour and exercise, yea and to cut and chew the meat well, serve much for concoction; but for all that they agree not to those who are in a fever: furthermore, I suppose, that you feare without just occasion, the repugnance and contrarietie of divers and sundry meats: for set the case that either nature doth out of different and dislike meats, chuse and take that which is agreeable unto it; the divers nourishment transmitting many and sundry qualities, into the masse and bulke of the body, distributeth unto every part that which is meet and fit for it: so as that commeth to passe which Empedocles delivered in these verses:

*Sweet will to sweet, and therewith loves to joine;
The bitter runnes to that which bitter is;
Looke what is sharpe with sharpe doth well combine,
With salish parts salte forseth not amisse.*

This goeth one way, and that another, ech one to that which is suitable thereto, after that the mixture by the heat which is seated in the spirits is dilated and spread abroad, the like alwaies follow their owne kinde: for a body mingled and compounded of so many things assembled together as ours is, by all reason doth contract, enterteine and accomplish the temperature thereof by varietie of matter, rather than by a simple uniformitie thereof; or if it were not so, but that the

the concoction so called, be it which hath force to alter and change our viands; yet the same will both sooner and also better be performed in sundry and divers meats, than in that which is one and simple: for never will the like receive any passion or alteration by the like; but contrarietie and repugnance is that, which sooner turneth and changeth the qualities being ensembled by the mixture of their contrarie: and if you resolve once (Philinus) to condemne all that which is mixed and compounded; do not reprove and revile this Philo heere, for interteining onely his friends at the table with so costely fare and varietie of deintie dishes: but also, yea and so much the rather, whensoever he compoundeth and mixeth those roiall confections, and those cordiall electuaries that be counter-poisons, which Erasistratus was wont to cal: The very hands of the gods; condemne them (I say) of vanitie, curiositie, and absurditie, who confound and mixe together minerals, herbes, theriacall trochits, made of the parts of venomous serpents, for the composition of their treacles; yea and in one word, whatsoever land or sea affordeth: for by your advice, good it were to abandon all these mixtures, and reduce all physick to plaine pisans, thinne barley water, cucumber seeds, all simple, or at the most to oile and water mingled together: yea, but this pluralitie and diversitie of viands, doth by your saying, ravish, transport, and enchant our appetite as it were, besides its felie, inso much as it hath no more mastery of it selfe: I answer my good friend: That the same draweth after it puritie and neatnesse; it maketh a good stomack; it causeth a sweet breath; and in one word, procureth cheerefulness in us, and a disposition both to eat more, and to drinke better: for otherwise

why take we not course branne in stead of the fine flower of meale to thicken our pots? or why dresse we not and prepare *cives and golden thistles, as well as wee doe the tender crops and heads of garden sperage? why reject we not this odoriferous, fragrant, and delicate wine of ours, to drinke some savage and hedge drinke; as cyder made of apples, even out of the tubbe which refounds with the confort and musicke of gnats and flies round about? for you will say (I am sure) that an healthfull diet is not the flying and avoiding of pleasure altogether; but rather a moderation and temperature of pleasures, making use of that appetite which is obedient to profit: for like as pilots and matters of ships have many devices and meanes to escape a blustering and violent winde when it is aloft, but when the same is alliaed and downe, there is no man able to raise and set it up againe; even so to withstand the appetite, and to repress the same

when it doth exceed, is not so hard and difficult a matter; but to stirre up, to provoke, & corroborate the same when it is lost, & decayed before due time; or to give an edge unto it, being dull, and faint, is a matter indeed, and a piece of worke (my friend, I may say unto you) not so easily done: whereby it appears, that the nouriture of divers viands, is better than the simple food, and that which by reason is alwaies of one sort, doth soone satise and give one enough, by how much more easie it is to stay nature, when the is too speedie and halitie, than to set her forward, being weary and drawing behinde: and whereas some haply there bee, who say, that repletion and fulnesse is more to be feared and avoided than inanition and emptinesse, that is not true; but rather the contrary: in deed, if repletion and surfet grow to corruption or to some maladie, it is hurtfull; but emptinesse (if it bring and breed none other harme els) is of it selfe adverse and contrary to nature. Let these reasons therefore be opposed, as it were, dissonant and founding of a contrary string, against those which you (Philinus) have physylophically discoursed: as for others of you heere, that for saving money, and to spare cost, stick to salt and *cumin; you are ignorant for want of experience, that varietie is more pleasant, and the more delectable that a thing is, the more agreeable it is to the appetite, (provided alwaies that some reade that some reade you shunne excesse and gourmandise) for surely it cleaveth quickly to the body which is desirous of it, going as one would say before, and ready to meet it halfe-way for to receive it, having the cie-sight to prepare the way: whereas contrariwise, that which is lothsome or not pleasing to the appetite, stoteth and wandereth up and downe in the bodie, and findeth no entertainment, in such sort, as either nature rejecteth it quite, or if she receive it, the same goes against her heart, & the doth it for pure need, and want of other sustenance: now when I speake of diversitie & varietie of viands, note thus much and remember, that I meane not these curious works of pastry, these exquisit sawces, tarts, and cakes, which go under the name of Aburiae, Canduli, & Caryae; which are but superfluous toies and vanities; for otherwise Plato himselfe alloweth varietie of meats at the table, to these generous and noble gentlemen his citizens, whom he describeth in his common-wealth, when he setteth before them, bulbs, scallions, olives, salad herbs, cheefe, and al manner of deinties that worth would afford; and over & above all these, he would not defraud nor cut off the feast of their junclets & banquetting dishes at the end of al.

THE SECOND QUESTION.

What is the reason of this opinion so generally received, that Mufhromes be engendred of thunder? and that those who lie afleepe are not thought to be smitten with lightning?

AT a certaine supper, where we were in the city Elia, Agemachus set before us Mufhromes of an exceeding bignesse; whereat when the companie seemed to wonder, one who was there present, smiled and said: Certes, these may be seeme well the great thunders that we have lately had within this few daies; by which words he seemed pleasantly to scoffe at this vulgar opinion: That Mufhromes should breed of thunder. Now some were there, who said: That thunder caused the earth to chinke and open, using the meanes of the aire, as it were a wedge to cleave it, and withall, that they who seeke for Mufhromes, by those crevices guesse where they are to be found; whereupon arose this common opinion: That they were engendred of thunder, and not shewed thereby; as if a man should imagine that a shewe of raine breedeth snails, and not rather cause them to creepe forth and be scene abroad. But Agemachus seemed then in good earnest to confirme the said received opinion, by experience, praying the company, not to conclude by & by that a thing was incredible, because it was strange and wonderful: For (quoth he) there be many other effects of thunder, lightning, and other meteores or celestial impressions right admirable; whereof it were very hard, if not altogether impossible, to comprehend the causes and the reasons. For this ridiculous round root called the Bulb, which maketh us so good sport, and is grown into a by-word, little though it be, escapeth not by that meanes from thunder, but because it hath a propertie cleane contrary unto it; like as the figge tree also, and the skin of the seale or sea-calf, and of the beast Hyena, with whose skinned, mariners and failers are wont to clothe the ends of their crosse-saile-yards, whereupon they hang their sailes: gardeners also and good husbandmen, call those shewes that fall with thunder evadras, that is to say, good to water their grounds, and so they think them to be. In summe, it were great simplicity and meere folly to wonder hereat, considering that we doe see before our eyes, things more admirable than this, and indeed of all other, most incredible; namely, out of moist clouds, fire to flash, and from the same (soft as they be) so great cracks and horrible claps of thunder: Well, I am (quoth he) in these matters somewhat talkative and full of words, because I would sollicit and move you to be more willing to search into the cause, for that I meant not to deale hardly otherwise with you, and seeme to presse you every one to lay downe your part toward the payment for these my great Mufhromes. Why (quoth I) Agemachus himselfe seemeth in some sort to have pointed with his very finger to the reason hereof; for I assure you, at this present I can not thinke of any one, more probable than this; namely, that together with thunder, there falleth downe many times a certaine genitall water, apt to ingender; and the cause thereof, is heat mingled among: for, that pure, light, & piercing substance of the fire, being now converted into lightning, is gone and passed away; but the more weightie, grosse and flatulent part remaining behinde, enwrapped within the cloud, altereth and taketh quite the coldnesse away, and drinketh up the moisture, making it more fletuous and windie, in such sort, as by this meanes especially, these raines gently and mildly enter & pierce into plants, trees and herbs, upon which they fall, causing them within a while to thrive in bignesse, and infusing within them a particular temperature and a peculiar difference of juice. As we may observe otherwise, that the dew maketh the grasse to be better seasoned (as it were) and fitter to content the appetite of sheepe and other cattell: yea, and those clouds upon which that reflexion is made, which we call the rain-bow, fill those trees and wood upon which they fall, with a passing sweet and pleasant odor; whereof, the priests of our countrey be not ignorant, but acknowledge as much, calling the same triffespa, as if the rain-bow did rest or settle upon them. Much more probable it is, that when these waters and raines together with their ventosities & heats, occasioned by thunders & lightnings, come to pierce deepe into the earth, it turneth and rolleth round, and by that meanes are ingendred therein such like nodosities and knobs, soft and apt to crumble, which we call Mufhromes; like as in our bodies there breed and arise certaine flatuous tumors, named Kernels or Glandules, formed by occasion of I wot not what bloudy humors and heats withal: for a Mufhrome seemeth not to be a plant, neither without rain & moisture doth it breed, having no root at all, nor any sprout springing from it; it is wholly entire of it selfe round about, and holding upon nothing, as having the consistence onely of the earth which hath bene a lile altered & changed.

And

And if you thinke this reason to be but slender, I say unto you more, that the most part of those accidents which follow upon thunder and lightning, are of the like sort; and therefore it is especially, that in these effects there is thought to be a certaine divinitie. Then Dorotheus the orator who was in the companie: I trow it is (quoth he) that you say, for not onely the vulgar sort of simple and ignorant people are of that opinion, but some also of the philosophers; and for mine owne part I know as much by experience, that the lightning which of late fell upon our house, wrought many strange and wonderfull things: for it emptied our sellers of wine, and never did hurt unto the earthen vessell wherein it was; and whereas there lay a man a sleepe, it flew over him, yea, and flashed upon him, without any harme at all to his person, or singeing so much as his clothes; but having a certaine beke or pouch wherein were certaine pieces of brasse money, it melted and defaced them all so confusedly, that a man could not know by the forme or impression, one from another: the man went thereupon to a certaine Pythagorian philosopher, who as he happened was sojournd there, and demaunded of him what the reason might be thereof, and what it did preface? But the philosopher, when hee had cleered and assailed his minde of scrupulous feare and religion, willed him to ponder and consider of the matter apart by himselfe, and to pray unto the gods. I heare say also, that not long since there was a souldier at Rome, who keeping the Centinell, upon one of the temples of the citie, chanced to have a flash of lightning to fall very neere unto him; which did him no hurt in the world in his body, but onely burnt the latches of his shoes: and whereas there were certaine fine boxes and crucets of silver within wooden cases, the silver within was found all melted into a masse in the bottom, and the wood had no injurie at all, but continued still entire and sound. But these things a man may chuse whether he will believe or no. Howbeit, this passeth all other miracles, which we all (I suppose) doe know very well, namely, that the dead bodies of those who have beene killed by lightning, continue above ground and putrifie not: for many there be who will neither burne nor enterre such corpes, but cast a trench or banke about, and so let them lie as within a rampart; so as such dead bodies are to be scene alwaies above ground uncorrupt; convincing Clymene in Euripides of untruth, who speaking of Phaethon said thus:

Belov'd mine, but see where dead he lies,

In vale below, and there with purifies.

And heereupon it is, (as I take it,) that brimstone taketh the name in Greeke thion, for the resemblance of that smell which those things yeeld that have beene smitten with lightning, which no doubt have a ferie and piercing sent: and this may be the reason likewise in my conceit, that dogges and fowles of the aire forbore to touch any dead bodies, which in this sort are stricken from heaven. Thus farre forth have I laid the first stone for a ground-woke of this cause, as also of the Bay-tree: Now let us intreat him heere to finish and make out the rest, for that he is well acquainted with Mufhromes, lest haply that befall unto us which sometimes to the painter Andros did; for whē he painted the gulfe Seylla, he portraied more naturally & to the life, the fishes all about, than any thing else besides; whereby men judged that hee shewed more affection therein, than cunning of his art, for that naturally he loved to feed upon good fishes; and even so some one might say; that we have discoursed so much of Mufhromes, the breeding and generation whereof is so doubtfull, as you see, for the pleasure and delight that we take in eating of them. Considering now that in these points our discourse seemed to carrie some probability, and that everie man was perswaded well enough that the cause and reason thereof was cleere; and withall my selfe began to speake and advise, that it was now time as the manner was in comedies, to set up those engines devised for to counterfet thunder; so to inferre a disputation at the table of lightnings; to which motion all the company consented, but passing over all other points, very desirous and earnest they were to heare a discourse as touching this one: What the reason might be that men a sleepe be never smitten or blasted with lightning. Now albeit I saw well well enough, that I should gaine no great praise, in touching so a cause, whereof the reason was common, yet I beganne to let it and said: That the fire of lightning was fine and subtil, as that which tooke the original and beginning from a most pure, liquid, and sacred substance; which if there had bene in it any moisture or terrestrial grosseness mingled among, the celeritie of motion is such, that it would have purged and cast it forth: Nothing is smitten with lightning (quoth Democritus) that cannot resist the fire from heaven; and therefore solide bodies, as iron, brasse, silver, and gold, be corrupted and melted therewith, by reason that they hold out, and withstand it: contrariwise, such as bee rare, full of holes, spungious, soft, and lux, lightning quickly pierceth through, and doth them no harme;

as for example, clothes or garments, and drie wood; for such as is Greene will burne, because the moisture within maketh resistance, and so catcheth fire withall. If then it be true, that those who lie a sleepe be never stricken dead with thunder and lightning, surely wee must search heere for the cause, and never goe farther; for the bodies of men awake, are stronger, more firme and compact, yea, and able to make more resistance; as having all their parts full of spirits, by which ruling, turning, and welding the naturall senses and holding them together as it were with an engine, the living creature becometh strong, fast, knit, and uniforme: whereas in sleepe it is slacke, loose, rare, unequal, soft, and as it were all resolved, by reason that the pores be open, for that the spirit hath forsaken and abandoned them; which is the cause likewise that voices, odors, and savours, passe through them unheard and unsmelled: for why? that which should resist, in resistance suffer and take impression, meeteth not with those objects, that are presented unto it, and least of all, when they pierce with such swiftnesse and subtiltie, as the fire of lightning doth; for that which of it selfe is lesse firme & strong for to resist offensive things, nature doth defend, fortifie, and furnish with remedies against that which offendeth, by putting before them hard and solide munitions; but looke what things bee of incomparable force, and invincible, they lesse offend and hurt that which yeeldeth, than that which maketh head and resistance: adde moreover hereunto, that they who lie a sleepe are lesse affraid, affrighted, or astonied, by occasion whereof of nothing else, many have died; onely (I say) for feare of death, without any harme at all done unto them: And this is the very cause that shepheards teach their sheepe to runne and gather round together, into a troupe when it thundereth, for that they which are disperfed and scattered a sunder, for very feare take harme, and cast their yong ones in time of thunder: yea and an infinit number have bene knowne to lie dead on the ground, by reason of thunder, without any mark or stroke, wound, scorch, or burne seene upon them, whose life and soule for very feare hath flowne out of their bodies, like a birde out of a cage: for according as Euripides saith:

*The very blast of some great thunder-clap,
Hath many a one stricken stone-dead with a flap.*

And forasmuch as otherwise the sense of hearing, is of all others most subject to suffer violent passions, and the fearefull frights occasioned by sounds and noises, worke greatest troubles in the minde: against it, the privation of sense is a sure bulwarke and rampart to a man that lieth a sleepe; whereas they who are awake, be many times killed with feare of the thing before it cometh: for a fright (to say a trueth) knitting, closing, and compressing the body fast, giveth more strength a great deale to the stroke when it comes, for that it findeth more resistance.

THE THIRD QUESTION.

Why at a wedding or bride-supper, men use to invite more guests, than at other times?

AT the wedding of my sonne Autobulus (ô Sofistus Senecio) one who came first Cheronea, was with us to solemnize the feast; & a great number there were besides of other honorable personages; which gave unto him occasion for to demand this question: What the cause might be, that ordinarily we invite more guests to such a marriage supper, than to any other feast? considering that even those law-givers who impugned most, the superfluitie and riot of feasts, have precisely & expressly set downe the number of those persons, whom they would have to be bidden-guests to a wedding: For of the ancient philosophers (quoth he) the man that treated of this argument and the cause thereof, to wit, Hecataeus of Abdera, hath written nothing in my judgement worth ought, nor to the purpose; for thus he saith: That they who marry wives, bid many persons to their wedding, to the end that many may take knowledge and beare witness, that being free borne and of free condition, they take wives likewise of like free birth and condition. For the comick poets, cleane contrary, mocke and laugh at those, who make proud and sumptuous feasts at their marriage, setting out the same with great pompe and magnificence, as if that were no sure bond nor linke to be trusted unto, wherewith they would seeme to knit wedlocke; like as Menander said to one, who willed the bridegrome to make a strong rampart all about, of pots, pannes and platters;

*When that is done on every side,
What is all this to your new bride?*

But lest we might not seeme to finde fault with others at our pleasure, for that we have nothing of our owne to say, which is the easiest matter in the world, I shewed first and formost, that there was no occasion of feasting, so publike nor so much divulged and celebrated, as marriage: for say that we sacrifice unto the gods, or feast a friend for his farewell when he is to goe a long voyage, or entertaine a traveller and stranger that passeth by our house, or cometh of purpose to visit us, we may do all without the privie of kinsfolke & friends: but a nuptiall feast (where the wedding-song and caroll of Hymenaeus is chanted aloud; where the torches are to be seene light-burning; where the hautboies and pipes play merrily and rebound; where (as Homer saith) the very women and maidens stand wondering at their doors, to see and heare) is notoriously knowne and proclaimed to the whole world; in regard whereof, because there is none ignorant of these espousals and festivall solemnities, men being ashamed to leave out any, invite generally all their kinsfolke, familiar friends and acquaintance, as whom in some sort it doth concerne, and who have an interest in the thing. When we all had approved this, Theon taking in hand the question: Surely all this (quoth he) may goe for current, for it carrieth great probability therewith; but you may adde moreover (if you please) thus much: That these marriage feasts are not onely for friends, but also for kinsfolke and allies; for that a whole kindred, race and generation, come to have another new alliance to be incorporated into them: and that which more is, when two houses in this wise be joined together; both he who receiveth the woman, thinketh that hee ought to entertaine and feast the kindred and friends of him that giveth her; and he who giveth her, likewise taketh himselfe bound to doe as much reciprocally, by the kinsfolke and friends of the receiver; whereby the feast and number of them who are bidden, groweth double. Now forasmuch as many marriage complements, and (to say a trueth) the most part in manner all, are performed at weddings by women, surely where the goodwives be, great reason there is, that of necessity their husbands also should be welcome for their sakes, and so thereby the companie still doth increafe.

was

THE FOURTH QUESTION.

Whether the viands which the sea affordeth, be more delicate than those of the land?

Galepsus a town in Eubaea, where there be baths naturally of hot waters, is a proper seat and place fitted by nature, for sundry honest pleasures, beautified with many faire houses and lodgings, in such sort, as it is reputed the publike hostellie of all Greece: and albeit there be great game there, of hunting and hawking, and wonderful plenty afield of fowle as other venison, yet is the market no lesse served from the sea, nor their tables lesse furnished with daintie fish; for that indeed along the coast, the sea is very deepe, and the water faire, nourishing an infinit number of excellent fishes. This towne flourisheth more in the mids of Spring, than at any other season of the yeere; for much concourse there is thither at that time, who converse familiarly one with another, feasting mutually, and taking the benefit of that great affluence of victuals, and abundance of all good things; where having nothing els to doe of great importance, they passe the most part of the time in devising and discoursing together of good letters and matters of learning: but whensoever Callistratus the professour of rhetoricke is at home, hardly may a man sup any where els but at his house; for a man so full of courtesie he is and hospitality, that there is no saying of him nay. Now for that willingly he used to bring those together who were learned and professed scholars, his company was so much more pleasant and delectable; for many times he would seeme among other ancient persons of olde time, to imitate Cicero, making his whole and onely pleasure, to feast many in his house, and those from all parts: but most of all, and in manner continually, he followed the example and steps of Celeus, of whom it is written, that he was the first who daily assembled to his house, a number of honourable persons, and of good marke, which assembly he called Prytanium. The speeches ordinarily at these meetings in Callistratus his house, was soring well and suitable to such companie: but one day above the rest, when the table stood furnished with all manner of dishes that a mans heart could wish for, it ministred matter and occasion to enquire as touching viands, whether were better, those of the land or those of the sea? And when all others in manner with one accord and voice, commended them which the land did yeeld, as being of so divers and sundry sorts, yea and those innumerable; Polyrates calling Symmachus by name: You sir, (quoth hee) who are (as one would say) a water-animall, bred and fed within so many seas, environing round about your sacred citie Naxos, will not you mainteine and defend your tutelard god Neptune? Yes that I will (quoth Symmachus) I heartily pray and beleeve you to joine with me in this cause, whom I take for mine adioint and affisant; considering that you enjoy the benefit of the sweetest and most pleasant coast of all the sea. Beginne we then (quoth Polyrates) our discourse with our usuall custome and manner of speech: For like as among so many poets as there be, wee give but one by way of excellencie, simply the name of poet; to wit Homer, for that of all others he is the principall; so there being in the world many daintie cates, and exquisit viands, yet use of speech hath caried it so, that fish alone, or especially is named fish, that is to say, meat, for that indeed it is the chiefe and very best: heereupon it comes, that we call those gluttons that love belly cheere so well, fish-eaters, and fish-lovers, not for that they love beefe so well as Hercules did: who as the poet saith:

*When that he had fedde well of flesh,

Neither doe wee name such an one phagivorus, that is to say, a lover of figges, as Plato was, or phiborlus, that is to say, one that loveth grapes as well, like as Arceflaus did; but such as haunt ordinarily the fish stalls, and have a quicke care, to heare the market bell, or listen to the clock, that giveth warning when the fish-market is open: And Demosthenes when hee objected unto Philocrates: That with the money that hee received for betraying his country, hee bought whoores, & fishes; reproched the man no doubt for his lecherie and gluttony: and it is preily said of Ctesiphon, when as one of these gluttons and bellie-gods, in the court or counsell house cried out: That he should cracke and burst in the middes: Doe not so (quoth hee) my good friend in any case, make us not a bait heere, for to be devoured of fishes: and he that made these little verses:

*Thou live'st of capers as thy meat,
When as of *Sturgeon thou dost eat.*

* asthar, if it were not a sturgeon, it was some delicate fish.

What was his meaning thinke you? or what meaneth this common word of the people, when they speake one to another, for to be merry and make good cheere: Come, shall wee to the strand or shore to daie? Is it not as much as if they meant; that to suppe by the water side had no fellow for pleasure and delight, as in truth it hath not; for surely their purpose is not to goe unto the shore for the love that they have to see the billowes of the sea, or the gravell stones and sands cast up; why then? because they would eat some good pease pottage there, or make their meales with capers? no forsooth; for who goes thither for that purpose? but it is because they that dwell along the banke by the water-side, are provided alwaies of toison and store of good fish, & the same fresh & sweet. Moreover, sea-fish carrieth an higher price beyond all reason, than other meat that commeth to the market: inso much as Cato declaiming and inveighing openly before the people against the superfluitie and excess in Rome citie, brake out into this speech, not hyperbolically and over-reaching the truth, but as it was indeed: That a fish at Rome was deerer sold than a fatte ox: for they sell a little barrell of fish at such an high price, as an hundred oxen would not cost so much, at a solemne sacrifice, where they goe before bores, goates, and other beasts, yea and the strewing of sacred meale. Certes, the best judge of the vertue and strength of medicinable drougues and spices, is the most expert physician; likewise no man is able so well to judge of song and harmonical measures, as the best and most experienced musician; and consequently we may inferre, that the meekest judge as touching the goodnesse and deintinesse of meats, is he who loveth them best: for we must not take to arbitrate and determine such a controversie and question as this, Pythagoras or Xenocrates; but rather Antagoras the poet, Philostratus the sonne of Eryx, and Androcydes the painter; who being to make a picture for to represent the gulfie Seylla, drew even the fishes about it most emphatically with a kinde of affectionate minde unto them; and in one word, more lively and naturally than all the rest, because he loved fish so well, and fedde upon them with such contentment. Antagoras as the poet was upon a time in the campe of king Antigonus, who finding him verie busie all untied & unbuttoned, in seeking of congers in a pan, came close unto him, & rounding him in the eare: Sirha, (quoth hee) thinkest thou that Homer thy master, when hee described the noble acts of Agamemnon, was busie about boiling of congers: unto whom Antagoras turned againe, and replying in this wise presently: And thinke you sir (quoth he) that when Agamemnon exploited those brave feats of armes, he went up and downe in his campe spying, peeping, and prying into every corner so busily as you doe, for to see if he could find one seeking a conger? Thus much Polyrates: and to conclude and knit up his speech: For mine owne part (quoth he) this I thought good to say in the behalfe of fishes, induced thereto as well by the proofe of testimonies as custome and usuall speech.

But

But I (quoth Symmachus) will handle this matter soberly, and in good earnest, going more subtilly and liker a logician to worke, in this manner: For if that be counted dainy and delicate which seasoneth meat, and giveth it the most pleasant taste; we must needs confesse, that simply to be the best, which maintaineth the appetite, and giveth an edge to the stomacke that continueth longest: like as therefore those philosophers surnamed Elpistiques affirme: That there was nothing that maintained life, and held bodie and soule longer together than Hope; for that without hope which doth mitigate and allay all travells, it is impossible to live; even so for we must needs graunt and yeeld, that to keepe and preserve appetite best, without which all other viands be lothsome and odious: but nothing shall you finde of that propertie and effect, comming out of the earth; but such a thing the sea affordeth, and that is salt, without which nothing to speake of is favorie, nothing toothsome nor to be eaten: for even our very bread is not pleasing to our taste, if there be no salt within it: which is the reason that Neptune and Ceres be alwaies worshipped together in one temple: In summe, salt is as it were the sauce of sauces, and that which seasoneth all the dainties whatsoever. And heereupon it was that those worthies and demi-god princes, who encamped before Troy, and made profession of sparie and simple diet, as religious votaries, and who cut off all curious superfluitie and excess, over and above necessarie food, inso much as they did not eat once of fish; notwithstanding they had a standing legier, hard upon the straights of Hellepont, could not endure to befever at the table without salt; witnessing thereby, that it is the onely viand which cannot be rejected or left out: for like as colours of necessitie require light; even so all those labours and juices within meats, have need of salt, to stirre up the sense of taste, and to provoke appetite, otherwise they are but flat, unpleasent to the tongue, and lothsome: for dead carions (as Hercules saith) would be cast forth, rather than dung and ordure: and what is the flesh that wee eat, but a dead thing, and part of a dead carcase: but when the strength of salt is put thereto, it is in stead of life; to give a grace and commendable taste unto it: and this is the reason, that before other food, we take those things that be sharpe and saltish, and in one word, whatsoever do stand most of salt; for such be affectives of the appetite, which being drawn on, and enticed as with a bait, by the meanes of these vancurriers and preparatives, it commeth more fresh, and with a better edge, ready to set upon other meats; whereas, if we should begin with them first, our stomacke would quickly be done and gone: I will yet say more than so; namely, that all the kinds of salt, serve not onely to give a good relish to our meats, but also draw on our drinks, and cause us to make a quarrell to the cup. As for that opinion which Homer talketh of, and praith for a speciall daintie to commend drinke, it was more meet indeed for mariners & rowers at the oare, than kings and princes: but in truth, those meats that be powdered or corned a little with salt; for that they be favoury in the mouth, give all wines a pleasant verdure to please the taste, and to goe downe the throat merrily; the same make any water potable and delightfome, having besides, no such ranke and strong sent, as the onion leaves behind it. That which more is, such meats doe rarefie other viands, and prepare them for concoction and digestion, in such sort, as salt being eaten, imparteth unto the bodie the delight of a deintie viand, and the might of an hollesome medicine.

To come now unto other meats, wherewith we are furnished from the sea: besides, that they are passing sweet, they be also of all others most harmlesse; for albeit they be of a fleshly substance, yet they lie not heave upon the stomacke, they be easily concocted, and soone passed downward: witness hereof, our Zeno here, yea and beleve me, Cyrus, who so soone as men be sicke or ill at ease, before all other directions, betake them to fish diet. Furthermore, it soundeth to good reason, that the sea breedeth and feedeth for us, living creatures, more hollesome than any others, by how much they be more exercised, considering that the very aire which dath breathe and send forth, for the purity and simplicitie thereof is most agreeable unto us. Well said of you (quoth Lamprias) and fully to the point; howbeit, somewhat will I adde more out of my phylosophicall learning: My grandfather (I remember) was wont ordinarily to say of the Jewes by way of mockerie, that they abstained from the eating of that flesh, which of all others, deserved most justly to be eaten; even so may we say, that man hath not so great right and reason to feed upon any viands whatsoever, as those that come out of the sea: for, say that there were no other communion and fellowship betweene us and these land-creatures; yet at leastwise, thus much there is, that many of them eat of the same food with us, draw in the same aire, wash and drinke as we doe, yea, and otherwhiles we are abashed, and take pity of them, when we kill them for our food, making a lamentable crie as they do: and for that we have made some of them familiar unto us, inasmuch as they can do many things answerable to the education which they had; whereas the fishes in the sea and rivers, are altogether strangers unto us, as being bred, nourished and living in another world; no voice of theirs, no aspect of countenance, nor service at all which either they have done or can doe for us, can exempt them or crave mercy at our hands, for to have their lives saved. For what use should we make of those creatures which we can not keepe alive with us? or what charitable affection can we beare toward them? the place where we live, is to them no lesse than hell; for no sooner come they into it, but dead they are immediatly.

THE FIFTH QUESTION.

Whether it is upon any reverent and religious opinion of swine, that the Jewes abstaine from their flesh, or because they detest and abhorre them?

After these speeches thus passed, some there were, who prepared and addressed themselves to dispute in opposition against that which had beene said: but Callistratus breaking off and putting by all further disputation of this argument: What thinke you (quoth he) of that by-speech, discharged against the Jewes by Lamprias; namely, that they forbore to eat of that flesh which deserveth most justly of all others to be eaten? For my part (quoth Polyrates) I thinke it passing well spoken; but this moreover and besides, troubleth my head, and maketh me doubt, whether this nation, upon any honour or reverent regard of swine, or for meere abomination and hatred of the beast, doth abstaine from their flesh? as for that which themselves alledge, it resembleth fables and devised tales; unless haply they have some other serious and secret reasons, which they are loth to deliver before the face of the world. To say what I thinke (quoth Callistratus) I am verily perswaded, that the swine is in some honour among them: for admit that it be a foule and illfavoured beast, what then? that it be filthie besides, what of that? I can not see that it is more ugly in shape to see to, or more untoward of nature to be endured, than the bettill, the crocodile, or the cat; which notwithstanding, the Aegyptian priests do honour and reverence as most holy creatures, some in one place and some in others: and as for the hogge, it is said, that they regard and honour it by way of thanksgiving, as gratefull persons, acknowledging a benefit received from that beast, in that it sheweth them the manner how to til and eare the ground, breaking up the earth, digging and rooting (as he doth) into it with his snout: and withall, what say you to this, that he hath shewed the making of a plough-share, which some thinke, thereupon tooke the name Evius, as derived of the word Ev, that is to say, a swine. And verily, the Aegyptians at this day, such as inhabit the low-countrie and the flats along the river Nilus, have no need of other plough than the swines snout; for when the river is returned againe within his banks, after he hath watered the plaines & champian field sufficiently, the peasants of the countrie doe no more but follow presently with their seed, and put in all their hogges after it, who partly trampling with their feet, and in part turning up the soft earth with their noses, cover the seeds which the husbandmen have cast upon the ground. No marvell therefore, if there be some nations, who in this respect forbore to eat swines flesh, considering there be other beasts, who for as small matters as these, yea, and some that be meere ridiculous and to be laughed at, have had right great honours done unto them, by barbarous nations: for it is said, that the Aegyptians make a god of the silly blinde mouse Mygate: and why so? because darkenesse was before light, and is of greater antiquitie: also they have an opinion, that this creature is ingendered of mice in the fifth generation, or at the fifth time that they breed, and that in the verie change of the moone; also, that the liver of it doth decrease, as the moone is in the wane, and doth decay with her light.

Moreover, they consecrate the lion unto the sunne, for that it is the onely foure-footed beast having crooked claws, which bringeth forth whelps that can see: also, for that the lion is verie wakefull, and sleepeeth passing little, and whiles he sleepeeth, his eyes do shine againe. Moreover, they set lions heads gaping for the spouts of their fountaines, because (forsooth) the river Nilus bringeth new waters into their fields, and come-grounds, when the sunne passeth thorow the signe Leo in the Zodiacke: and as for the blacke stork Ibis, which they likewise honor, they say, that when it is first hatched, she weigheth two drammes, that is to say; just as much as the heart of a young infant newly borne doth weise; also that of the two legs and the bill stretched forth one from the other, and resting upon the ground, is made the true proportion of a triangle angle with three equall sides: And why should the Aegyptians be blamed and condemned for so great folly and absurditie, seeing that by report, the very Pythagoreans themselves adorned and worshipped a white cocke; and among other sea fishes they abstained from the bable and the nettle fish, considering also that the Magicians, who were of the sect of Zoroastres, honored above all living creatures upon earth the urchin or hedgehogge, but hated water-mice; saying: That he should doe best service, and most acceptable to the gods, yea and be right blessed and happie himselfe, who could kill the greatest number of them.

This giveth me occasion to thinke, that if the Jewes had held swine hatefull, and abominable creatures, they would have killed them, like as the Magicians did the said mice; whereas contrariwise they are as well forbidden to kill them, as to eat them: and peradventure there is good reason, that as they honour the asse, for that sometime in a great drought he shewed them a place wherein was a fountaine of water; even so they reverence the swine, for teaching them how to fowe and till the ground. And verily some man haply might say, that this people abstaineth likewise from eating the hare, hating and abhorring the same, as an impure and uncleane beast: It is not without some cause (quoth Lamprias, taking the word out of his mouth) that they forbore eating of the hare, for the resemblance that it hath to the asse, whom they mystically doe worship; for the colour of them both is all one; the eares be long and bigge withall, their eyes great and shining; in which respects there is a marvellous similitude betweene them, in such sort, that of a great and small beast, there is not to be found such a resemblance againe in any other; unless peradventure among other similitudes, they imitate heerein the Aegyptians, who esteeme the swiftnesse of this beast divine, yea, and the exquisite perfection of some naturall senses, admirable: for the eyes of hares be so vigorous and indefatigable, that they will sleepe open eyed, and their hearing so quick, that the Aegyptians having them in such admiration therefore, when they would signifie in their Hieroglyphick characters, perfect hearing, doe paint and poutrey hares: as for swines flesh, the Jewes have in great abomination, for that barbarous nations do of all other diseases abhorre faint Malaria evill, or the white leprosie most, as well for that they suppose, that these maladies may be engendred, by feeding upon their flesh, as also because, looke what persons they do assaile, them they doe eat & consume in the end; and this we doe see ordinarily, that a swine under his belly is full of a kind of leprosie, and covered all over with a white scurfe, called Psora; which infection seemeth to proceed from some evill habit, and inward corruption within the body, bewraying it selfe in the outside of the skinne: to say nothing of the filthinesse of this beast, both in feeding and otherwise, which must needs impart some evill qualitie to the flesh; for there is not another beast againe, that taketh such pleasure in dirt and ordure, loving to wallow and welter in the most mirie and stinking places that be, as it doth; unless they be such as breed and bee nourished in those places: furthermore, it is said, that the sight of their eyes is so bent and fixed downward, that they can see nothing on high, no, nor once so much as looke up to the skie, unless they be cast upon their backs with their feet upward; so that the balles of their eyes by this means be turned quite contrary to the course of nature: and verily this beast howsoever otherwise ordinarily it be given to cry and grunt exceeding much, yet if the feet be turned upward (as is before said) it will be silent and still; so much astonished and amazed it is to see the face of heaven, which it is not wont to doe, and so for feare of some greater harme, it is thought that it giveth over crying: Now if wee may come in with poeticall fables to make up our discourse; it is said, that faire Adonis was killed by a wilde bore; and Adonis is thought to be no other than Bacchus himselfe; which opinion may be confirmed by many ceremoniall rites, in sacrificing both to the one and the other, which are the very same: although some hold that Adonis was the minion whom Bacchus loved, as appeareth by Phanocles the poet, a man well scene in love-matters, in these verses:

*Bacchus who tooke so great delight
The hills and forests for to range:
Of faire Adonis had once a sight,
And him to ravish made it not strange.*

Symmachus marvelling at this last speech of his above the rest: How now (quoth he) will you Lamprias indeed insert and transcribe the true god of your country:

*Bacchus I meane surnamed Evius,
Who women doth to rage incite:*

And in such service furious,
And frantick worship takes delight.

among the secret ceremonies of the Hebrewes? Or doe you not thinke there is some reason that he is the very same god whom they love. Then Meragenes: Let Lamprius alone (quoth he) as for my selfe who am an Athenian, I answer & say unto you assuredly, that he and Bacchus are both one: but the most part of the arguments and conjectures which proove it, may not be uttered and taught, but unto those who are professed in the absolute religion and confraternitie trierically, of Bacchus in our country: howbeit, that which we are not forbidden to speak among friends, and namely at the table, amide our cuppes, and when we take pleasure in the gifts and benefits of this god, (if it pleaseth the cōpany) ready I am to deliver: and when they all willed & requested him to doe: * First and formost (quoth he) the season and whole manner of their principall and greatest feast, is altogether proper and convenient unto Bacchus; for that which they call their fast, they celebrate in the very middes and heat of vintage, at what time as they bring tables abroad, and furnish them with all kinds of fruit: they sit under tents or boothes, which are made principally of vine branches and ivie, wrought, twisted, & interlaced one within another; and the even or day before it, they call the feast of tabernacles or pavilions: within a few daies after, they celebrate another feast, and the same is not under a figure, and covertly, but openly, and directly in the name of Bacchus: there is a third solemnitie yet among them, named Cradephoria, of carying vine braunches and Thyrsochoria, of bearing javelins dight with ivie, and in that manner enter they into their temple, but what they doe within we know not: howbeit very probable it is, that they performe there certeine Bacchanales or rites in the honor of Bacchus; for they use little trumpets to invoke upon their god, such as the Argives have in their Bacchanale solemnitie; then come others playing upon harpes and lutes, whom they call in their language Levites, a denomination haply derived of Lycius, the surname of Bacchus, or rather of Evius: It seemeth also to me, that their feasts of Sabbats is not altogether disagreeable with Bacchus; for there be many places yet in Greece even at this day, where they call the priests Bacchi, by the name of Sabbi: who in their Bacchanales and ceremoniall sports, effoones reiterate these voices, Euo and Sabbi, as appeareth in the oration of the crowne which Demosthenes made against Aelcines; as also in the poet Menander. And this name, Sabbat, if a man should say, it was imposed upon this feast of Evius, that is to say, of the inordinate motion and turbulent agitation of the priests of Bacchus, it were not altogether absurd and without reason: for even they themselves tell us no lesse: for they solemnize and honor the Sabbath with mutuall feasting and inviting one another to drinke wine, untill they be overfene therewith, unlesse some great occasion do occurre that hindereth them; and even then, they thinke yet that they must needs take strong wine. Howbeit, some man may haply say, that these arguments be but bare conjectures and presumptions, that cary with them some little probabilitie: but verily, that which is done among them, is a forcible & necessarie prooffe. First and formost, their high priest shewing himselfe abroad, and going before with a miter upon his head, at these feasts, argueth no lesse, who also is clad in a vesture of Stags skinnie, wrought richly with golde; arraigned beside, in a long robe, downe to his feet, and wearing buskins; besides, there be many little belles pendant round about the border and skirt of his robe, which gingle and ring as he goeth, like as also among us: this manner of resounding they use still in their sacrifices, and they surname the nourfes of their god, Cholodryta: and besides, there is a Thyrse or Javelot with tabours to be seene expressly printed aloft, against the walles of their temple; all which ceremonies, certainly can agree to no other god, but unto Bacchus.

Moreover, in none of all their oblations do they offer honie, for that they thinke it marreth and corrupteth wine when it is mingled with it; and yet this was the liquor which they used in oldetie, to serve God withall in their libaments; and whereof they dranke untill they were drunke, before the vine-tree was knowne: and even at this day, those barbarous nations, who drinke no wine, use a certeine drinke made of honie, correcting the exceeding sweetnesse thereof with certeine tart and austere roots resembling (in some sort) the verdure of wine: these oblations, the Greeks present unto their gods, and those they call Nephalia and Melesponda, as one would say, Sober and confected with honie: for that honie hath a naturall propertie adverte and contrary unto wine. To conclude, that this is the same God which they worship, a man may collect by this one argument, which is of no small force; namely, that among many punishments which they have, this is the most shamefull and ignominious, when they are forbidden den to drinke wine; wo are punished even so long as it pleaseth him to set downe, who is the judge, and hath power to impose the penaltie; and those who are thus punished, * * * *

The end of this discourse is wanting, as also the discussing and deciding of the other five questions proposed in the forefront of this fourth booke.

The Proöme.

Hat your opinion is at this present (ὁ σοφὸς Σίμω) as touching the pleasures of the soule and bodie, I wot not;

For that now many a mountaine high,
And hady forest stand betwene;
The roaring seas likewise do lie,
So as to part us, barres they beene.

for you seemed not greatly, long agoe, to approve and allow their sentence, who holde: That there is nothing properly and particularly delightfome, nothing pleasant unto the soule, nothing at all that it desireth, or joiet in, of it selfe; but that it liveth onely according ding to the life of the bodie, laughing (as it were) and sporting with it in the pleasant affections thereof; and contrariwise, mourning at the heave passions afflicting it: as if the foule were no other thing, but a very matter apt to take the impression of sundry formes, or a mirror to receive the images and resemblances of those objects which are presented unto the flesh and body: for as by many reasons, a man may easily refute the blind and illiberal fallacie of this opinion; so, by this especially; that after the table is taken away, and supper done, men of learning and knowledge incontinently fall to discourse and devise together (as it were) at a banquet, delighting and solacing one another with pleasant talke, wherein the bodie hath no part at all, unless it be very little and a farre off: which experience beareth witness, that this is the provision of dainties, and delicate pleasures laid up peculiarly for the foule; and that these be the onely delights indeed of the minde, whereas those other be but baillards and strangers infected with the societie of the bodie: like as therefore nurses whiles they give pappes and panades unto their little babes, have some small pleasure in feeding them, by tasting the same in their owne mouthes before; but after they have filled their infants bellies, and brought them a sleepe, so as they cry no more, then they goe themselves to their owne refection, meet for them, they eate and drinke and make good cheere; even so the foule doth participate with the desires and appetites of the bodie, in manner of a nurse attending upon it, serving it, and framing herselfe in some sort to do it pleasure, and satisfie the necessities thereof: but after that the body is sufficiently served, laied at rest and repose, then being delivered of her obsequious service and businesse about the bodie, she betaketh herselfe from thenceforward unto her owne pleasures and delights; making her repast, and taking her solace in discourses of learning, in good letters, in sciences and histories, and in seeking to heare somewhat, and know more still of that which is singular. What should a man say any more of this? considering and seeing as he doth, that even base mechanickall and unlettered fellows, after supper, ordinarily withdraw their minds, and employ the same upon other pleasures and recreations, farre removed from the body, proposing darke riddles ænigmaticall questions, and intricate propositions of names comprised under notes of certaine numbers, hardly to be assoiled or guessed at? and after all this, come in banquets, which make way unto plaiers, jesters, counterfet pleasures, giving roome to Menander, and the actors of his comedies: all which sports and pastimes are not devised for to ease and take away any paine of the body, ne yet to procure some gentle motion and kinde contentment in the flesh; but onely for that the speculative and studious part of the minde, which naturally is in every one of us, doth demand & call for some particular pleasure and recreation of her owne, when we are once discharged of the businesse and offices whereabout we are employed for the body.

THE FIRST QUESTION.

What is the cause that willingly we heare and see those who counterfet them that be angrie, or sorrowfull; but lo we not heare or see the parties themselves in those passions?

OF such matters there passed many discourses, when you were present with us at Athens, at what time as the comedian actor Strato flourished; for hee was then in so great name and reputation, that there was no talke but of him. But one time above the rest, we were invited and feasted by Boetius the Epicurean, and with us there supped many more of that sect: now after supper, the fresh remembrance of the comedie which we had seene acted, gave occasion unto us, being students and lovers of learning, to fall into a discourse and question about the cause, why we cannot abide but are greatly discontented, to heare the voices of those who are angrie, sorrowfull, timorous, or affrighted; and contrariwise, what the reason is, that they who counterfet these passions, and represent their words, their jestures and behaviour, doe much delight and please us? And verily, all in manner there in place, opined the same, and were in one song; for they gave this reason and said: Inasmuch as he who counterfeith those pastimes, is better than he who suffereth them indeed; & in regard that he who is not affected himselfe, excelleth the other; we knowing so much, take pleasure and are delighted: but I, albeit, that I set foot (as men say) in the daunce of another, said thus much: That we being naturally framed for to discourse by reason, and to love things that favour of wit, and be artificially done, affect and esteeme those who have a dexteritie therein, if a thing succeed accordingly: for like as the Bee delighting in sweetnesse, flieth from flower to flower, seeking busily where shee may finde

finde any matter that will afford substance for hony; even so a man by nature ingenious, studious also of arts, and elegancie, is wont to cherish, love, and embrace every action, and worke, where he knoweth there was wit and understanding employed in the finishing of it: if then one come and present unto a young childe, a little loafe of bread indeed, and withall tender unto him a pretty puppie or bulkin, or heighter made of paste or dough; you shall see that he will run rather to these counterfet devices, than to the other: and even so it is also in other things; for if one offer him a piece of silver in the masse unwrought; and another tender unto him a little beaft or a cup made of silver, he will much sooner make choise of that which hee seeth to have some artificall workmanship joined with it, and to favour of wit and cunning: and therefore it is, that children at this age take more delight, both to heare such covert speeches as shew one thing and meane another; as also those plaies and pastimes which have some wittie matters contrived, or ambiguous difficulties interlaced therein: for that which is smoothly polished and curiously wrought, draweth and allureth unto it mans nature of the owne accord, as being proper unto it, and familiar, although it be not taught to embrace it. Forasmuch as therefore, hee who is angry or grieved in good earnest, sheweth nothing else but common and ordinary passions; but in representing and counterfeiting of the same, there is a certaine dexteritie and subtiltie of wit to be seene, especially if it speed well and take effect; therefore wedelight to behold the one, and are displeased to see the other. For the prooffe hereof, marke how we are affected, semblably in other objects, shewes, and sights, presented unto us: for with griefe and sorrow of heart we look upon those who are either dying or lie grievously sick: contrariwise, with joy we behold, yea and admire either Philotes painted in a table; or queene Jocasta portraied in brasse; upon whose visage it is said; that the workman tempered a little silver with the brasse, to the end that this mixture of metalls together, might represent naturally, and to the life indeed, the face and colour of one ready to faint, and yeeld up the ghost: And this (quoth I) my masters, (to you I speake who are Epicureans) is an evident argument on the Cyrenaiques side against you; to proove that in pastimes and sports, presented to the eie and the eare, the pleasure consisteth not in seeing or hearing, but in the understanding: for an odious and unpleasant thing it is, to heare a henne keepe a creaking or cackling, and a crow towardsly and untunably crying; and yet hee that can well and naturally counterfet either the cackling of an henne, or the crying of the crow, pleaseth and contenteth us woonderfull well: semblably, to looke upon those who are in pitifick or consumption, is but a lovelesse sight; and yet we joy and take delight to see the pictures or images of such persons; for that our understanding is pleased and contented with the imitation & resemblance of them, as a thing proper and peculiar unto it: for otherwise, what joy and contentment have men, or what outward occasion have they so much to admire and woonder at Parmenons fow? inasmuch as it is grown to be a common by-word: This Parmenon was by report, one that counterfeited passing well, the grunting of an hogge; for which his singular grace and gift therein, his concurrents upon an envious humour, would needs assay to doe as much in despite of him: but men being already forestalled with a prejudicate opinion of him, would say thus: Well done; but nothing to Parmenons hogge: and therefore, one of them having gotten a little porker indeed under his arme, made it for to squeake and cry; but the people hearing the noise of a swine indeed: All this (say they) is nothing to Parmenons hog; whereupon the parties let the said live hog run among them all, for to convince them of their corrupt judgement, caried away with an opinion, and not grounded upon truth and reason. Whereby it appeareth evidently, that one and the same motion of the sense, doth not affect the minde alike, when there is not an opinion, that the action was performed wittily and with artificall dexterity.

THE SECOND QUESTION.

That there was in old time a game of prize for poets.

AT the solemnitie of the Pythicke games, there was some question and talke upon a time, about the cutting off, and putting downe of certaine plaies and pastimes, foisted in, so the others that were ancient and of the first institution: for whereas at the first, there were but three onely that plaid their prizes; to wit, the Pythian plaiers of flute or pipe, the harper, and the singer to the harpe: after they had once admitted the actour of tragedies, no sooner was this gate (as one would say) set open, but they were not able to resist and keepe out an infinit number of other other plaies and sports, that rushed and thrust themselves in after him: by occasion whereof, there was much varietie and a frequent concourse at this solemnitie, which I must needs say, was no unpleasant sight to beholde: but surely it retained not the ancient gravity and dignitie be-10 coming the Mules indeed; for by this meanes, the judges and umpires were much troubled; besides, there grew many quarrels and enmities, which could not otherwise be; for where there are so many contending for the prize, there can not chuse but be a number of mal-contentes, that missed the garland. But among all others, it was thought good by the judges, to remoove and banish from the solemnitie, a number of those who penned orations, and all the sort of poets that came thither to verifie for the best game; which they did not (I assure you) for any hatred

 20 unto learning and good letters, but for that they who present themselves to these learned combats, be ordinarily the most notable persons of all others; the judges before said, revered them, and in some sort, pitied their case, esteeming them all worthy men, and well deserving of good letters, howbeit, not able all to gaine the victory. We therefore, being at this counsell, labored to dehort those who went about to change and alter setled customes, and who blamed in any of these sacred games, multiplicity and variety, as if they found fault with many strings in an instrument, or a consort of voices in vocall musick. Now, in supper time when we were in Petrus his house, who was the president and governour of the said solemnitie, and courteously had invited us, the question was revived and set on foot a fresh; and we tooke upon us to defend
 30 the cause of the Muses, shewing, that poeticke was no moderne profession, nor entred but lately among the combats of sacred games, but that of ancient time it had won the victorie, and gaine the crowne. There were in the company, some who thought by these words of mine, that I meant to alledge old testimonies, and to cite stale and triviall examples for prooffe of the cause; to wit, the funerals of Oedipus the Thessalian, and of Amphidamas the Chalcidian, at which, Homer and Hesiodus made verses one against another for the victorie, as stories make mention: but casting by and rejecting all these evidences so much tossed and divulged already by Grammarians; and namely, the funerall obsequies and honours done to Patroclus in Homer, where they read not hymns, that is to say, launcers of darts, but epigrams, that is to say, makers of orations and eloquent oratours, as if Achilles had propoed rewards and prizes for orations; leaving (I say) these matters, I affirmed: That when Acastus celebrated the funerals for his father Pelias, he exhibited a combat of poets for the best game, wherein Sibylla went away with the victory. Hereat
 40 many stood up, and opposed themselves against me, demanding a reall caution at my hands for to make good that which I had averred, for that it seemed unto them a very strange narration and incredible: but as good hap was, I called to remembrance, that I had read so much in the Chronicle of Zephia, compiled by Aesander, where the story is put downe: And this booke (quoth I) is not in every mans hand to read; howbeit, I thinke verily, that the most of you have bene careful to peruse those records which Polemon the Athenian, a diligent writer and a learned antiquarie, who hath not bene idle and sleepe in seeking out the antiquities and singularities of Greece, hath set downe in writing, as concerning the treasures of the city Delphos: for there you shall find written, that in the treasure of the Sicyonians, there was a golden booke, given and dedicated by Arifomache the poetresse of Erythrae, after she had obtained the victorie, & gotten 50 the garland at the solemnitie of the Isthmicke games: Neither have you any reason (quoth I) to esteeme Olympia, and the games thereof, with such admiration above the rest, as if it were another fatall destiny immutable, and which can not be changed nor admit alteration in the plaies there exhibited: as for the Pythian solemnitie, three or foure extraordinarie games it had, respective unto good letters and the Muses, adjoined and admitted to the rest: the Gymnicke exercises and combats performed by men naked, as they were at first ordeined, for they continued for the most part still, and hold on at this day; but at the Olympian games, all save onely running in the race, were taken up afterwards, and counted as accessories: likewise, there have bene many of them which at first were instituted, since put downe and abolished; namely, epicures, that is to say, an exercise and feat of activitie, when the concurrent mounted on horsebacke, in the mids of his course leapeth downe to the ground, taketh his horse by the bridle, and runneth on foot with him a full gallop: as also another, called aristobolus, which was a course with a chariot drawn by two mules: moreover, there is taken away now, the coronet ordeined for children that achieved the victorie in Pentathlus, that is to say, five severall feats: to be short, much innovation, change and altering there hath bene in this festivall solemnitie, from the first institution; but I feare me, that you will call upon me againe for new pledges and cautions, to prove and justifie my words, if I should say, that in olde time at Pise, there were combats of sword-fencers cers, fighting at the sharpe to the utterance, man to man, where they that were vanquished or yielded themselves died for it; and if my memorie failed mee that I could not bring out mine author, and name him unto you; I doubt, you would laugh and make a game of mee, as I had overdrunk my selfe, and taken one cup to many.

THE THIRD QUESTION.

What is the cause that the pitch-tree is held consecrated unto Neptune and Bacchus: And that in the beginning the victours at the Isthmian games were crowned with a garland of pine-tree branches, but afterwards with a chaplet of smilax or parsley, and now of late, with the foresaid pitch-tree?

There was a question propounded upon a time: Why the manner was to crowne those with pine or pitch-tree branches, who gained the prize at the Isthmicke games? For so it was, that during the said festivall solemnity, Lucianus the high priest made a supper at Cerimus, at his owne house, and feasted us: where Praxiteles the geometrician, a great discomfiter, told us a poeticall tale, and namely; that the body of Melicerta was found cast up, & driven upon the body of a pine-tree, by the sea at a full tide; for that there was a place not farre from Megara, named Cules Dromos, that is to say, the race of the faire lady; whereas the Megarians doe
 20 port, that dame Ino carrying her young babe within her armes, ranne and cast her selfe headlong into the sea: But it is a common received opinion (quoth he) that the pine is appropriate for the making of coronets, in the honour of Neptune: whereupon when as Lucianus the high-priest added moreover and said: That the said tree being consecrated unto Bacchus, it was no marvell nor absurditie if it were dedicated also to the honour of Melicerta. Occasion was taken to search into the cause; wherefore the auncients in old time held the said tree sacred unto Bacchus and Neptune both? For mine owne part I saw no incongruities therein; for that these two gods be the lords and rulers over one generall principle, or element, to wit, humidity or moisture, considering also that they generally in manner all, sacrifice unto Neptune, under the surname
 30 or addition of Andrius, that is to say, the president over trees: and yet it may be said, that the pine more particularly appertaineth not to Neptune; nor as Apollodorus is of opinion, because it is a tree that loveth to grow by the sea-side, or for that it delighteth in the windes as the sea doth: (for some there be of this minde) but especially in this regard; that it affordeth good timber, and other stufte for building of ships; for both it, and also other trees, which for their affinity may goe for her sisters, to wit, pitch-trees, larkie-trees, and cone-trees, furnish us with their wood, most proper to steele upon the sea, and with their rosin also and pitch, to calke and calstret; without which composition, be the joints never so good and close, they are to no purpose in the sea: as for Bacchus they consecrated the pitch-tree unto him, for that pitch doth 40 give a pleasant seasoning unto wine: for looke where these trees doe naturally grow, the vine there by report yeeldeth pleasant wine; which Theophrastus imputeth to the heat of the soile; for commonly the pitch tree groweth in places of macle or white clay, which by nature is hot, and so by consequence helpeth the concoction of wine; like as such kinde of clay yeeldeth water, of all others most light and sweet: besides, if the same be blended with wheate, it maketh the greater heape, for that the heat thereof doth cause it to swell, and become more full and tender: moreover the vine receiveth many commodities and pleasures more from the pitch tree, for that it, with those things which be, is good & necessarie, both to commend and also to preserve wines; for it is an ordinary thing with all men, to pitch those vessels into which they put up their wines, yea, and some there be who put rosin even into the wine: as for example, those of 50 Eubias in Greece, and Italy, the inhabitants by the Po side; and that which more is, from out of Gaul by Vienna, there is brought a certaine pitch-wine, called Pysitres, which the Romanes set much store by, because it giveth it not onely a delectable sent, but also a better strength, taking from it in a small time the newnesse and the watery substance thereof, by the meanes of a milde and kinde heat. This being said, there was an oratour there, a man of great reading a singular scholar, and an excellent humanitian, who cried out in this manner: And is it so indeede as who would say, it were not very lately, and but the other day, that the pine tree yeilded garlands and chaplets at the Isthmian games? for heretofore the victors there, were crowned with wreathes wreaths and coronets made of smalach leaves: and this appeareth by that which we may heare out of a certeine comedie, a covetous miser speake in this wise:

*These Isthmike games I gladly would part fro,
For price that smalach wreaths in market go.*

And Timon the historiographer writeth; that when the Corinthians marched in battell ray under the conduct of Timoleon against the Carthaginians, for the defence of Sicily, they encountered in the way certeine folk, who carried bunches of smalach: now when many of the fouldiors tooke this occurrence for an ill presage (because smalach is taken to be an unluckie herbe; inso much as when we see one lie extreame sicke, & in danger of death, we say: That he hath need of nothing else but smalach) Timoleon willed them to be of good cheere, and put them in minde of the victorious chaplets of smalach at the Isthmian games, wherewith the Corinthians crowaed the winners. Moreover the admirall galley of king Antigonius was called Isthura, for that without any fowing or setting, there grew smalach of it selfe about the poupe thereof: and this obscure & ænigmaticall epigram under darke and covert words, signifieth plainly, earthen vessels stilled and stopped with smalach: and in this manner it goeth:

*This Argive earth which ere while was full soft,
Now baked hard with fire, the bloud deepe-red
Of Bacchus hides within, but loe aloft,
It Isthmick branches beares in mouth and head.*

Certes, they have not read this much, who vaunt so greatly of the Pitch-tree chaplet, as if they were not a moderne stranger and new commier, but the ancient, proper, and naturall garland, belonging to the Isthmian games. Which words of his, mooved the younger fort not a little, as being delivered by a man who had seene and read much; and Lucianus the high-priest himselfe, casting his eie upon me, and smiling withall: Now by Neptune (quoth he) I sweare, what a deale of learning is heere! howbeit, others there were, who bearing themselves (as it should seeme) upon mine ignorance and want of reading, were perswaded of the contrary, and avouched, that the Pitch-tree branches were the ancient garlands in the Isthmick solemnities, as naturall unto that countrey; and on the other side, the coronet of Smalach was a meere stranger, brought from Æmea thither upon an emulation, in regard of Hercules, whereby it had indeed the name, for a time; inso much as it supplanted the other, and woon the credit from it, as being counted a sacred herbe, and ordeined for this purpose; but afterwards, the Pine-garland flourished againe and recovered the ancient reputation, so at this day it is in as great honour, as ever it was. Heereupon I suffered my selfe to be perswaded, and gave so good care, that many testimonies for confirmation of this opinion I learned, yea, and some of them I bare away and remembred; and namely, that out of them, Euphorion the poet, who spake of Melicerta, much after this manner:

*The young man dead, they did bewaile, and then his corps they laid Upon greene branches of Pine-tree, whereof the crownes were said
To have beene made, those to adorne with honour glorious,
Who at the sacred Isthmick games
were deem'd victorious:
For why? as yet the murdering hand,
for Charon had not stain'd,
The sonne of Neme, no full dame,
where as with streame avaine Asopus runnes: since when, began the wreath of Smalach greene,
To binde the head of champions,
all bravely to be scene.*

Also out of Callimachus, who hath expressed this matter more plainly, where he bringeth Hercules in, speaking after this manner:

*And it, though much inferiour,
and more terrestriall,*

Employ

*Employ they shall in Isthmick games, when in memoriall
Of god Ægeon they with crownes
the victorious brave de decke,
According to Æmean rites, and thereby give the cheeke
To chaplets made of Pine-tree faire, wherewith the champion
For victorie, sometime was dight at games Corinthian.*

Over and besides, if I be not deceived, I have light upon a certeine commentarie of Procles, writing of the Isthmian solemnities; namely, that at the very first institution thereof, ordeined it was: That the victorious coronet should be made of Pitch-tree branches; but afterwards, when these games were accounted sacred, they translated thither from the Nemæan solemnities, the chaplet of Smalach: now this Procles was one of the scholars in the Academic, what time as Xenocrates taught and flourished.

THE FOURTH QUESTION.

What is the meaning of these words in Homer: ζῆντες ὁ νέμεϊν?

Some of the companie where I supped upon a time, thought Achilles ridiculous, in that he swallowed his friend Patroclus * to fill out purer wine, and lesse delaied, giving a reason withall, saying:

*For now are cometo visite me for love,
My dearest friends, and whom I best approve.*

But Niceratus the Macedonian, a familiar friend of ours, opposed himselfe directly, and said: That ζῆντες, in this place of Homer, signifieth not meere wine of it selfe, without water, but hot wine, as if the primitive word ζῆν, were derived ζῆν ἵσ ζῆν ἵσ ζῆν, that is to say, vitall heat and ebullition: And therefore meet it was (quoth he) that (seeing his good friends were in place) there should be filled out for them, a cup of fresh wine, new drawn, and full of life and sparkling spirites; like as we our selves use to do, when as we powre out and offer unto the gods, our sacred libations: but Soficles the poet, calling to minde, and alledging a sentence of Empedocles, whose words be these, speaking of the generall mutation of the universall world,

*What thing beforemost simple was and pure, Became now * mixt by compound temperature.*

said: That the philosopher meant by the word ζῆν, as much as temperatur, that is to say, well tempered: Neither see I (quoth he) any thing to the contrary, but that Achilles might bid Patroclus to prepare and dresse a cuppe of wine, so tempered as it should be drunke: neither must you thinke it a strange phrase or manner of speech, if he said, ζῆντες for ζῆν; for we are wont likewise, to put ζῆντες in stead of ζῆν; as also ζῆντες for ζῆν: for received now it is, by ordinarie custome, to use the comparatives of some words for the positives. Then Antipater, a friend of ours there present, said: That in olde time they were wont to call the yeere by the name of ζῆν, and (as) in composition with other words, signifieth as much as the greaunesse of a thing, so that olde wine, that had lien many yeeres in this place, Achilles called ζῆντες. As for my selfe, I inferred thus much, and put them in mind: That some thinke ζῆντες signifieth [hotter,] and by hotter, the meane quicker, sooner, or with more speed; for in that sense other-whiles we bid our servants to bestirre themselves more hotly about their worke, meaning they should make more haste, and dispatch their businesse. But in the end, I declared unto them, that their disputation and arguing about this point, was but childith, in case they were afraid to confesse, that ζῆντες betokened that which was more pure and of it selfe, without tempering or delaying; as if (forsooth) Achilles had committed here, some incongruie or absurditie, as Zoilus the Amphipolitan would seeme to tax him; who considered not first and formost: that Achilles (saw Phoenix and Ulysses, two ancient personages, who tooke no great pleasure to have much water in their wine, no more than all other olde men, who love to drinke it meere and pure; in regard of whose age, he gave commandement to delay it lesse for them: againe, having beene (as he was) the scholar of Chiron, and learned of him, the regiment of health, as one not ignorant what diet was meet for mens bodies, he thought thus with himselfe, that those bodies which are at repose and ease, having beforetime bene used to travell, required a more remisse, soft and tender temperature, as that which is fitter and meeter for them; for so he caused among other forrage and provender, his horses to be served with smallch; for that feedes standing idle in the stable, and doing nothing, will be troubled with the paines in their feet; for which infirmities this smallch is a soveraigne remedie: neither should yee find (and reade the Iliad throughout) that smallch or any such kinde of fodder was given to other horses than to those who stood still, and laboured not. Achilles therefore being well scene in physicke, was both carefull about his horses to provide for them, as the time required, and also considerat and respectiue to his owne body, for to ordeine the lightest diet, (as most holosome) for himselfe who tooke his ease, and was not employed in bodily exercise; whereas he did not in that manner intertaine those personages, who all the day had bene in the field, and performed martiall exploits, and warlike service, but gave order to powre out for them, stronger wine and lesse delaied. Now that Achilles otherwife of himselfe greatly loved not wine, for that he was by nature lower and implacable, appeareth by these verses of the same poet:

*For gentle nature he had none,
he was not soone appeas'd,
But irefull, fierce, and violent, and once more d'hardly pleas'd.*

And in one place, speaking liberally of himselfe, he said:

*That many nights he slept no winke,
Of sundry matters he did so thinke.*

Now who knoweth not, that short sleepes agree not to those that drinke meere wine, neither will they serve their turne: also when as he contested with Agamemnon, and reviled him, at the first word hee gave him the tearme Oinobates, wine-bibber or drunkard; as if drunkennesse and wine-bibbing were the vice which his heart abhorred most: And therefore to conclude, considering all these circumstances, great reason he had, that seeing right honourable personages were come unto him, and those of good yeeres, he should be well advised to take order, not to temper wine for them, as his manner was for himselfe; because the same had bene too small, and not agreeable for their persons.

THE FIFTH QUESTION.

Of those who invite many guests to supper.

Vpon my returne from Alexandria, all my friends one after another feasted me, for my welcome home, and to beare me company, they invited with me, as many as they thought, in regard of kindred or friendship, were any way toward me; in such sort, as by reason of the multitude of guests, our meetings were ordinarily more tumultuous, and sooner dissolved than they had wont to be: the disorder therefore of sitting at such feasts, gave us occasion to discourse much of that matter. But Onesiphates the physician when hee feasted me in his turne, as others did; bad not very many, but those onely whom he knew to be my speciall friends, and most familiar with me: whereupon I called to minde a sentence written by Plato, as touching a citie, and thought with myselfe, that it might very well be applied unto a feast: for like as a citie which still groweth and augmenteth, in the end becomes no more a citie; for that there is a certaine bignesse prefixed & limited unto it, which it must not outgrow; even so there is a just proportion in the greatnesse of a feast, within the which it is still a feast; but if it passe and exceed the same, (I meane) in the number and multitude of guests, so as they cannot satiate and speake one to another conveniently, they have no meanes to cheere up and drinke one to another reciprocally, nor exercise their mutual knowledge kindly; surely it is no more to be called a feast: for there should not be at a feast, as in a campe, messengers and curriers betwene; nor after the manner of a great galley, speciall servitors, going from one to another, to cheere them up, and bidde them be merie; but the guests ought to speake and talke one with another, for that a feast must be disposed after the manner of a daunce, so as he who sits lowest may heare him that is highest. After I had thus much said, my grandfather Lamprias began to speake, and that with so loud a voice and so strong, that all the companie might heare him: There is then (quoth he) a kinde of meane and moderation, whereof we had need, not onely in eating and drinking drinking at a feast, but also in the bidding and inviting of guests; for surely there may be an excess in unmeasurable curtesie and humanitie, when it cannot omit nor leave out any of those with whom a man heerebefore hath feasted or made merrie, but draweth all of them, as if the case were to goe for to see a plaie, behold solemne sights, or to heare musike: and for mine owne part I thinke that the good man of the house, or master of a feast, is not so much woorthy to be blamed or laughed at, for being at a fault of bread or drinke for his guests; as when hee hath not roome enough to place them; of which he ought to make provision with the largest, not onely for those who are formally invited, but also for commers in, and such as bid themselves, for strangers also that passe by: moreover, if there chaunce to be some want of bread or wine, the fault may be laid upon the servants, as if they had made it away, or plaid the theeves; but if there be no roome left, it cannot chuse but be imputed to the negligence and indiscretion of him who invited the guests: Hesiodus is wonderfully much commended for writing thus:

*At first no doubt it was so cast,
That there might be a Chaos vast.*

For in the beginning of the world, requisite is was that there should bee a void place for to receive and comprehend all those things that were to be created: Not (quoth hee) as my sonne yesterday made a supper, according to that which Anaxagoras said: All things were huddled and jumbled together pell-mell, confusedly: and admit that there bee place and roome enough, yea, and provision of meat sufficient, yet nevertheless, a multitude would be avoided, as a thing that bringeth confusion, and which maketh a societie unfociable, and a meeting unmeet and not affable: certes, lesse harme it were, and more tolerable a great deale, to take from them who are bidden to our table, their wine, than their communication and fellowship of talk; and therefore Theophrastus called (merrily) barbars shops, dry banquets without wine; for the good talke that is betwene a number of persons sitting there one by another: but they who bring a fort together into one place, thrumbling them one upon another, deprive them of all conference, and discourfing reciprocally, or rather indeed they bring it so to passe, that but verie few can commune & converse together; for by that meanes they fort themselves apart, two by two, or three by three, for to have some talke: as for those who are set farder of, hardly they can not discern, no nor know them, being distant and remooved a funder, as a man would say the length of an horse race:

Some, where Achilles tents are pitcht close for to make their stay:

*And some, where Ajax quarter is,
as farr another way.*

Thus you shall see how some rich men heereby, otherwhiles shew their foolish magnificence to no purpose, in building halles, and dyning chambers, containing thirtie tables a piece in them, yea, and some of greater capacite than so: and verily this manner of preparation for to make suppers and dinners, is for folke that have no amitie nor societie one with another, when there is more need of some provost of a field to marshal the, than an vsher of an hall to see good order among them: but these men may in some fort well be pardoned for doing so; because they thinke their riches no riches, but that it is blinde, deafe, lame also, or shut up, that it cannot get forth, unlesse it have a number of witnesses, like as a tragedie, many spectators: but as for us, this remedie we have of not assembling so many at once together; namely to bidde often, and to make divers suppers; to invite (I say) our friends and well-willers at sundrie times, by few at once, and so by this meanes we may make amends for all, and bring both ends together: for they that feast but seldom, and as they say si aliquando, that is to say, by the cart loades, are forced to put in the roll all those that any way belong unto them, either by kinned, friendship or acquaintance whatsoever: whereas they who ordinarily picke out three or fouer at a time, and doe so oft, make their feasts as it were little barks, to discharge their grete hulkes, and the same to goe light and nimble: moreover, when a man considereth continually with himselfe the cause why he inviteth his friends; it maketh him to observe a difference and choise in that great multitude of them: for like as for every occasion & businesse that we have, we assemble not all sorts of people, but such onely as be meet for each purpose; for if we should have need of good counsell, we call for those who be wise; if we would have a matter pleaded, we send for eloquent orators; if a voyage or journey performed, wee seeke for such as will take up with short meales, and who have little else to doe, and be best at leisure; even so in our invitations and feasts, we must have regard ever and anon to chuse those who are meet, and will fort well together: meet men I call these for example sake: if he be a prince or great potentate who we invite to supper, the fittest persons to beate him company, be the head officers, the magistrates and principall men of the citie, especially if they be friends, or already acquainted: if we make a marriage supper, or a feast for the birth of a childe, those would be bidden who are of kindred and affinity; and in one word, as many as are linked together by the bond of Jupiter Hordinos, that is to say, the protectour of consanguinitie: and in all these feasts and solemnities, we ought evermore to have a carefull eie to bring them together who are friends or well willers, one to another: for when we sacrifice unto some one god, we make not our prayers to all others, although they be worshipped in the same temples, & upon the same altars; but if there be three 10 cups or boules brought full unto us, we powre libations out of the first to some, the second we offer to others, and the last we bestow likewise upon a third sort: for there is no envie abideth in the quire ordance of the gods: semblably, the daunce and quire of friends is divine, in some sort, if so be a man know how to distribute and deale his courtesie and kindnesse decently among them, and as it were to goe round about with them all.

THE SIXTH QUESTION.

What is the cause that guests at the beginning of a supper sit close together at the table, but afterwards more at libertie? 20

These words thus passed, and then immediately a new question was mooved; namely, What the cause might be, that men commonly at the beginning of dinner or supper, sit at the table very straight and close, but toward the end more at large; whereas it should seeme by all reason, that they should doe cleane contrary, for that then their bellies be full? Some of the company attributed this unto the forme and posture of their bodies, as they sit; for that ordinarily men sit to their meat, directly at their full breadth, groveling forward, and put their right hands straight forth upon the table; but after they have well supped, they turne themselves more to a side, & sit edge-wife, taking up no place now, according to the superficies 30 of the body, not sitting (as a man would say) by the squire, but rather by the line and the plumb: so like as therefore the cockal bones occupie lesse room when they fall upon one of their sides, than if they be couched flat; even so every one of us at the first sitteth bending forward, and fronteth the table with his mouth and eies directly upon it; but afterwards hee chaungeth that forme, from front to flanke, and turneth sidelong to the boord. Many there were who ascribed the reason of this, to the yeelding of the couch or bed, whereon men sit at their meat; for being pressed downe with sitting, is stretched broader and wider, like as our shooes with wearing and going in them, grow more slacke and easie for us by little and little, untill in the end they be so large, that we may turne our feet in them. Then the good old man spake merrily and said: That one and the same feast had alwaies two presidents and governors different one from another: 40 at the beginning hunger, which cannot skill of keeping any good order; toward the end, Bacchus, and him all men know very well, and confesse to have bene a very sufficient capitaine, and an excellent leader of an armie: like as therefore Epaminondas (when as other capitaines by their ignorance and unskillfulnesse had brought the armie of the Thebanes into a place so narrow that all was thrust together, and the ranks and files came one upon another, and crushed themselves) tooke upon him the place of a commaunder, and not onely delivered it out of those streights, but also reduced it into good order of battell; even so god Bacchus surnamed Lyau, 50 and Choreus, that is to say, a deliverer, and master of daunces, finding us at the beginning of supper thrusting one another, and having no elbow room, by reason of hunger that throumbleth us together like a sort of dogges, bringeth us againe into a decent order, whereby wee sit at ease and libertie enough like good fellows.

THE SEVENTH QUESTION.

Of those who are said to bewitch with their eies.

Here grew some question upon a time, at the table, as touching those who are reported to be cie-biters, or to bewitch with their eies; and when others (in manner all) passed it over with with laughing, as a frivolous and ridiculous thing: Mertius Flavius, who had invited us to his house, tooke the matter in hand, and said: That the effects or events rather, which daily we doe observe, do make marvellous much to the brute and voice that goeth of the thing; but for want of yeelding a good reason thereof, and setting downe the true cause, the report many times of such matters wanteth credit: But unjustly. (quoth he) and wrongfully in mine opinion; for an infinit number there be of other matters, that have a real essence, and are notoriously knowne to be so, although we are ignorant of their cause; and in one word, whose ever seeketh in each thing for a probable reason, overthroweth miracles and wonders in all; for where wee faile to give reason of a cause, there begin we to doubt & make question, & that is as much to say, as to play the philosophers: so as we may inferre consequently: They that discredit things admirable, 10 do in some sort, take away and abolish all philosophie: but we ought (quoth he) in such things as these, to searce * Why they are so, by reason; and learne * That they are so, by historie and relation; for histories do report unto us many narrations of like examples. Thus we know, that there be men, whose by looking wistly and with fixed eies upon little infants, doe hurt them most of all; for that the habit and temperature of their bodies which is moist, tender, and weak, soone receiveth alteration by them, and changerth to the worse; whereas lesse subiect they be to such accidents, when their bodies are better knit, more strong and compact. And yet Philarchus writeth in his historie of a certeine nation and people inhabiting the realme of 20 Pontus in times past, called Thybiens, who were by that meanes pestiferous and deadly, not onely to yong babes, but also to men grown; for looke how many either their eie, their breath or their speech could reach unto, they were sure to fall sicke, and pine away: and this harme was felt and perceived (as it should seeme) by merchants, who resorted unto those parts, and brought from thence, slaves to be solde. But as for these, the example peradventure is not so strange and wonderfull, because the touching, contagion, and familiar conversing together, may yeeld a manifest reason and cause of such accidents: and like as the wings of other fowles, if they be laied together with those of the eagle, perith, consume, and come to nothing, for that the plume and downe of the feathers fall off and putrifie; even so, there is no reason to the contrary, but that the touching of a man should be partly good & profitable, and in part hurtful and 30 prejudiciall: many, that folke should take harme by being seene onely, and looked upon, as an accident which (as I said before) we know to be; but for that the cause thereof is so difficult & hard to be hunted out, the report of it is incredible: Howbeit (quoth I then) you wind the cause already; you have met (in some sort I say) with the tracts and footing thereof, and are in the very way of finding it out, being come already to those defluxions that passe from bodies; for the sent, the voice, the speech and breath, be certeine defluxions and streames (as it were) flowing from the bodies of living creatures, yea, and certeine parcels thereof, which move and affect the senses, when as they suffer by the same, lighting and falling upon them: and much more probable it is, that such defluxions, proceed from the bodies of living creatures, by the means of heat & motion; namely, when they be enchaufed and stirred; as also that the vitall spirits then doe beat strongly, and the pulses worke apace, whereby the body being shaken, casteth from it continually, certeine defluxions, as is before said; and great likelihood there is also, that the same should 40 passe from the eies, more than from any other conduit of the bodie: for the sight being a sense very swift, active and nimble, doth send forth and disperse from it, a wonderfull fierie puiffance, together with a spirit that carrieth and directeth it; in such sort, that a man by the means of this eie-sight, both suffereth and doth many notable effects, yea, and receiveth by the objects which he seeth, no small pleasures or displeasures; for love (one of the greatest and most vehement passions of the minde) hath the fource and original beginning at the * eie; in so much, as he or she that is surprised therewith, doth even resolve and melt with beholding the beautie of those persons whom they love, as if they would run and enter into them: and therefore, a man may verie well marvel at those, who confessing that we suffer and receive hurt by the eie, thinke it a strange 50 matter to doe harme by the same; for the very aspect and regard of such persons as are in the flower of their beautie, and that which passeth from their eies, whether it be light or flowing of of the spirits, doth liquefie and consume those who be enamoured on them, with a certeine pleasure mingled with paine, which they themselves call Bitter-sweet: for nothing so much are they wounded or affected, either by hearing or feeling, as by seeing and being seene, so deepe is the penetration, and so strong the inflammation by the eie; which maketh mee other-whiles to thinke, that no experience and prooffe they have ever had what love is, who wonder at the Medi- 60 an Xaphtha neere to Babylon, that it should burne and catch a flame, being a great way off from

for the Laniar.

the fire; for even so, the eyes of faire and beautifull creatures, kindle fire within the very hearts and soules of poore lovers, yea, though they looke not upon them but a farre off: but we know full well, and have often seene the remedy of those who are troubled with the jaundice; namely, that if they can have a sight of the bird * Charadrius, they are presently cured; for this bird hath such a nature and temperance, that it draweth to it selfe, and receiveth the maladie passing from the patient, as it were a fluxion, and that by the conduir of the eyes; which is the reason that these birds are never willing to see a person who hath the jaundice, neither can they endure so to doe, but turne aside and avoid it all that ever they can, by closing their eyes together, not envying (as some thinke) the cure of that disease by them, but fearing to be hurt and wounded themselves; and of all other maladies, it is well known, that they who converse with them whose eyes be inflamed and bleered, are soonest and most of all infected therewith, so quicke a power and so ready hath the sight to set upon another, and inflict the contagion of that infirmitee. Then Patroclus: True it is that you say (quoth he) in bodily passions and diseases; but as for those which be more spirituall, and concerne the soule, doe cast their eyes upon others, how can it be, and how is it possible, that the only cast and regard of the eye should transmit any noisance or hurt into the bodie of another? Why? know you not (quoth I) that the soule (according as it is disposed) doth likewise affect and alter the bodie? the very conigitation of Pennis, causeth the flesh to rise; the ardent heat in couragious mastives and band-dogges, which are put upon wilde beasts for to encounter them when they are baited, dimmeth their eye-sight, and oftentimes makes them sturke blinde; sorrow, avarice, and jealousy, alter the colour and complexion of the face, drie up the habit and constitution of the bodie; and envie no lesse subtile than the rest, and piercing directly to the very soule, filleth the body also with an untoward and badde disposition, which painters lively doe represent in those tables which containe the picture of envies face: when as therefore they who be infected with envie, doe cast their eyes upon others, which because they are seated neere unto the soule, doe catch and draw unto them verie easilie this vice, and so shoot their venomous raies, like unto poisoned darts upon them; if such chance to be wounded and hurt thereby, whom they looke upon, and wistly behold: I see no strange thing, nor a matter incredible; for venile the biting of dogges is much more hartfull and dangerous when they be angry than otherwise; and the sperme or naturall seed of men doth sooner take effect, and is more apt for generation, when they meddle with women whom they love; and generally the passions and affections of the soule, doe fortifie and corroborate the powers, and faculties of the bodie: and heereupon it is, that those preservatives against witchcraft called aglazoules, are then thought to do good against envie, when the eye-sight of the envious person is withdrawn and turned away by some filthy and absurd object, that it cannot make so strong an impression upon the patient whom he would hurt: Lo seigneur Florus (quoth I) heere is mine escot for our good cheere at this meeting, in ready coine paid downe upon the naile head: VVell done (quoth Soclarus) but first before you goe, we must allow the money for good and currant; for I assure you, there be some pieces that seeme counterfet; for if we suppose that to be a truth, which is commonly reported, as touching those who are thus bewitched and eye-bitten; it is not I am sure unknown to you, that many are of opinion, that there be of their friends and kinsfolke, yea, and some of their fathers also, who carrie about them witching eyes; in such sort as their very wives will not so much as shew unto them their owne babes, nor suffer such to looke upon them any while together: how then should this effect of witcherie proceed from envie? Nay what will you say to those (I pray you) who are named for to eye-bite and bewitch their owne selves? You have heard I am sure thus much; or at leastwise you have read this Epigram.

*Faire was sometime Eutelidas,
His face and haire full lovely was;
But see, one day when needs he would (Unhappy man) himselfe behold
In river stream that softly ran,
His beautie, than hee soone began Soto admire, that for envie
Bewitcht he was by his owne eye,
And fell anon by malady,
To pine away and so to dy.*

For it is reported of this Eutelidas, that looking upon himselfe in the river water, he was so farre in love with his owne beautie, and so deeply affected with the sight thereof, that he fell sicke, and so both beautie and the good plight of his bodie went away at once: but see now what shift you can make to salve these absurdities? or what answer you will devise to avoid them? As for that (quoth he) I shall doe it at some other time sufficiently: but now drinking thus as you see me, out of so great and large a boule, I dare be bold to averre, and that confidently, that all perturbations and passions of the minde, if they settle and continue long in the soule, doe ingenerate therein evill habitudes; & these, after they have in proceesse of time gotten the strength and become another nature, upon every small occasion, are stirred, and oftentimes drive men perforce, and even against their willes to those familiar and accustomed passions: for doe but marke timorous and fearefull cowards, how they be affrighted even with such things as be safe, and doe preserve them; cholericke persons are angrie many times, and fall out with their best friends; lascivious wantons can not containe, but in the end they will offer abuse and villanie to the most holy & sacred bodies that be: for custome hath a wonderfull power to conduct & carry the habit unto that vice which is familiar unto it; & looke who is apt to take a fall, will stumble at every small hob that lies in his way: and therefore it is not a matter to make a woonder of, if they who have gotten in themselves habit of envie, and bewitching, bee incited and mooved according to the particular propertie of their passion, even against those who are most deare unto them; and being once mooved and stirred, they doe not that which they will themselves, but that whereunto they are so inclined and disposed; for like as a round bowle or ball runneth like it selfe; and semblable a roller or cylander moveth as a roller or cylander, both of them after the different figure thereof; even so, whosoever they be that have thus contracted an habitude of this eye-biting envie, their disposition mooveth and driveth them enviously upon all things; howbeit it carrieth a great likelihood that they should hurt them, who are most familiar unto them, and best beloved than any other: and therefore that good Eutelidas and all other such as he, who are faine to charme and bewitch themselves, incur this hard extremity, not without great appearance of reason: for as Hippocrates saith in his aphorismes: The good habit or plight when it is at the height is dangerous; and bodies when they are come to the highest point, they can not hold and stand so, but presently must incline and bend to the contrarie: when as men therefore are grown suddenly all at once, and see themselves in a better state than they hoped for; in so much as they wonder & behold themselves with admiration, then be sure the body is neere unto some change, and then being carried according to their habitude to the woofe, they bewitch themselves: and this is wrought the rather, by means of those fluxions which rest upon waters, looking-glasses, or any such mirrors by way of repercussion; for that they rebound backe, & breath as it were againe upon those who looke in them, so, that the hurt & damage which they have done to others, lighteth upon themselves: this haply befalling many times to little children, doth impure (though fallily and unjustly) the cause to these that looke upon them. When I had finished my speech, Caim the sonne in law of Florus, began to speake in this wise: Why then belike the images that Democritus speake of, are of no reckoning nor account, no more than the idols of Aegina and Megara, as the proverbe goes; for this philosopher saith: That there goe fourth certaine images out of the eyes of envious persons, and those not altogether without a kinde of sense and inclination, but rather full of their malice and envious witcherie who send them forth; with which, when the said images come to settle, remaine, and rest upon those who are envied, they trouble and offend the bodie, soule and understanding: for this I take to be the meaning of that great philosopher, and that hee hath delivered his opinion to this effect, under those divine and magnificent words: So he doth no doubt (quoth I) but I marvel much, how you perceived not that I have taken nothing from those defuxions, but onely life and will; which I did, for feare lest if now (being farre within night, and very late) I had talked of spirits, idols, and apparitions, having sense and understanding, I should have put you into some fright, and feared you with them: and therefore, if you thinke it so good, let us referre and put off the consideration of these thing untill to morrow morning.

THE EIGHT QUESTION.

What is the reason that the poet Homer called the Apple-tree, ἀγαλματῶν, that is to say, bearing fruit; and Empedocles named Apples, ὑψηλοῖς, that is to say, flourishing.

As we were merry together at a feast one day, in our citie Charonea, we were served with all sorts of fruits in great abundance; by occasion whereof, it took one of the companie in his head to pronounce these verses out of Homer:

οὐκ ἐν τῇ γυναικὶ δὲ μήλαι ἀγαλματῶν
καὶ ὀλῖβαι τρεῖς δόοναι.

That is to say:

*The sweet Fig-trees and apple-trees that beare a fruit so faire,
The Olive-trees likewise all greene ----* whereupon arose some question, why the poet gave unto apple-trees the attribute of bearing faire fruit? and Tryphon verily the physician, answered: That it might be spoken of the said tree, by way of comparison; which being but small to speake of, and making as little shew, bringeth forth so faire, so great, and so goodly fruit. Another said: That compounding (as he did) beautie or goodnesse, of all parts and in every respect, he could not see the same in any other fruits covered with a rinde, but onely in this: for to touch and feele, it is as smooth and net as the violet, so as it doth not staine or soile the skin, filling with a sweet sent, him that handleth it; in taste, it is pleasant; to smell unto, most delectable; and to the cie, as lovely; so as contenting thus as it doth, all the senses in a manner, by good right it is so praised and commended. We liked well of this discourse, and said, it was sufficient to solve the question. But whereas Empedocles hath writt thus:

ὕψικον ὑψηλοῖς τε στήλαις ὑψηλοῖς μέλαι.

Why pom granates so late doe grow,

And apples beare a lovely show?

I understand well (said I) this epithite ὑψηλοῖς, given unto στήλαις, that is to say, pomgranates, because the fruit commeth not to maturitie or ripenesse, untill it be about the end of Autumne, when as now the extreame heats be decayed and gone; for their moisture, so thin, feeble and waterish as it is, the sunne will not suffer it to thicken, or grow to any consistence, unless the aire begin to change and incline unto coldnesse; and therefore Theophrastus saith, that it is the onely tree that doth ripen and concoct her fruit, best & soonest, in the shade. But I doubt in what sense this wise philosophicall poet giveth this addition of ὑψηλοῖς, unto apples? considering that the man is not wont to imbelish and adorne the matters and things whereof he treateth, with the gaisht and most glorious adjectives, as with fresh and lively colours, to enrich and beautifie his stile, or to set out his verses; for there is not an epithite that he useth, but serves for to represent and expresse either the substance or els some facultie and vertue of the thing. Thus he calleth our bodie environing the soule, γῆρας ἀμφιέσσον, that is to say, earth circummortal; the aire he termeth, νεφεληγερέτω, that is to say, gathering clouds; as also, the liver, πολυμήμων, that is to say, full of blood. When I had thus put this doubt to question, there were certeine Grammarians in place, who said: That Empedocles called apples, ὑψηλοῖς, in regard of their vigor: for poets by this verbe ὑψηλοῖς, understand thus much; namely, to be grown apace to the vigor, flower, and full strength. And the poet Antimachus in this sense, teamed the city of the Cadmeans, εὐώδης ἐπὶ γένεσις, that is to say, flourishing with store of fruits. Semblably, Aratus speaketh of the Canicular Starre, δῆμιος, in this wise:

καὶ πᾶσι ὑψίστην, ἥ δ' ἔστιν ἄκρον ποταμῶν.

That is to say:

*In some he did confirme their vigour,
And mark'd in others all their verdure.*

In which place, he calleth the viriditie or greenesse, and the verie flower or beautie of fruits, εὐώδης. They added moreover, and said: That among the Greeks, some there were, who sacrifice to Bacchus, surnamed εὐώδης. Forasmuch as therefore, the apple mainteineth it selfe longest in viriditie and vigour, of all other fruits, therefore the philosopher named it, ὑψηλοῖς. But Lampricus my grandfather said: That this adjection or preposition ὑψηλοῖς, signifieth not only, much, & greatly greatly, but also, above, or with-out forth: for in this acception, the head or lirtell of a doore, we name ὑψηλόν, that is to say, above the doore; and likewise, an upper-roome, chamber, or loft, ὑψηλόν: and Homer the poet, meaneth the outward flesh of a beast sacrificed, by the word ὑψηλός; like as the inward, by the vocable ἔνθεον. Consider then (quoth he) whether Empedocles had not a respect hereunto, by attributing this said epithite unto an apple; that whereas other fruits are inclosed & covered within a certeine barke as it were, which in Greeke is called γλοιός, and have without-forth, those that we terme λεπίδες, καύκη, ὑψηλός, that is to say, shelles, rindes, cods and pannicles to cover them, that barke or shell (if I may so say) which the apple hath, lieth within; namely, a glutinous and smooth tunicle or coat, which we call the core or the corque, wherein the pepins or seeds lie contained; but the fleshy part or meat thereof for to be eaten, is all without the said core, in which respect, it may by good right be named ὑψηλόν.

THE NINTH QUESTION.

What is the cause that the Figge-tree, being of all other trees most bitter and sharpe in taste, yeeldeth a fruit most sweet?

After this, demanded it was, why the figge, so fat and sweet a fruit as it is, groweth upon a tree most bitter? for the very lease of a figge-tree by the reason of the asperitic and roughnesse that it hath, is called Thurion, and the wood is full of juice; so that when it burneth, you shall see it cast up a most eager and bitter smoke, and when it is burnt, the ashes make a leie very strong, and marvellous detersive, because of the acrimonie and sharpenesse thereof: yea, and (that which is most admirable) whereas all other trees and plants clad with leaves and bearing fruit, put forth a flower before, onely the figge-tree never sheweth blossome: and if it be true which is moreover said; that it is never blatted, or smitten with lightning, a man may attribute and ascribe it to the bitterness and evill habitude of the stocke; for it should seeme that lightning and thunder never touch any such things, no more than the skinn of a sea-calf, or of the beast Hyena. Heere the good old man (our grandfire) taking occasion to speake, said: No marvell then, if all the sweetness be found in the fruit, the rest of the tree be harth and bitter: for like as when the cholericke humour is cast into the bagge or bladder of the gall, the proper substance of the liver it selfe remaineth very sweet, even so the figge-tree having sent all the sweetness and famesse it had into the fruit, remaineth it selfe disurnished of it; for that within the trunk of the said tree there is otherwise some sweetness and good juice, though it be but a little; I make an argument from the herbe rue; which they say: If it grow under or neere a figge-tree; becommeth more pleasant in smell, and in taste more milde, by receiving and enjoying some small sweetness from it; whereby that excessive, strong and odious qualitie of rue is abated and extinct; unless peradventure a man will reason cleane contrary, and saie, that the figge-tree drawing somewhat from rue, for the owne nouriture, taketh from that herbe some part of the bitterness and acrimonie thereof.

THE TENTH QUESTION.

Who be they who according to the common proverbe, are said, μετὰ λαναι κύμινον, that is to say, about the salt and cummin? and so by the way, why the poet Homer nameth salt divine.

Florus asked us one day when we were at supper in his house, who they were whom we teamed by an usuall by-word, to be about the salt and cummin: Apollophanes the grammarian, one of our companie, solved the question readily in this manner: They (quoth he) who are such friends and so familiar that they luppe together, with salt and cummin, are meant by this common speech. But then we mooved a new question, namely: How it came to passe, that salt was so highly honoured? for that Homer directly saith:

And then anon when this was done,

He strewed salt divine upon.

And Plato affirmeth, that the bodie and substance of salt by mans lawes, is most sacred and holie: The difficultie of this question he enforced full, and augmented the more; for that the Aegyptian

Aegyptian priests who live chaste, abstaine altogether from salt, inasmuch as their verie bread which they eat is not seasoned with salt: And if it were (quoth he) so divine and holy, why have they it in so great detestation? Then Florus willed us to let the Aegyptians goe with their superstitious fashions; and to alledge somewhat of the Greeks as touching this subject argument: Whereupon I began and said: That the Aegyptians themselves were not heerein contrarie to the Greeks; for the sanctimonie and profession of chastitie, forbiddeth procreation of children, laughing, wine, and such like things; which otherwise be good, and not to be rejected: and as for salt, haply those who have vowed to live a chaste and pure life, doe forbear it, for that by the heat which it hath, (as some thinke) it provoketh those who use it, unto lecherie: and probable it is besides, that such votaries doe refuse salt, because of all other meats, it is most delicate; & a man may well say: That it is the viand of viands, & the sauce as it were to season all others: and therefore some there be who attribute unto these salts, the very tearme of Chari-tes or the Graces; for that they make that which is necessarie for our food, to be pleasant & acceptable unto us: Shall wee say then (quoth Florus) that salt was called divine in this respect? And if we did so (quoth I) wee have no slender reason to induce us thereunto; for men are wont to attribute a kinde of divinity unto things which are passing common, and the commoditie whereof reacheth farre (as for example) to water, light, & the seasons of the yeere; as for the earth, her above the rest, they repute not onely divine, but also to be a goddess: & there is none of all these things rehearsed, that salt giveth place unto, one jot, in regard of use and profit; being as it is a fortification to our meats within the bodie, and that which commetheth them unto our appetite: but yet consider moreover, if this be not a divine propertie that it hath, namely, to preserve and keepe dead bodies free from putrefaction a long while, and by that means to resist death in some sort, for that it suffereth not a mortall bodie wholly to perish, and come to nothing: but like as the soule being the most divine part of us, is that which mainteineth all the rest alive, and suffereth not the masse and substance of the bodie to be dissolved, and suffer colligation; even so, the nature of salt, taking hold of dead bodies, and imitating heerein the action of the soule, preserveth the same, holding and staying them that they runne not headlong to corruption, giving unto all the parts an amitie, accord & agreement one with the other: and therefore it was elegantly said by some of the Stoicks: That the flesh of an hogge was even from the beginning no better than a dead carion, but that life being diffused within it, as if salt were strewed throughout, kept it sweet, and so preserved it for to last long. Moreover you see, that wee esteeme lightning, or the fire that commeth by thunder, celestiall and divine, for that those bodies which have bene smitten therewith, are observed by us to continue a great while unpurtrified and without corruption: What marvel is it then, if our auncients have esteemed salt, divine, having the same vertue and nature, that this divine and celestiall fire hath? Heere I staied my speech, and kept silence. With that, Philinus followed on and pursued the same argument: And what thinke you (quoth he) is not that to be held divine, which is generative, and hath power to ingender, considering that God is thought to be the originall authour, creator, and father of all things? I vowed no lesse, and said it was so: And it is (quoth he) an opinion generally received, that salt availeth not a little in the matter of generation, as you your selfe touched ere-while, speaking of Aegyptian priests: they also, who keepe and nourish dogs for the race, when they see them dull to performe that act, and to doe their kinde, do excoite and awaken their lust and vertue generative, that lieth (as it were) asleepe, by giving them as well as other hot meats, salt flesh, and fish both, that have lien in brine & pickle: also, those ships & vessels at sea, which ordinarily are freight with salt, breed commonly an infinit number of mice and rats; for that (as some hold) the females or does of that kinde, by licking of salt onely, will conceive and be bagged without the company of the males or bucks: but more probable it is, that saltneesse doth procure a certaine itching in the naturall parts of living creatures, and by that means provoketh males & females both, to couple together: and peradventure this may be the reason that the beauty of a woman which is not dull and unlovely, but full of favor, attractive, and able to move concupiscence, men use to name αλμυρή και δειμή, that is to say, saltish or well seasoned: And I suppose that the poets have fained Πρωίμω to have bene engendred of the sea, not without some reason; and that this tale, that she should come of salt, was devised for the nonce, to signifie and make known under those covert tearmes, that there is in salt a generative power: certes, this is an ordinarie and generall thing among those poets, to make all the sea-gods, fathers of many children, and very full of issue. To conclude, you shall not finde any land-creature, ture, or flying fowle, for fruitfulnessse, comparable to any kinde of fishes bred in the sea; which no doubt this verse of Empedocles had respect unto:

*Leading a troupe, which senselesse were and rude,
Even of sea-fish, a breeding multitude.*

THE SIXTH BOOKE OF Symposiaques or banquet-questions.

The Proëme.

Lato being minded to draw Timotheus the sonne of Conon (ὁ Σοφιστὴς Senecio) from sumptuous feasts and superfluous banquets, which great captaines commonly make, invited him one day to a supper in the Academie, which was philosophicall indeed and frugall, where the table was not furnished with those viands which might distemper the bodie with feaverous heats and inflammations, as Ion the poet was wont to say; but such a supper I say, upon which ordinarily there follow kinde and quiet sleeps, such fancies also, and imaginations as ingender few dreames, and those short; and in one word, where the sleeps do testifie a great calmnesse and tranquillitie of the bodie. The morrow after, Timotheus perceiving the difference betwene these suppers and the other, said: That they who supped with Plato over-night, found the pleasure and comfort thereof the next day; and to say a truthe, a great helpe and ready means to a pleasant and blessed life, is the good temperature of the body, not drenched in wine, nor loaden with viands, but light, nimble, and ready, without any feare or distrust to performe all actions and functions of the day-time. But there was another commodity no lesse than this, which they had, who supped with Plato, namely, the discussing and handling of good and learned questions, which were held at the table in supper time: for the remembrance of the pleasures in eating and drinking, is liblerall and unbecoming men of worth, transitorie besides, and loone at an end; like unto the odor of a perfume and sweet ointment, or the smell of roste in a kitchen a day after; whereas discourses philosophicall, and disputations of learning, when they be remembered afterwards, yeeld alwaies new pleasure and fresh delight unto those that were at them, yea, and cause them who were absent and left out, in hearing the relation thereof, to have no lesse part of learning and erudition, than they who were present: for thus we see, that even at this day, students and professors of learning, have the fruition, and enjoy the benefit of Socrates his banquets, no lesse than they themselves who were personally present, and had their reall part of them at the time: 10 and verily, if corporall matter, as dainty dishes and exquisite fare, had so greatly affected and delighted their minds with pleasure; Plato and Xenophon should have put downe in writing, and left unto us the memoriall, not of the discourses there held, nor of the talke which then passed, but rather of the furniture of the table, & have made a note of the delicate viands, pastrie works, confections and junkets served up in Callias or Agathus houses: whereas now of all such matters there is no mention at all, as if they were of no account, nor worth the naming, notwithstanding very like it is, there was no want of provision, no spare of cost, nor defect of diligence in that behalfe: but on the other side penned they have most exactly, and with great diligence the discourses of good letters and philosophy, which then and there passed merrily; and those they have commended unto posterities, to give us example, that we ought not onely to devise and reason together when we are at the boord, but also to call to minde afterwards, what good talke had passed and to keepe the same in memorie.

THE FIRST QUESTION.

What is the reason, that those who be fasting are more thirstie than hungry?

NOW send I unto you Sextus Senecio, this sixth booke of banquet discourses; whereof the first question is: Why those who be long fasting, are more thirstie than hungry? for it may seeme contrary unto all reason; that thirst rather than hunger should ensue much fasting; 30 for that the want of dry food, would seeme by course of nature to require a supplie of nutriment by the like. Then began I in this manner to argue, before the companie there in place: That of all things within us, and whereof we consist, our naturall heat either alone or principally, had need of nouriture and maintenance: for thus verily wee doe observe in outward elements, that neither aire, water, nor earth, desire nutriment; neither doe they consume whatsoever is neere unto them; but it is fire onely that requireth the one, and doth the other; which is the reason that all young folke doe eat more than elder persons; for that they be hotter; yea and old men and women can endure to fast better, because their naturall heat is already decayed and feeble in them; like as it is in those living creatures which have but little blood: for small need have they of nouriture, for default of naturall heat. Moreover, thus much we may observe in everie one of our selves, that our bodily exercises, our loud outcries and such like matters, as by motion doe augment heat, make us to take more pleasure in our meat, and to have a better appetite to eat: now the principall, most familiar and naturall food of heat, in mine opinion, is moisture, as we may see by daily experience, that burning flames of fire increase by powing oile thereto; & of all things in the world, ashes are the driest, because the whole humiditie is burnt up and consumed; but the terrestriall substance destitute of all liquor, remaineth alone: 40 feebly, the nature of fire is to separate and divide bodies, by taking away the moisture which held them fodered and bound together: when as therefore wee fast long, our naturall heat draweth forcibly unto it; first, all the humours out of the reliques of our nourishment; which done, the inflammation thereof passeth farther, and setteth upon the very radish humour within our flesh, searching every corner for moisture to feed and nourish it: there being caused therefore a wonderfull drinnesse in our bodie, like as in earth or clay that is parched with heat; our thirst by consequence commeth to stand more in need of drinke than of meat, untill such time as we have taken a good draught; by means whereof our heat being well refreshed and fortified, worketh and procureth appetite to solide and dry nourishment.

THE SECOND QUESTION.

Whether it be want of food that causeth hunger and thirst, or rather the transformation and change of the conduits and passages within our bodies?

THIS discourse being thus ended, Philo the physician went about to impugne and overthrow the first position; mainteining, that thirst proceeded not from default of any nourishment, but was to be imputed unto the change of the forme in certaine passages of the body: 10 and for demonstration hereof, hee alledged of the one side this experience: That they who be a thirst in the night, if they sleepe upon it, lose their thirstinesse, although they drinke never a drop: on the other side, that they who have the ague, if their fit decline, or be off them, or in case the feaver be cleane past and gone, presently they are eased of their drought: likewise there be many, who after they have bene bathed, yea, and beleeve me, others when they have vomited, are ridde of thirstinesse; and yet they get moisture neither by the one nor the other; but they are the pores and petie conduits of the body that suffer mutation, because they be altered and transformed into another state and disposition; and this appeareth more evidently in hunger: for many sicke folke there be, who at one time have need of nourishment, and yet want appetite to their meat; some there are againe, who let them eat and fill themselves 20 never so much, have never the lesse appetite to meat, nay, their greedie hunger encreaseth the more: semblable, you shall have many of those who lothed their meat, to recover their stomacke and appetite quickly, by tasting a few olives or capres, condite with salt pickle: whereby it appeareth plainly; that hunger is not occasioned by default of nourishment, but through the said alteration or passion of the pores and conduits of the body: for surely such meats as those, although they diminish the want of nourishment, by addition of more food, yet neverthelesse cause hunger; and even to the point acrimonie of these salt viands, contenting the taste and pleasant to the mouth, by knitting, binding, and strengthening the stomacke; or contrariwise, by relaxing or opening the same, do procure unto it, and breed therein a certeine gnawing and a disposition to the liking of their meat, which we call appetite. The reason of these arguments 30 seemed unto me very wittily devised, and framed pretily, for to carrie a good shew of probability; howbeit, to be contrary unto the principall end of nature, to which the appetite doth leade and conduct every living creature, desirous to supplie that which is wanting, to fill that which is empty, and pursuing alwaies that which is meet for it and familiar, but yet defectuous: for to say, that the thing wherein principally a living creature differeth from a livelesse bodie, was not given unto us for the tuition, maintenance and preservation of our health and safetie, even as it were of our eyes that be so proper and familiar to the body, and to feare such occurrences as be adverse thereto; but to thinke that the same is onely a passion, change, and alteration of the pores occasioned according as the same be made either bigger or smaller; is (to speake plainly) the fashion and part of those who make no reckoning at all of nature. Moreover, to confesse, that 40 to quake for colde, hapneth unto our bodie for want of heat familiar and naturall unto it, and with one breath to denie, that hunger and thirst proceed not from defect of moisture and nourishment, is very absurd: and yet, more unreasonablen and monstrous it were to affirme, that nature desireth evacuation, when the feebleth her selfe charged with fulnesse, and withall, hath a desire to repletion; not because the findeth her selfe over-emptie, but upon some other passion comming I know not how, nor which way. Certes, these needs and repletions in the bodies of living creatures, resemble properly the accidents that fall out in agriculture and husbandry: for the earth suffereth many such defects, and requireth as many helpes and remedies: against drought, we seeke to moisten by watering; for burning with heat, to coole moderately; when things are frozen, to heat them againe, and keepe them warme, by laying (as it were) many coverings over; and looke what is not in our power to doe, we pray unto the gods for to helpe 50 and furnish us therewith; namely, sweet and milde dewes, pleasant and comfortable winde; so that nature alwas seeketh supplie of that which is defectue, for to preserve her state and temperature. And in my conceit, this word ἄνιστον, which signifieth nourishment, seemeth to import as much as μεσότης, that is to say, preserving nature; & preserved it is in plants verily, & trees insensibly (as Empedocles said) by the aire about them, when they are refreshed and watered thereby in convenient manner, as need requireth: but as for us, our appetite causeth us to seeke and and procure that, for default whereof, we have not our kinde temperature. But let us consider better, ech one of those reasons by it selfe, which have bene delivered, and how untrue they be; for first and formost, those viands which have a quicke, sharpe and pleasing taste, by reason of their acrimonie, procure no appetite at all in those parts, which be capable of nouriture, but only a certeine biting or gnawing in them, much like unto that itching, when something is applied unto the skin, that doth plucke and fret it: and say, that this passion or affection (whatsoever it is) procureth appetite, it standeth to great reason, that by such sharpe and quicke viands, those matters which caused fullnesse, comming to be attenuated and made more subtil, are dissolved, dissolved, and so dissipated as they ought to be; by which meanes, consequently there followeth a want and defect; not for that the pores and passages be altered or changed into another forme, but rather, because they be now voided, cleere and purged; considering that those juices which be sharpe, eager, quicke, piercing and salitish, by attenuating and making tender the matter that they meet with and worke upon, do dissolve, disgregate and scatter the same, in such sort, as they ingender and procure a new appetite. To come now unto those who sleepe upon their thirstinesse, they be not the pores which by their transformation allay thirst, but by reason that they receive humiditie from the fleshie parts, and are filled with a vapourous moisture from thence: and as for vomits, in casting up one thing which is adverse to nature, they give her meanes to enjoy another which is friendly and familiar thereto: for thirst is not a desire so much of an exceeding great quantitie of moisture, as of that which is kinde and familiar; and therefore, although a man have within him great abundance of that moisture which is unnatural, yet neverthelesse, he wanteth still; for that his thirst giveth place to no other humiditie, but unto that which is proper and naturall, and whereof it is desirous: neither cometh mans bodie into a good temper againe, before such time as that humiditie be removed and gone, which was enemy to nature; and then the waies and passages receive willingly that moisture which is friendly and familiar unto her: as to the ague before said, it driveth indeed the moisture inwardly into the center (as it were) of the bodie; for when the middle thereof is all on a fire, thither runneth and retireth all the humiditie, where it is thrust together and retained; and by reason that there is such store thereof, pressed and pent in, it falleth out often times, that many being sicke of the ague, do cast and vomit it up, for to be discharged thereof, and be exceeding thirstie withall, for want of moisture, and for the driness that is in other parts of the bodie, which call for humiditie: when as then the fever either declineth or hath intermission, so as the ardent heat within, is gone from those interior parts in the center and middle of the bodie, the moisture returneth againe into the outward habit, it spreadeth (I say) and is dispersed thorowout, according to the naturall course thereof; so as at once it bringeth ease to the parts within, and withall, causeth the flesh and skin without, to be smooth, soft and moist, whereas before it was rough, hard and drie; yea, and many times it moveth sweats; whereby it cometh to passe, that the want which before caused thirst, now ceaseth and is gone, while the moisture is returned from the place wherein before it was streightly pressed and kept in, unto that which is desirous and hath need of it, and where it is at large and more at libertie: for like as in an orchard or garden, although there be a pit containing plentie of water, unlesse a man draw some out of it, and therewith water the ground, it can not chuse but the herbs, plants and trees will be as one would say, athirst, and at a fault for nourishment; even so it fareth in our bodies; if all the moisture be gotten to one place, no marvell if the rest do want and become exceeding drie, untill such time as it run againe, and that there be a new diffusion thereof; like as it falleth out with those who are sicke of an ague, when the fit is past, or the fever hath left them, and to those who sleepe upon thirst; for in these, sleepe bringeth backe the moisture from the center and middle of the bodie, distributing it to all the members and parts thereof, and so maketh an equall distribution and supply thorowout.

But this transformation and change of the pores from which it is said that hunger and thirst doth proceed; what kinde of thing is it I would gladly know? For mine owne part, none other differences see I, but of more and lesse, and according as they be either stopped or opened; when they bee obstructed or stopped, receive they cannot either drinke or meate; when they be opened and unstopped, they make a void and free place; and surely that is nothing els but the want of that which is proper and naturall: For the reason (my good friend Philo) why clothes which are to be died, be dipped first in alome water, is because that such water hath a piercing, scouring, and absterive vertue, by meanes whereof, when all the superfluous filth in in them is consumed and rid away, the pores being opened, receive more surely the tincture which is given unto the clothes, onely because they receive the same better, by reason of the emptinesse occasioned by want.

THE THIRD QUESTION.

What is the cause that when men be hungry, if they drinke, are delivered from their hunger: but contrariwise, when they be athirst, if they eat, are more thirstie than before?

WHEN those discourses were thus passed; he who invited us to supper, began in this wise: It seemeth unto me (my masters) that this reason as touching the voidance and repletion of pores, carrieth with it a great apparence of truth, and namely in the solution of another question besides, to wit: Why in them who be hungry, if they drinke, their hunger ceaseth immediately? and contrariwise, they who are a thirst, if they eat, are still more thirstie? I am of opinion (quoth he) that those who alledge and urge these pores and their effects, doe render the reason and cause of this accident, very easilie, and with exceeding great probability: however in many points, they enforce the same not so much as probably: for whereas all bodies have pores, some of one measure, and symmetry, others of another; those which be larger than the rest, receive food solid as well as liquid both together; such as be narrower and more streight admit drinke; the avoidance and evacuation of which, causeth thirst, like as of the other, hunger: and therefore if they who be a thirst doe eat, they finde no succour and benefit thereby, because the pores by reason of their streightnesse, are not able to receive drie and solid nutriment, but continue still indigent and destitute of that which is their due, and fit for them: whereas they who be hungry, in case they drinke, finde comfort thereby, for that the liquid nouriture entering into those large pores, and filling those concavities of theirs, doe flake and diminish mightily the force of their hunger.

As touching the event and effect (quoth I) true it is (as I thinke) but I cannot accord and give my consent to the supposition of the cause pretended: For if (quoth I) a man should hold, that with these pores and conduits (upon which some stand so much, so greatly embrace and mainteine so stoutly) the flesh is pierced, and by meanes thereof full of holes; surely he would make it very loose, quavering, flaggie, and so rotten, that it would not hang together: moreover, to say that the same parts of the body doe not receive meate and drinke together, but that they doe passe and runne (as it were) thorough a streiner or canvafe bolter, some one way and some another; me thinks is a very strange position, & a meere devised fiction: for this verie mixture of humiditie, tempering and making tender the meats received, together with the cooperative helpe of the inward naturall heat, and the spirits, doth cut, subtilize, and mince the foode, with all manner of incisions, shreddings, and divisions, no tooles, no knives, nor instruments in the world so fine and small; in such as every part and parcell of the said nourishment is familiar, meet & convenient for each part & member of the bodie; not applied & fitted as it were to certeine vessels and holes to be filled thereby; but united & perfectly concorporate to the whole, and every part thereof: but if this were not so, yet the maine point of the question is not alioiled for all that; for they who eat, unlesse they also drinke to it, are so farre off from allaying their thirst, that contrariwise they increase the same; and to this point there is not yet a word said. Consider now (said I) whether the positions & reasons which we set downe, are not probable & apparent? first we suppose, that moisture being consumed by driness, is cleane perished & gone; & that driness being tempered & softened by moisture hath certeine diffusions, & exhalations: secondly we hold, that neither hunger is a general & universal want of dry food, nor thirst, of moisture, but a certeine scantnesse and defect of the one and the other, when there is not enough and sufficient; for those who altogether doe want the same, bee neither hungrie nor thirstie, but die presently: Let these supposalls be laid for grounds, it will not be from henceforth hard, to know the cause of that which is in question: for thirst increaseth upon them that eat, because meats by their driness doe gather together, sucke and drinke up the humidity dispersed, and which is left but small and feeble, in all the bodie, causing the same to evaporate away; like as we may observe without our bodies, how dry earth and dust, do quickly snatch, dispatch, and consume quite the liquor or moisture that is mingled therewith: contrariwise, drinke necessarily slacketh hunger; for by reason that moisture drenching and foking that little meat which is findeth dry and hard, raiseth from it certeine vapors and moist exhalations, and those it doth elevate and carrie up into all the body, applying the same to the parts that stand in need : and therefore Erasistratus not improperly termed moisture, the wagon of the viands: for being mixed and tempered with such things as otherwife of themselves by reason of their drinckesse or other euill disposition, be idle, and heavy, it raiseth and lifteth up : and hereupon it commeth, that many men who haue bene exceeding hungry, onely by bathing or washing themselves, without any drinke at all, haue wonderfully awaged and allayed their hunger : for the moisture from without, entering into the body, causeth them to be more succulent and in better plight; for that it doth enlarge the parts within, so that it doth mitigate the fell mood, and appeale the cruell rage of hunger. To conclude, this is the reason that they who are determined to pine themselves to death by utter abstinence from all solid meats, live and continue a long time if they receive but water onely, even untill the time that all be quite evaporate, spent 10 and dried up, which might nourish and be united unto the bodie.

THE FOURTH QUESTION.

What is the cause that pit or well-water being drawn, if it be left all night within the aire of the pit, becometh colder than it was?

WHE had a certaine guest who lived delicatly, and loved to drinke cold water; for to please and content whole appetite, our servants drew up a bucket of water out of the pit or well, and so let it hang within the same (so that it touched not the top of the water) all the night long; 20 and so let it hang within the same (so that it touched not the top of the water) all the night long, wherewith he was served the morrow after at his supper, and he found it to be much colder than that which was newly drawn: now this stranger, being a professed scholar and indifferently well learned, told us, that he had found this in Aristotle among other points, grounded upon good reason, which he delivered unto us in this wise: All water (quoth he) which is first heat, becometh afterwards more colde than it was before; like to that which is provided and prepared for kings: first, they set it on the fire untill it boile againe; which done, they burie the pan or vessell wherin it is, within snow; and by this device it proves exceeding colde: no otherwise than our bodies, after that we have bene in the stoupe or baines, be cooled much more by that meanes: for relaxation occasioned by heat, maketh the bodie more rare, and causeth the pores to open, and so by consequence, it receiveth more aire from without, which environeth the bodie, 30 and bringeth a more sudden and violent change: when as therefore water is first chafed (as it were) and set in an heat by agitation and stirring within the bucket whiles it was in drawing, it groweth to be the colder by the aire which environeth the said vessell round about. This stranger and guest of ours, we commended for his confident resolution and perfect memory; but as touching the reason that he alledged, we made some doubt: for if the aire in which the vessell hangeth be colde, how doth it inchafe the water? and if it be hot, how cooleth it afterwards? for beside all reason it is, that a thing should be affected or suffer contrarily from one and the same cause, unlesse some difference come betwene. And when the other held his peace a good space, and stood musing what to say againe: Why (quoth I) there is no doubt to be made of the aire; for our very senses teach us, that colde it is, and especially that which is in the bottome of pits; and therefore impossible it is, that water should be heat by the cold aire: but the truth is this rather, 40 although this cold aire can not alter all the water of the spring in the bottome of the well, yet if a man draw the same in a little quantitie, it will do the deed, and be so much predominant as to coole it exceedingly.

THE FIFTH QUESTION.

What is the reason that little stones and small plates or pellets of lead, being cast into water, make it colder?

YOU remember I am sure (doe you not, said I) what Aristotle hath written, as touching pib- 50 ble stones and flints, which if they be cast into water, cause the same to be much colder and more astringent: And you remember (quoth he) aswell, that the philosopher in his Problems hath onely said it is so; but let us assay to finde out the cause, for it seemeth very difficult to be conceived and imagined: You say true indeed (quoth I); and a marvell it were if we could hit upon it: howbeit, marke and consider what I will say unto it: First to begin withall; doe you not thinke that water is sooner made colde by the aire without, if the same may come to enter into it?

it also, that the aire is of more force and efficacie, when it beatech against hard flints, pibbles or whetstones? for they will not suffer it to passe thorow, as vessels either of bras or earth; but by their compact soliditie, resisting and standing out against it, they put it by from themselves, and turne it upon the water; whereby the coldnesse may be the stronger, and the water thorowout be fully affected therewith: and this is the reason, that in Winter time, running rivers be much colder than the sea; for that the cold aire hath greater power upon them, as being driven backe againe from the bottome of the water; whereas in the sea it is dissolved, and passeth away, by reason of the great depth thereof encountering there nothing at all, upon which it may strike and beat: but it seemeth there is another reason, that waters, the thinner and cleerer they be, suffer 10 the more from the colde aire; for sooner they be changed and overcome, so weake and feeble they are: now hard whetstones and little pibbles, doe lubricate and make the water more thin, in drawing to the bottome where they be, all the grosse and terrestriall substance that trouble it; in such sort, as the water by that meanes, being more fine, and consequently weaker, sooner is vanquished and surmounted by the refrigeration of the aire. To come now unto lead: cold of nature it is, and if it be soaked in vinegar, and wrought with it, maketh ceruse of all deadly poisons, the coldest. As for the stones aforesaid, by reason of their soliditie, they have an inward coldnesse conceived deeply within them; for as every stone is a piece of earth gathered together and congealed (as it were) by exceeding colde, so the more compact and massive that it is, the harder is it congealed, and consequently, so much the colder: no marvell therefore it is, if 20 both plummets of lead and these little hard pibbles aforesaid, by repercussion from themselves, enforce the coldnesse of water.

THE SIXTH QUESTION.

What is the reason that men use to keepe snowe within chaffe, light straw and clothes?

VPON these words, that stranger and guest of ours, after hee had paused a while: Lovers (quoth he) above all things, are desirous to talke with their paramours; or if they can not so doe, yet at leastwise they will be talking of them; and even so it fareth at this time betwene me and snowe; for, because there is none heere in place, nor to be had, I will speake of it; and 30 namely, I would gladly know the reason why it is wont to be kept in such things as be very hot; for we use to cover and swaddle it (as it were) with straw and chaffe, yea, and to lap it within soft clothes, unshorne rugges, and shaggie frize; and so preserve it a long time in the owne kinde, without running to water: A wonderfull matter, that the hottest things should preserve those which are extreame colde! And so will I say too (quoth I) if that were true: but it is farre otherwise, and we greatly deceive our selves, in taking that by and by to be hot it selfe, which doth heat another; and namely, considering that we our selves use to say, that one and the selfe same garment in Winter keeps us warme, and in Summer cooleth us; like as that nourish in the tragedy, which gave sucke unto Antibes children:

*With mantles course, and little blankets warme,
She warme's and coole's her pretie babes, new borne.*

The Almains verily put on garments onely for to defend their bodies against the rigour of cold: the Aethiopians weare them not, but to save themselves from soultie heat: wee in Greece use them for the one purpose and the other; and therefore why should wee count them to be hot, because they warme us, rather than cold, for that they coole us? yet of the twaine, if wee would be judged by the outward sense, wee might repute them rather cold than hot: for when we put on our shirts or inner garments first, our naked skinn findes them cold; and so when we goe into our beds, wee feele the sheetes and other clothes of themselves as cold; but afterwards they helpe to heat us; but how? being themselves full of heat, which commeth from us, 50 they hold in our heat, and withall, keepe off the cold aire from our bodies. Thus you see how they that be sicke of the ague, or otherwise, burne with heat, change continually their linnens and other clothes about them, because ever as any fresh thing is laid upon them, they feele it cold and take comfort therein; no sooner is it cast over them, & lien a while, but it becometh hot, by reason of the ardent heat of their bodies: like as therefore a garment being warmed once by us, doth warme us againe; even so, if it be made cold by snow, it keepeth it cold reciprocally; but made cold it is by snow, for that there ariseth from it a subtil spirit, or vapour which doth it; & the same so long as it abideth within, holdeth it together concrete and solid in the owne nature;

ture; contrariwise, when it is gone, snowe melteth and turneth to water; then that white fresh colour vanisheth away, which came by the mixture of the said spirit & humiditie together, causing a kinde of froth: when as snowe therefore is lapped within clothes, both the cold is held in thereby, and the outward aire kept out, that it cannot enter in, to thaw and melt the substance of the snow thus gathered and congealed together; now to this purpose they use such clothes as have not yet come under the fullers hand, nor bene dressed, buried, thorne, and pressed; and that for the length and driness of the flaggie haire and flocks, which will not suffer the cloth to lie heave and presse downe the snow, and crush it being so spongyous and light as it is: and even so the straw and chaffe, lying lightly upon it, and softly touching it, breaketh not the congealed substance thereof; and otherwise besides, the same lieth close and fast together, whereby it is a cause that neither the coldnesse of the snow within, can breath forth, nor the heat of the aire without enter in. To conclude that the excretion and issuing out of that spirit, is the thing that causeth the snowe to fore-give, to fret, and to melt in the end, is apparent to our outward senses, for that the snow when it thaweth engendreth winde.

THE SEVENTH QUESTION.

Whether wine is to runne thorough a streiner before it be drunke?

Niger one of our citizens left the schooles, having conversed but a small while with a most excellent and renowned philosopher; yet so long, as in that time he had not learned any good thing at his hands, but stollen from him ere he was aware, that, whereby he was offensive and odious unto others; and namely, this bad custome he had gotten of his master, boldly to reprove and correct in all things, those who were in his company: when as therefore we were upon a time with Ariston in his house at supper together, he found fault generally with all the provision, as being too sumptuous, curious, and superfluous; and among other things, hee flatly denied: That wine ought to passe through a streiner before it be powred forth and filled to the table; but he said: It should be drunke as it came out of the tunne, as Hesiodus said, whiles it hath the strength and naturall force, and as nature hath given it unto us; for this manner of depuration and clarifying of it by a streiner, first doth enervate and cut as it were the sinewes of the vigour and vertue, yea and quench the native heat that it hath; for it cannot chuse, but the same will exhale, evaporate, and flie away with the spirit and life thereof being so often filled and powred out of one vessell into another: Again, (quoth he) it bewraich a certaine curiositie, delicacie, and wastfull wantonnesse, thus to consume and spend the good and profitable, for that which is pleasant onely and delectable: for like as to cut cocks for to make them capons, or to geld sowes and make them gualts, that their flesh may be tender, deintie, & (against the nature of it) effeminate, was never surely the invention of men, found in judgement, and of honest behaviour, but of wastfull gluttons, and such as were given over to belly cheere; even so verily they that thus straine wine, doe geld it, they cut the spurres and pare the nailes thereof; if I may be allowed so to speake by way of Metaphor, yea and doe effeminate the same; whiles 40 they are not able either to beare it by reason of their infirmities and weaknesse, nor drinke it in measure, as they should because of their intemperance: but surely this is a sophisticall device of theirs, and an artificiall trick to helpe them for to drinke more, and excuse them for powring it downe to merrily; for by this meanes the force of wine they take away, leaving nothing but bare wine; much like unto those who give water boiled unto sicke & weak folke, who cannot endure to drinke it cold, & yet beyond measure desire it; for the very edge of wine they take off, & looke what strength & vertue was in it, the same they rid away and expell quire: that in so doing they marre it, for ever: this may bee a sufficient argument, that wine thus misused, will not last nor continue long in the owne nature, but turne quickly to be very dregs; it loseth (I say) the verdure thereof presently, as if it were cut by the roote, from the owne mother, which are the lees thereof. Certes in old time they were wont directly to call wine it selfe νινος, that is to saie, Lees: like as we use to tearme a man by a diminutive speech, a soule or an head, giving unto him the denomination of those principall parts onely; and even at this day wee expresse the gathering of the vine fruit, by the verbe νινω: Also in one place Homer called wine δυναμωιον, and as for wine it selfe, it was an ordinary thing with him, to call it αἶμα καὶ ἐρυθρον, that is to say, blackish and redde, not pale and wanne, by often straining and clensing, such as Ariston heere ferret us with: heereat Ariston laughing at the matter: Not so my good friend (quoth he) pale, pale, bloudlesse and discoloured: but that which at the very first sight sheweth it selfe pleasant, milde, and lovely, where as you would have us to ingurgitate and drench our selves with a wine as blacke as the night, thicke, grosse, and dusky, like a darke cloud: the clarifying and purification thereof you condemne, which in truth is nothing else, but the casting up as it were by vomit of all the choler that it had, and the discharging it of that which is heavy, heady in it, able to make men sicke and drunken, to the end that being more light, cheerefull, and lesse cholerick, it might go into our bodies for to be intermingled with us, even such as Homer saith: those worthies and demi-gods, at the warre of Troy, used to drinke: for Homer when he named wine αἶμα, meant not blackish and thicke, but transparent, neat and bright; for having before attributed unto brasse, these epithites, αἶμα, and αἶμα, that is to say, meet for men, & resplendent, he would not have called it αἶμα afterwards, if hee had not meant blacke and dusky by that attribute. Like as therefore, the sage Anacharsis, when he reproved some other fashions among the Greeks, commended yet their char-coales, for that leaving the smoake without doores, they brought the fire into the house; even so you my masters, that are wise men and great scholars, may haply blame us in other respects, if you list: but in case when we have rejected and dispatched away that which was turbulent, cholericke and fustious in wine, we make it then looke cleere, and taste pleasant of it selfe, without any sophistication; if we do not (I say) turne or take off the edge quite, and grinde out all the Steele (as it were) but rather scouring away rust and canker, 20 foubish and glaze it, and so present it unto you for to drinke; what hainous fault (I pray you) have we committed? but you will say (forsooth) it hath more strength in it when it is not thus clarified with straining: and so (by your leave, good sir) hath a franticke, lunaticke, and madde man, when he is in his fits; but after that he is well purged with Ellebor, or by good regiment in diet, brought to be staid, and reduced into his right minde and senses againe, that violent and extraordinary force is gone, but the true naturall strength of his owne, and his settled tempera- 30 ture remaine still in his bodie, together with his right wits; even so this cleansing and clarifying of wine, by ridding away that headnesse which troubleth the braine, and causeth rage, bringeth it to a milde habit and holosome constitution. Certes, for mine owne part, I holde there is a great difference betweene affected curiositie, and simple neatnesse or elegancie: for those women that paint themselves, perfume and besmeere their bodies with costly odours, and balmes, or otherwise glitter in their ornaments of golde, and go in their rich purple robes, are by good right thought to be curious, costly, and wanton dames; but if a woman use the bath, wash her skin, annoint her selfe with ordinary oile, yea, and wear the tresses of her owne haire, disposed and laied in order decently, no man will finde fault with her for it. This distinction in womens dressing and attire, the poet Homer hath elegantly and properly expressed, in the person of Juno, when she dressed and trimmed her selfe, in this wise:

*With pure Ambrosia she fit, her corps
immorall, from all soile
And filth, she cleanses it, then if she did anoint with glibber oile.*

40 Thus fare forth, there is nothing to be scene in her, but carefull diligence and matronlike cleanlinesse; marie when she comes to carquans, chaines, borders, and buttons of gold, when she hangs on herpendant earerings most curiously and artificially wrought, and not staying there, proceeds in the end to take in her hand that enchanting tiffue and girdle of Venus; beleeve me, heere was superfluous sumptuositie, heere was vanitie and wantonnesse in deed, not becoming a wife or dame of honour; semblably, they that colour their wine with the sweet wood of alooe or cinomon, and otherwise give it a tincture and pleasant aromatization with saffron, doe even as much as those who curiously trick up and set out a woman, for to bring her to a banquet, and to prostitute her as a courtesan; whereas they that do no more but purge out of it, the grosse filthinesse, and that which is good for nothing, make it by that meanes pure, holosome and 50 medicinale: for otherwise, if you admitt not this, you may aswell say, that all things that you see heere, is nothing but needlesse superfluitie, and affected curiositie, beginning even at the verie house and the furniture thereof: for why is it (will you say) thus pargetted and laied over with a coat of plaister? why is it open and built with windowes on that side especially, where it may receive the purest aire and freshest windes, or where it may enjoy the light of the sunne tending Westward toward his setting? why are these pots and drinking cups, every one of them rubbed and scoured on every side, so neat and cleane, that they glitter and shine againe, so as a man may see himselfe in them? And ought (good sir) these boules and goblets to be kept cleane without all filth, or sweet without euill sent; and must the wine which we drinke out of them, be full of filthie dregges, or otherwise stained with any ordure and corruption? but what need I runne thorow all the rest? the very workmanship and painefull labour about the wheat whereof our bread heere is made, what is it els (I beseech you) but cleansing and purging? see you not what a doe there is about it before it be brought to this passe? for there must be not onely threshing, fanning, winnowing, riddling, grinding, lifting, fersing and boulding out the branne from the slowre, while it is in the nature of come and meale; but also it requireth to be kneed and wrought, that no roughnesse remaine behind in the dough; so that being thus united and concorporat into a lump of paste, it may be made bread fit for our eating: what absurditie then is there in this, if straining and cleansing of wine ridde it from that feculent and dreggie matter, as if it were 10 course brannes or grosse grounds, especially seeing the doing of it, is not any wife chargeable nor laborious?

THE EIGHTH QUESTION.

What is the cause of that extraordinarie hunger, called Bulimie?

Here is a solemne sacrifice used among us, received by tradition from our ancestors, which the provost or chiefe governour of the city for the time being, performeth at publicke the altar, but other private citizens besides, in their own houses: and this solemnity is called, The banishment of Bulimos, that is to say, of hunger or famine: and the manner is at such a time, for everie master of an house, to take one of his slaves, and when he hath swung him well with weeds of the withie called Chast-tree, to thrust him out of the doores by the head and shoulders, saying withall: Out with \* Bulimos, but come in wealth and health. Now that yeere wherein I was provost, many there were at my sacrifice, invited to the feast; and after we had performed all ceremonies and complements therto belonging, and were set at the table, some question there was moved, first, as touching the vocable it selfe Bulimie, what it should signifie, and afterwards of the words uttered unto the slave when he is driven out; but most of all, of that maladie so called, and of the accidents and circumstances thereof. As for the tearme Bulimos, every man in manner, was of opinion, that it betokened a great and publicke famine, but especially we Greeks of Aeolia, who in our dialect use the letter \*  $\pi$  for  $\beta$ , for we commonly do not say, Bulimos, but Pulimos, as if it were Polylimos or Polilimos, that is to say, a great famine, or a generall famine thorowout the cite: and it seemed unto us, that Bulimie was another thing different from it; and namely, by a sound argument which we had from the Chronicles penned by Metrodorus, as touching the acts of Ionia, wherein thus much he writeth: That the Smyrniens who in old time were Aeolians, use to sacrifice unto Bulrosia, a blacke bull, as an holocaust or burnt offering, which they cut into pieces with the hide, and so burne it all together. But forasmuch as all manner of hunger resembleth a maladie (and principally, this called Bulimie) which commeth upon a man when his bodie is affected with some unkind and unnaturall indisposition, it seemeth that by great reason, as they oppose wealth to poverie, so they set health against sicknesse: & like as 40 the heaving and overturning of the stomacke, a disease when as men are said Nauisui, tooke that name first upon occasion of those who are in a ship, & when they faile or row, fall to be stomack sicke, and are apt to cast: but afterwards by custome of speech, whosoever feele the like passion of the stomacke, and a disposition to vomit, are said nausai, that is to saie, to be sea sicke; even so the verbe Bulimie, and the nounce Bulimos, taking the beginning as is before said, there is come unto us, and signifieth a dogs-appetite or extraordinary hunger. And to this purpose wee all spake, and made a contribution as it were of all our reasons, to make out a common supper or collation: but when we came to touch the cause of this disease, the first doubt that arose among us was this; that they should most be surprized with this maladie, who travell in great snowes: like as Brutus did of late daies; who when he marched with his army from Dyrrhachium to Apollonia, was in danger of his life, by occasion of this infirmity: it was a time when the snowe lay 50 very deepe; in which march he went such a pace, that none of those who had the carriage of victuals overtooke him, or came neere unto him: now when as he fainted for feeblenesse of stomacke, that he now swooned and was ready to give up the ghost; the souldiers were forced to runne in haste unto the walles of the city, and to call for a loafe of bread, unto their very enemies, warding and keeping the watch upon the walles, which when they had presently gotten, therewith they recovered Brutus: whereupon afterwards, when he was master of the towne, hee grievously grievously intreated all the inhabitants, for the courtesie which he had received from thence. This disease hapneth likewise to horses and asses, especially when they have either figges or apples a load: but that which of all the rest is most wonderfull, there is no manner of food or sustenance in the world, that in such a case so soone recovereth the strength, nor of men onely, but of labouring beasts also, as to give them bread, so that if they eat a morsell thereof, bec it never so little, they will presently finde their feet, and be able to walke.

* That is to say, hunger and famine: it seemeth by that which followeth, that they put poverie also before Bulimos, in opposition to health.

Hereupon ensued silence for a while; and then I (knowing well enough, how much the arguments of ancient writers are able to content and satisfie such as are but dull and flow of conceit; but contrarywise unto those that be studious, ripe of wit and diligent, the same make an over- 10 ture and give courage and heart to search and inquire further into the truth) called to minde and delivered before them all a sentence out of Aristotle, who affirmeth: That the stronger the cold is without, the more is the heat within our bodies, and so consequently, causeth the greater colligation of the humours in the interior parts. Now if these humours thus resolved, take a course unto the legges, they cause lassitudes and heavinesse; if the rheume fall upon the principall fontaines and organs of motion and respiration, it bringeth faintings and feeblenesse. I had no sooner said, but as it is wont in such cases to fall out, some tooke in hand to oppugne these reasons; and others againe to defend and mainteine the same: and Soclarus, for his part: The words (quoth he) in the beginning of your speech were very well placed, and the ground surely laid; for in truth the bodies of those who walke in snow, are evidently cold without, 20 exceedingly closed fast and knit together; but that the inward heat occasioned thereby, should make such a colligation of humours, and that the same should possesse and seize upon the principall parts and instruments of respiration, is a bold and rash conceit, and I cannot see how it should stand: Yet rather would I thinke, that the heat being thus kept in, and united together, and so by that means fortified, consumeth all the nourishment; which being spent, it cannot chule, but the said heat also must needs languish even as a fire without fwell; and hereupon it is, that such have an exceeding hunger upon them, and when they have eaten never so little, they come presently to themselves againe; for that food is the maintenance of natural heat: Then Clemenes the physician: This word nausai, that is to say, hunger (quoth he) 30 in the compound Bulimos, signifieth nothing else, but is crept into the composition of it I know not how, without any reason at all; like as in the verbe xyphos, which betokeneth to devour, or swallow downe solid meat, xyphos, that is to say, to drinke, hath no sence or congruities at all; no more than xyphos, that is to say, to bend downward, or fall groveling, hath any thing to doe in the verbe xyphos, that signifieth to rise aloft, or to hold up the head as birds doe in drinking; for surely Bulimos or Bulimie, seemeth not unto me to be any hunger, as many have taken it; but it is a passion of the stomacke, which concurring indeed with hunger, engendreth a fainting of the heart, and an aptnesse to swoone: and even as odors and smells doe fetch againe and helpe those that be in a swoone; so bread doth remedie and recover those who are feeble and faint, by this Bulimia, not for that such have need of sustenance; (for let it be never so little that they take, they are revived and refreshed thereby) but because it fetcheth the spirits againe, 40 and recalleth the power and strength of nature that was going away. Now that this Bulimos or Bulimia, is a faintnesse of the heart, and no hunger at all, appeareth evidently by an accident that we observe in those draught beasts, whereof we spake before, subject to this infirmity; for the smell of figges and apples worketh not in them any defect or want of nourishment; but causeth rather a gnawing in the mouth of the maw, a plucking (I say) and contention in the brim of the stomacke. As for me, on the other side, although I thought these reasons indifferently well alledged; yet I was of opinion, that if I went another way to worke, and argued from a contrarie principle, I could mainteine a probability; and uphold, that all this might proceed rather by way of condensation, than rarefaction: for the spirit of breath that passeth from the snowe in manner of subtile aire, is the most cutting edge, and finest decision or scale, coming 50 from the concretion of that meteor or congealed substance, which I wot not how, is of so keene and piercing a nature, that it will strike thorough, not flesh onely, but vessels also of silver and brasse: for we see that they are not able to containe and hold snowe in them, but when it commeth to melt, it consumeth away, and covereth the outside of such vessels, glazed over with a moist subtile moisture, as cleere as ice, which no doubt the said spirit, breath, aire, or edge, (call it what you will) left behinde it, when it passed through those insensible pores of the said vessels; this spirit then thus penetrative and quicke as a flame, when it limiteth upon their bodies who goe in snowe, seemeth to scorch and singe the superficiall outside of the skine, in cutting cutting and making way thorough into the flesh in manner of fire; whereupon ensueth a great rarefaction of the body, by meanes whereof, the inward heat flying forth, meeteth with the cold spirit or aire without in the superficies which doth extinguish and quench it quite, and thereby yeeldeth a kinde of small sweat or dew, standing with drops upon the outside, and so the naturall strength of the bodie is resolved and consumed: now if a man at such a time stirre not, but rest still, there is not much naturall heat of the bodie that passeth thus away; but when motion by walking or otherwise doth quickly turne the nutriment of the bodie into heat, and withall the said heat flieth outward thorough the skinn thus rarefied; how can it otherwise be, but all at once there should ensue a great eclipse (as it were) and generall defect of the naturall powers? And that true it is, that the same doth not alwaies close, knit, and binde together the bodie, but otherwise melt and rarefie the same, it appeareth manifestly by this experience; that in sharpe and nipping winters, many times plates or plummetts of leade are known to sweat and melt: this observation also, that many do fall into this infirmite called Bulimia, who are not hungrie, doth argue rather a defluxion and dilatation, than a constipation of the bodie; which no doubt in Winter is rarefied by that subtiltie of the spirit, whereof I spake, and especially, when travell and stirring, doth sharpen and subtilize the heat within the body: for being thus made thin, and wearied besides, it flieth forth in great abundance, and so is disperfed thorough the body. As for those figs and apples, it is like, that they do exhale and evaporate such a spirit, as doth subtilize and dissipate the naturall heat of labouring beasts that carrie them: for it standeth by good reason in nature, that as some be revivred and refreshed with one thing, and some with another; so contrariwise, some things do dissipate the spirits in one, and others in another.

THE NINTH QUESTION.

Why the poet Homer to other liquors giveth proper epithites and attributes, and oile onely he calleth moist?

There was a great question also another time: What might the reason be, that there being so many liquors as there are, the poet Homer is wont to adorne every one of the with their severall and proper epithites, and namely, to call milke, white; hony, yellow; and wine, red; but oile alone he ordinarily noeth by an accident common unto them all, and termeth it moist: to which, this answer was made: That as a thing is named, Moist sweet, which is altogether sweet; and Moist white, which is altogether white; (now you must understand, that a thing is said to be such and such altogether, when there is nothing mixed with it of a contrary nature) even so we are to call that Moist, which hath not one jot of drinck mingled among, and such a qualitie doth properly agree unto oile: for first and foremost, the polished smoothnesse that it hath, doth shew that the parts thereof be all uniforme and even thoroughout; and feeble it wheresoever you will, you shall finde it equall in every respect, and one part accordeth with another so, as the whole agreeth to withstand both mixture and colde: besides, to the eie sight it yeeldeth a most pure and cleere mirror to behold the face in; for why? there is no roughnesse nor ruggednesse in it, to dissipate the reflexion of the light; but by reason of the humiditie or moisture thereof, all the light (how little soever it be) doth rebound and returne againe upon the sight: whereas contrariwise, milke alone, of all other liquors, sendeth backe none of these images and resemblances, like as a mirror or looking-glasse doth, for that it hath a great deale of terrestriall substance in it: moreover, of all liquid matters, oile onely maketh the least noise when it is stirred or shaken, for that it is so moist thoroughout; whereas in other liquors, the parts which be hard and earthy, in running, flowing, and moving, do encounter, smite and hit one another, and so consequently make a noise, by reason of their weight and soliditie: and that which more is, it remaineth simple of it selfe, without admitting any mixture or composition with any other liquor whatsoever, for that it is so firme, compact, or fast; and good reason, for it hath no wandering holes here and there, betwene terrene and hard parts, which might receive any other substance within: moreover, all the parts of oile, for that they be so like one unto the other in a continued union, do joine passing well together, however they will not fort with other liquors; and by reason of this tenuitie and continuitie, when oile doth froth or some, it suffereth no winde or spirit to enter in: furthermore, this humiditie of oile, is the cause that it feedeth and nourisheth fire, for maintained it is with nothing that is not moist, and this is the onely liquor that may be burned, as we may see evidently in the wood which we dayly burne; namely, that the aire substance therein, flieth up in smoake; that which is terrestriall, turneth into ashes; and there is nothing but that, which is moist or liquid, that flameth out, burneth light, and is consumed cleane: for why? fire hath no other sustenance to feed upon; and therefore, water, wine, and other liquors, stand much upon a feculent, muddie & earthy matter, which is the cause that if a man do cast them upon a fire or flame, by their asperitie, they disgregate, and by their weight, choke & quench it; but oile, (for that most properly and sincerely it is moist, and by reason also that it is so subtil) soone receiveth alteration, and being overcome by the fire, is quickly inflamed: but the greatest argument to prove the moisture of oile, is this, that a little thereof will spread and go a great way; for neither hony, nor water, nor any other liquid thing whatsover, in so small a quantitie can be dilated and drawn so far as oile, but for the moist part, they are spent and gone by occasion of their siccity: and verily, oile being so pliable and ready to be drawn every way, soft also and glib, is apt to run all over the body, when it is anointed, it floweth and spreadeth a great way, by meanes of the humiditie of all parts which are so moveable, in such sort, as it continueth a long time, and hardly will be rid away, it sticketh and cleaveth so fast: for a garment, if it be dipped and drenched all over in water, will soone be drie againe; but the spots and flaines with oile, require no small adoe to be scoured out and cleaned, for that it taketh so deepe an impression; and all because it is so fine, subtil and exceeding moist: and Aristotle himselfe saith, that even wine also being deliaed with water, if it be gotten into a cloth, is hardly fetched out, for that now it is more subtile than before, and pierceth farther within the pores thereof.

THE TENTH QUESTION.

What is the cause, that the flesh of beasts killed for sacrifice, if it be hung upon a fig-tree, becometh more tender within a while?

Ariston had a cooke commended highly by those who used to sup with his master, for singular skill in his art; and namely, for that among all other viands which he handled and dressed passing well, hee served up a cooke unto the table before us, newly killed and sacrificed unto Hercules, the flesh whereof did eat as short and tender as if he had hung by the heeles a day or two before: and when Ariston said that it was an easie matter so to doe; and that there needed no more, but presently when his throat was cut, to hang him upon a fig-tree, we tooke occasion thereby to search into the cause of this effect: Certes, that there passeth from the figge-tree a sharpe aire and strong spirit, our verie eiesight will testifie; as also the common speech that goeth of a bull, who if he be tied to a fig-tree, how wilde, savage and fell soever he was before, will soone be meeke and quiet, abide to be handled, and in one word, lay downe his furious rage, as if it were cleane daunted: But the principall cause hereof was attributed to the acrimonie and sharpe qualitie of the wood, for the tree is more succulent than any other; inasmuch as the verie figge it selfe, the wood also and the leafe, be all full of juice; also whiles it burneth in the fire, there ariseth from it a bitter biting smoake, very hurtfull to the eies; and when it is burnt, there is made of the ashes a strong leie, very deterlive and scouring, which bee all signes of heat: and moreover, whereas the milkie juice of the fig-tree will cause milke to turne and cruddle, (some say,) it is not by the inequality of the figures of milke, which are comprehended and glewed as it were therewith, namely, when the united and round parts thereof are cast up to the superficies, but for that the foresaid juice by meanes of heat, doth resolve the waterie substance of the liquor, which is not apt to gather consistence and be thickened: moreover, this is another signe thereof, that notwithstanding the juice be in some fort sweet, yet it is good for nothing, and maketh the woofst and most unpleasant drinke in the world; for it is not the inequality thereof, that causeth the smooth parts to gather a crud, but the heat which maketh the cold and cruddie partes to coagulate. A good proove of this we have from salt, which serveth to this purpose, because it is hot; but it impeacheth this interlacing and glutinous binding pretended, for that by nature it doth rather dissolve and unbinde. To come againe therefore unto the question in hand; the fig-tree sendeth from it a sharpe piercing and incisive spirit: and this is it, that doth make tender, and as it were concoct the flesh of the saide foule: and as great an effect should one see, if he had put him in a heape of wheat or such corne, or covered him all over with salt nitre; and all by reason of heat: and that this is true that wheat is hot, may be gathered by the vessels full of wine, which are hidden within a heape of wheat; for a man shall soone finde that the wine will be all gone.

The Proëme.

He Romans have commonly in their mouthes, & Sofius Senecio, the speech of a pleasant conceited man and a courteous, whosoever he was, who when he had supped alone at any time, was wont thus to say: Eaten I have this day, but not supped; shewing thereby, that meales would never be without mirth and good companie, to season the same, and to give a pleasant taste unto the viands. Euenus verily used to say: That fire was the best sauce in the world: and as for salt, Homer called it divine; and most men gave it the name of the Graces; for that being mingled or otherwise taken with most of our meates, it gives a kinde of grace, and commendeth them as pleasant and agreeable to the stomacke. But to say a truth, the most divine sauce of a table or a supper, is the presence of a friend, a familiar, and one whom a man knoweth well; not so much for that he eateth and drinketh with us, but rather because as he is partaker of our speeches, so he doth participate his owne unto us, especially in such reciprocall talke there be any good discourses, and those which be profitable, fit, and pertinent to the purpose; for much babling indeed and lavish speech that many men use at the boord; and in their cuppes, bewraie them their vaine folly, driving them oftentimes into inconsiderate and passionate fits, and to perverse lewdnesse; and therefore no lesse requisite it is, and needfull, to make choise of speeches, than of friends to be admitted to our table: and in this case we ought both to thinke, and also to say,

contrary

contrary unto the auncient Lacedæmonians; who when they received any young man or stranger into their guild-halles, called Phiditia, where they used to dine and suppe in publicke together, would shew unto them the dores of the place and say: Out at these there never goeth word: but we acquainting our selves with good words, and pertinent speeches at the table, in our discourses, are willing and content, that the same should go forth all, and be fet abroad to all persons whosoever; for that the matters and arguments of our talke are void of lascivious wantonnesse, without backbiting, slandering, malice, and illiberall scurrilitie, not befitting men of good education: as a man may well judge by these examples following in the Decade of this seventh booke.

THE FIRST QUESTION.

Against those who reprove Plato, for saying: That our drinke passeth by the lungs.

IT happened one day in summer time, that one of the company where I was at supper, came out with this verse of Alcaeus, which every man hath readily in his mouth, and pronounced it with a loud voice:

Ἦγαν μέλιτος οἶνον, ὃ δὲ ἐστὶν μετὰ τὰς πνεύματι.

That is to say:

Now drinke and wet thy lungs with wine,

For why? the hot Dogge-starre doth shine.

No marvell (quoth Nicias) then, (a physician of the city Niceopolis): if a poet as Alcaeus was, were ignorant in that, which Plato a great philosopher knew not: and yet Alcaeus in some sort may be borne out in saying so, and relieved in this wise; namely, that the lungs being so neere as they are unto the stomacke, enjoy the benefit of the liquid drinke, and therefore it was not improperly said: That they be wetted and soaked therewith: but this famous philosopher by expresse words hath left in writing, that our drinke directly passeth for the most part, thorough the lungs: so that he hath given us no means of any probabilite in the world, to excuse and defend him, would we never to faine, so grosse is his error, and ignorance so palpable: for in the first place, (considering it is necessary, that the drie nourishment should be mingled with the liquid) plaine it is, that there ought to be one common vessell, which is the stomacke, for to receive them both together: to the end, that it might transmit and send into the bellie and panch beneath, the meat well soaked and made soft: besides, seeing that the lungs be smooth and every way compact and solide, how is it possible, that if a man drinke a supping or grewell, wherein there is a little meale or flowre, it should get thorow, and not stay there? for this is the doubt that Erasistratus objected very well against Plato. Moreover, this philosopher having considered most parts of the bodie, and searched by reason, wherefore they were made; and being desirous to know (as became a man of his profession) for what use nature had framed every one, he might have thought thus much: That the wezill of the throat, otherwise called Epiglottis, was not made for nothing and to no purpose; but ordeined for this, that when we swallow any food, it might keepe downe and close the conduit of the winde-pipe, for feare that nothing might fall that way upon the lights; which part no doubt, is woonderfully troubled, tormented, and torne (as it were) with the cough, when any little thing is gotten thither, where the breath doth passe to and fro: Now this wezill above said, being placed just in the middes, and indifferent to serve both passages, when we speake, doth shut the mouth of that conduit or wezand that leadeth to the stomacke; and as we either eat or drinke, falleth likewise upon the winde-pipe that goeth to the lungs, keeping that passage pure and cleere, for the winde and breath to go and come at ease, by way of respiration. Furthermore, thus much we know by experience: That those who take their drinke leasurly, letting it go downe by little and little, have moister bellies than those who powre their liquor downe at once; for by this means the drinke is caried directly into the bladder, passing away apace and with violence, making no stay; whereas otherwise, it resteth longer with the meat, which it soaketh gently, and is better mingled and incorporate into it: but wee should never see the one or the other, if at the first, our drinke and meat went apart, and had their severall waies by themselves, when wee swallow them downe; for wee conjoin our meat and drinke together, sending them both one after another, to the end that the liquor might serve in stead of a waggon, according as Erasistratus was wont to say, for to carrie and convey the meat and the nourishment into all parts.

After

After that Nicias had made this discourse, Protagenes the Grammarian added moreover, and seconded him in this wise, saying: That the poet Homer, first of all other, saw well enough; and observed, that the stomacke was the proper receptacle and vessell to receive our food, as the winde-pipe, which they called in olde time, σπυγξ, to admit the winde and the breath: and hereupon it came, that they used to call those who had big and loud voices, σπυγεσθης, that is to say, wide-throated, meaning by the throat, the winde-pipe, and not the gullet, wezard or gorge: and therefore when he had said of Achilles, charging Hector with his launce:

*Herean him through his* gorge at first,
A speeding wound and deadly thrust.*

A little after he added, and said:

*His* winde-pipe yet he went beside,
And did not in twaine divide.*

He meaneth by σπυγξ, the proper instrument of the voice and conduit of the breath, which he cut not quite in sunder as he did the other, named λαρυγία or λαρυγία, that is to say, the wezard or gullet.

Upon these words, all was hush for a time, untill Florus tooke upon him to speake in the behalfe of Plato: And shall we thus indeed suffer this philosopher (quoth he) to be condemned; when he is not heere in place to answer for himselfe? No (said I) that we will not; but we will joine unto Plato, the poet Homer also, and put them both together; who is so farre off from averting and turning away the liquor from the wind-pipe, that he sendeth both drinke and meat together out of it; for these be his words to that effect:

*There gush't out of his* winde pipe, wine good store,
And gobbs of mans-flesh, eaten new before.*

Unlesse peradventure some one will dare to say, that this Cyclops Polyphemus, as he had but one eye in his head, so likewise he had no more but one conduit for his meat, drinke, and voice; or els mainteine that in this place the poet, by σπυγξ, meaneth the stomacke, and not the winde-pipe or wezill pipe, which hath bene named so, by all men generally, as well ancient as moderne writers: and this cite I not for want of testimonies, but as induced thereto for the truth sake: for there be witnesses enough to depose on Platoes side, and those of good credit and authority: for let Empolis the comical poet go by, if you please, who in his comedie named Colaces, that is to say, Flatterers or Parasites, thus saith:

For why? this rule and precept streightly gave Protagoras: To drinke; that men might have Their lungs well wet and drenched with liquor cleere, Ere that in skie the Dog-starre doth appeere.

And passe-by, if you will, that elegant and sweet conceived poet Eratosthenes, whose words be these:

*With good meere-wine do not forget
The bottome of thy lungs to wet.*

Euripides verily, who in expresse termes writeth thus in one tragedie,

*The wine fough't all the conduit round about,
And so did passe the lung-pipes cleane through out.*

Sheweth evidently, that he was quicker sighted than Erisistratus, and saw further into the thing than he did; for well he knew that the lungs have many pipes in them, and be (as it were) bored thorow with many holes, by which the liquor passeth: for our winde or breath had no need of such conduits and small pipes to send it out; but the lungs were made spongy and full of cavernosities or holes, in manner of a colander or strainer, for liquors, yea, and other matters that go downe together with the liquors: neither is it more unmeet (my good Nicias) for the lungs to transmit and give passage unto meale, or any good thicke growell, than for the stomacke; for our stomacke or gullet is not, as some thinke, smooth and slipperie, but hath a kinde of roughnesse and certaine rugged wrinkles, of which by all likelihood, some small crummes and parcels of our meat doe take holde, and sticking thereto, are not at once swallowed downe, and caried away: but a man is not able indeed to affirme Categorically, either the one or the other; for nature is so wittie and industrious in all her operations, that no eloquence will serve to expresse the same; neither is it possible to explicate and declare sufficiently the exquisit workmanship and perfection of those principall instruments which she useth, I meane those that serve for the spirit or breath and the heat: howbeit, in the favour of Plato I am willing to cite more witnesses, nesses, to wit, Philisition the Locrien, a very auncient writer, and renowned for his excellencie in your arte of physicke; and Hippocrates of Cos: for these men have allowed no other way nor passage for our drinke than Plato hath: and as for the wezill that you stand so much upon, and have in such reputation, Dioscippus was not ignorant of it: but he saith, that about it, the humidity or liquor in swallowing is divided and fevered, and so glideth or slippeth into the winde-pipe; but the meat rolleth into the stomacke, and within the said winde-pipe, there falleth no part of the meat; howbeit the stomacke receiveth together with the dry food some part also of the drinke or liquor mingled among; and this seemeth to stand well with reason: for the wezill is set before the winde-pipe as a fence or liddle, to the end that by little and little, the drinke might gently runne as by a streiner into it, not suddenly and at once with a violence, for feare that if it were in that manner powred in, it would either stop or else fore trouble and impeach the breath; which is the reason that birds have no such flappe or wezill, and nature hath ordered none for them, for they neither draw in by gulpes, nor lappe their drinke, but dipping their bills let it downe softly, and so wet their throat: And thus much may serve for witnesses in the behalfe of Plato. To come now unto reason: First and foremost our very sense doth confirme the same that he hath said: for let the said wezill-pipe be wounded, no liquor will goe downe, but as if a conduit pipe were cut in sunder, we may see all of it to breake forth and run out at the wound, notwithstanding the wezard or stomacke be found and whole: moreover we all know by experience, that upon the malady called Peripneumonia, that is to say, the inflammation of the lungs, there followeth a most ardent thirst, by occasion of drought or heat, or else

some other cause, which with the said inflammation engendreth also an appetite to drinke: furthermore, there is another argument, stronger and more evident than this, namely; that those creatures which have either no lights or verie smal, have no need of drinke, nor desire it; for every part of the body hath a certaine naturall appetite to doe that worke or function, unto which it is ordeined; and looke what creatures so ever have no such parts, neither have they use for them, nor any desire to that operation which is performed by them: In sum, if it were not so as Plato saith; it may seeme that the bladder was made in vaine; for if the stomacke receive drinke as well as meat, & sende it downe into the belly, what needed the superfluitie or excrement of the liquid food, that is to say drinke, any peculiar receptacle or passage by it selfe; for sufficient it had bene to have had one common, as well for the one as the other, to discharge the excrements of both, by one spout as it were into the same draught: but now it is otherwise: the bladder is by it selfe, and the guts apart by themselves; for that the one nutriment goeth from the lungs; the other from the stomacke, parting immediately, and taking their severall waies at the very swallowing. And heerupon it is that in the liquid superfluitie which is wine, there appeareth nothing of the drie, resembling it either in colour or sent; and yet naturall reason would, that if it were mixed and tempered with it in the belly and the gutes, it should bee filled with the qualities thereof, and could not possibly be excluded out of the body so pure and voide of ordure. * Again, it was never known, that a stone hath bene ingendred in the paunch or guts; and yet good reason it were, that moisture there should congeale or gather to a stone as it doth within the bladder; if true it were that all our drinke descended into the belly and the guts, by passing thorough the stomacke onely: but it seemeth that the stomacke incontinently when we begin to drinke, sucketh and draweth out of that liquor which passeth along by it in the wezill pipe, as much onely as is needfull and requisite for it, to mollifie and to convert into a nutritive pap or juice the solid meat; and so it leaveth no liquid excrement at all: whereas the lungs, so soone as they have distributed both spirit and liquor from thence, unto those parts that have need thereof, expell and send out the rest into the bladder: Well, to conclude, more likelihood there is of truth by farre, in this, than in the other: and yet peradventure the truth in deed of these matters lieth hidden still and incomprehensible; in regard whereof, it is not meet to proceed so rashly and insolently to pronounce sentence against a man, who as well for his owne sufficiency, as the singular opinion of the world, is reputed the prince and chiefe of all philosophers, especially in so uncerteine a thing as this, and in defence whereof there may bee so many reasons collected out of the readings and writings of Plato.

THE SECOND QUESTION.

What is meant in Plato by this word κρεσβαίον, and why those seeds which in sowing light upon oxen horns, become hard and not easie to be concocted.

There hath bene alwaies much question and controversie about κρεσβαίον, and Απιδάμ, not who or what is so called (for certene it is, that seeds falling upon ox horns, according to the common opinion, yeeld fruite, hard and not easly concocted; whereupon by waie of Metaphor, a stubborne and stiffo-necked person, men use to tearme κρεσβαίον, and Απιδάμ) but 10 as touching the cause, why such graine or seeds hitting against the horns of an ox, should come to be so untoward: And many times refused I have, yea, and denied my friends to search into the thing; the rather for that Theophrastus hath rendered so darke and obscure a reason, raunging it among many other examples which he hath gathered and put downe in writing of strange and wonderfull effects, whereof the cause is hard to be found; namely: That an henne after that she hath laid an egge, turneth round about, and with a fecture or straw seemeth to purrifice and halow her selfe, and the egge also; that the sea-calfe or seale * consumeth the pinc, and yet swalloweth it not downe; semblably, that staggas hide their horns within the ground and burie them; likewise, that if one goat hold the herbe Eryngium, that is to say, sea-holly in his mouth, all the rest of the flocke will stand still: Among these miraculous effects, Theophrastus 20 (I say) hath put downe the seeds falling upon the horns of an ox; a thing known for certene to be so, but whereof, the cause is most difficult, if not impossible to be delivered. But at a supper in the citie Delphi, as I sat one day, certene of my familiar friends came upon me in this manner, that seeing not onely, according to the common saying:

*From bellie full best counsell doth arise,
And surest plot men in that case devise.*

but also we are more ready with our questions, and lesse to seeke for answers, when as wine is in our heads, causing us to be forward in the one, and resolute in the other; they would request me therefore to say somewhat unto the foresaid matter in question: howbeit, I held off still, as being well backed with no bad advocates, who tooke my part, and were ready to defend my cause; 30 and by name, Euthydemus my colleague or companion with me in the sacred totall dignitie, and Patroclus my sonne in law, who brought forth and alledged many such things, observed as well in agriculture, as by hunters; of which sort is that which is practised by those who take upon them skill in the foresight and prevention of haile; namely, that it may be averted and turned aside, by the blood of a mould-warpe, or linnen ragges, stained with the monethly purgations of women: Item, that if a man take the figs of a wilde fig-tree, and tie them to a tame fig-tree of the orchard, it is a meanes that the fruit of the said fig-tree shall not fall, but tarrie on, and ripen kindly: also that stags weepe salt teares, but wilde bores shed sweet drops from their eies, when they be taken: For if you will set in hand to seeke out the cause hercof (quoth Euthydemus) then presently you must render a reason also, of smallach and cumin; of which, the former, if it be 40 troden under foot and trampled on in the comming up, men have an opinion it will grow and prosper the better; and as for the other, they sow it with curses and all the fowlest words that can be devised, and so it will spring and thrive best. Tush (quoth Florus) these be but toies and ridiculous mockeries, to make sport with: but as touching the cause of the other matters above specified, I would not have you to reject the inquisition thereof, as if it were incomprehensible. Well (quoth I) now I have found a medicine and remedie, which if you do use, you shall bring this man with reason to our opinion, that you also your selfe may solve some of these questions propounded: It seemeth unto me therefore, that it is colde, that causeth this rebellious hardnesse as well in wheat and other corne, as also in pulse; namely, by pressing and driving in, their solid substance, untill it be hard againe; for heat maketh things soft and easie to be dissolved: 50 and therefore they do not well and truly, in alledging against Homer, this versicle:

*Not ripe yett deere,
The yeere, not field,
Doth beare and yeeld.*

For surely those fields and grounds which are by nature hot, if the aire withall afford a kinde and seasonable temperature of the weather, bring forth more tender fruits: and therefore such corne or seed which presently and directly from the husbandmans hands, lighteth upon the ground, ground, entering into it, and there covered, finde the benefit both of the heat and moisture of the soile, whereby they soone sprout and come up; whereas those which as they be cast, do hit upon the horns of the beasts, they meet not with that direct posture or rectitude called Ευθυσία, which Hesiodus commendeth for the best, but falling downe (I wot not how) and missing of their right place, seem rather to have bene flung at a venture, than orderly sown; & therefore the cold comming upon them, either marreth and killeth them outright, or els lighting upon their naked husks, causeth them to bring forth that proveth hard and churlish, as drie as chips, and such as will not be made tender & sidow, without they be steeped in some liquor, as having not bene covered but with their owne bare coats: for this you may observe ordinarily in stones, that 10 those parts and sides which lie covered deeper within the ground, as if they were of the nature of plants, be more firm and tender, as being preserved by heat, than those outward faces which lie ebbe or above the earth; and therefore skilfull masons digge deeper into the ground for stones which they meane to square, worke and cut, as being melowed by the heat of the earth; whereas those which lie bare aloft and exposed to the aire, by reason of the cold, prove hard and not easie to be wrought or put to any use in building: semblably, even corne, if it continue long in the open aire, and cocked upon the stacks or threshing floores, is more hard and rebellious, than that which is soone taken away and laid up in garners; yea, and oftentimes the very winde which bloweth whites it is fanned or winnowed, maketh it more tough and stubborne, and all by reason of cold: whereof the experience, by report, is to be seene about Philippi a citie in Macedonia, 20 where the remedie is, to let corne lie in the chaffe: and therefore you must not thinke it strange, if you heare husbandmen report, that of two lands or ridges, running directly one by the side of another, the one should yeeld corne tough and hard; the other, soft and tender: and that which more is, beanes lying in one cod, some be of one sort, and some of another, according as they have felt (more or lesse) either of cold or of winde.

THE THIRD QUESTION.

What is the cause, that the mids of wine, the top of oile, and the bottome of honie, is best?

MY wives father Mexican, one day laughed at Hesiodus, for giving counsell to drinke wine 30 insultrie, when the vessell is either newly pierced or runneth low; but to forbear, when it is halfe drawn; his words are these:

When tierce is full, or when it draweth low,

Drinke hard; but spare, to mids: when it doth grow.

For that the wine there, is most excellent: For who knoweth not (quoth he) that wine is best in the middle, oile in the top, and honie in the bottome of the vessell? but Hesiodus (forsooth) adviseth us to let the mids alone, and to stay untill it change to the woofe and be lowe; namely, when it runneth low and little is left in the vessell. Which words being passed, the companie there present, bad Hesiodus farewell, and betooke themselves into searching out the cause of this 40 difference and diversitie in these liquors. And first, as touching the reason of honie, we were not very much troubled about it, because there is none in maner, but knoweth that a thing, the more rare or hollow the substance of it is, the lighter it is said to be; as also, that solid, massive, and compact things, by reason of their weight, do settle downward; in such sort, that although you turne a vessell up-side-downe; yet within a while after, each part returneth into the owne place againe; the heave sinks downe, the light floats above; and even so, there wanted no argument, to yeeld a found reason for the wine also: for first and formost, the vertue and strength of wine, which is the heat thereof, by good right gathereth about the middes of the vessell, and keepeth that part of all others best; then the bottome for the vicinitie unto the lees is naught: 50 lastly, the upper region, for that it is next to the aire, is likewise corrupt; for this we all know, that the winde or the aire is most dangerous unto wine, for that it altereth the nature thereof; and therefore we use to set wine vessells within the ground, yea, and to stop and cover them with all care and diligence, that the least aire in the world come not to the wine; and that which more is, wine will nothing so soone corrupt when the vessells be full, as when it hath bene much drawn and groweth low, for the aire entrench in apace proportionably to the place that is void; the wine taketh winde thereby and so much the sooner chaungeth; whereas if the vessells be full, the wine is able to mainteine it selfe, not admitting from without much of that which is adverse unto it, or can hurt it greatly.

But the consideration of oile put us not to a little debate in arguing: One of the companie said: That the bottome of oile was the woorst, because it was troubled and muddy with the leis or mother thereof: and as for that which is above, he said: It was nothing better than the rest, but seemed onely so, because it was farthest removed from that which might hurt it: Others attributed the cause unto the soliditie thereof, in which regard, it will not well be mingled or incorporate with any other liquor, unlesse it be broken or divided by force and violence; for so compact it is, that it will not admit the very aire to enter in it, or to be mingled with it, but keepeth it selfe a part, and rejecteth it by reason of the fine smoothnesse, and continuencie of all the parts, so that lesse altered it is by the aire, as being not predominant over it: nevertheless, it seemeth that Aristotle doth contradict and gainsay this reason, who had observed (as he saith himselfe) that the oile is sweeter, more odoriferous, and in all respects better, which is kept in vessels not filled up to the brim; and afterwards ascribeth the cause of this meliority or betternesse unto the aire: For that (saith he) there entereth more aire into a vessell that is halfe empty, and hath the more power: Then I wot not well (saith I) but what and if in regard of one and the same facultie and power, the aire bettereth oile, and impairth the goodnesse of wine? for we know that age is hurtfull to oile, and good for wine; which age the aire taketh from oile, because that which is cooled continueth still yoong and fresh; contrariwise that which is pent in and stufed up, as having no aire, soone ageeth and waxeth old: great apparence there is therefore of truth, that the aire approaching neere unto oile, and touching the superficies thereof, keepeth it fresh and yoong still: And this is the reason, that of wine the upmost part is woorst, but of oile the best, because that age worketh in that, a very good disposition, but in this, as badde:

THE FOURTH QUESTION.

What was the reason that the ancients Romans were very precise, not to suffer the table to be cleane voided and all taken away; or the lampe and candle to be put out?

Florus a great lover of antiquitie, would never abide, that a table should be taken away empty, but alwaies left some meat or other standing upon it: And I know full well (quoth he) that both my father and my grandfather before him, not onely observed this most carefully, but also would not in any case permit the lampe after supper to be put out, because for sparing of oile, and that thereby none should be wasted vainly. But Eustrophus the Athenian being upon a time a time at supper with us, hearing Florus making this relation: And what good gat they by this (quoth he) unlesse they had learned the cunning craft of Epicarmus our fellow-citizens, who as he said himselfe, having studied a long time how he might keepe his boyes and servants about him, from filching and stealing away his oile, hardly, and with much ado at the last, found this meanes: for presently after that the lampes were put out, he filled them full againe with oile; and then the next morning, he would come and see whether they were still full. This speech made Florus to laugh: But seeing (quoth he) this question is so well solved, let us search I pray you into the reason: Why in old time, as it should seeme, our * ancients were so religious and precise, as touching their tables and lampes: first therefore they began with lampes and lights. And Casernius his sonne in law said: That those ancients as he thought, tooke it to be an ominous matter, and a very abomination indeed; that any fire whatsoever should be put out, for the likenesse and kinned that it had with that sacred fire which is alwaies kept inextinguible: for two waies there be (as I take it) whereby fire (like as we men) may die; the one violent, when it is quenched and put out by force, the other natural when it goeth out & dieth of it selfe: as for that sacred fire, they remedied both the one & the other, in mainteining and looking to it continually with great care and diligence; the other which is common, they neglected and suffered to goe out of it selfe, without any more ado; for so, they themselves quenched it not perforce, nor caused it to die, grudging and envying that it should live, as a beast that doth no good; they passed for it no more, nor made any further reckoning. Then Lucius the sonne of Florus said: That he liked well of all the rest which was said; but as concerning the sacred fire, he supposed, that our ancestors chose it not to reverence and adore, because they thought it more holy or better than others: but like as among the Aegyptians, some worshipped the whole kind of dogs; others, wolves likewise or crocodiles; but they nourished (with any especial respect) but one of every kinde; so to wit, some, one dogges; others, one wolfe, and others againe, one crocodiles; for that impossible it was to keepe them all; even so heere in this case, the vigilant care and devotion which they employed in saving and keeping the sacred fire, was a signe and solemne testimoniall of the religious observance which they carried respectively to the whole element of fire; the reason was, because there is nothing in the world that more resembleth a living creature, considering that it moveth, stirreth, and feedeth it selfe; yea and by the shining light that it giveth, (in manner of the soule) laicth all things open, and maketh them to bee seene; but most of all it sheweth and prooveth the power that it hath, not to be without some vitall feed, or principle, in the extinguishing and violent death thereof; for when it is either quenched, suffocated, or killed by force, it seemeth to give a cry or scricke, struggling as it were with death, like unto a living creature when the life is taken away by violence. And in uttering these words; casting his eyes upon me: What say you (quoth he) unto me, can you alledge any thing better of your owne? I cannot (saith I) finde any fault with you, in all that you have delivered; but I would willingly adde thus much moreover; that this fashion and custome of mainteining fire, is a very exercise and discipline training us to great humanitie: for surely I hold it not lawfull to spoile our meats and viands after we have eaten thereof sufficiently, no more than I doe for to stop or choke up a spring or fountaine after we have drunke our fill of the pure water thereof, or to take downe and demolish the markes that guide men in navigation, or waiting, upon the land, when we have once served our owne turne with them: but these and such like things we ought to leave behinde us unto posteritie, as meanes to do them good that shall come after us, & have need of them when we are gone: and therefore I hold it neither seemely nor honest, to put out a lampe for mechanicall miserie, so soone as a man himselfe hath done withall; but he ought to mainteine & keepe it burning still, that what need soever there should be of fire, it may be found there ready, and shining light out; for a blessed thing it were in us, if possibly we so could, to impart the use of our owne sight, our hearing, yea and of our wisdom, strength and valour unto others for the while, when we are to sleepe or otherwise to take our repose: consider moreover, whether our forefathers have not permitted excessive ceremonies and observations in these cases, even for an exercise and studious meditation of thankfulness, as namely; when they revered so highly the oakes bearing acornes as they did. Certes the Athenians had one fig-tree which they honored by the name of the holy and sacred Fig-tree; and expressly forbid to cut downe the * mulberie tree: for these ceremonies I assure you, doe not make men inclined to superstition as some thinke, but frame & traine us to gratitude & sociable humanitie one toward another, when as we are thus reverently affected to such things as these, that have no soule nor sense. And therefore Hesiodus did very well, when he would not permit any flesh or meates to be taken out of the pots or cauldrons for to be set upon the table, unlesse some thing before had gone out of them, for an assay to the gods; but gave order that some portion thereof should be offered as first fruits unto the fire; as it were a reward and satisfaction for the ministry and good service that it hath done: The Romans also did as well, who would not when they had done with their lampes take from them that nourishment which they had once allowed, but suffered them to enjoy the same, still burning and living, by the meanes thereof. After I had thus said: Now I assure you (quoth Eustrophus) hath not this speech of yours made the overture and given way to passe forward to a discourse of the table? for that our ancients thought there should be alwaies somewhat left standing upon it after dinner and supper, for their household servants and children; for surely glad they be, not so much to get wherewith to eat, as to have it in this order communicated from us and our table unto them: and therefore the Persian kings by report, were wont alwaies to send from their owne boord certaine dishes, as a luraion not onely to their friends and minions, to their great captaines and lieutenants under them, to their chiefe pensioners also and squires of the body; but they would have their slaves, yea and their very hounds and dogs to be served daily, and have their ordinary allowance set even upon their table: for their will and meaning was, that whosoever did them any service, & were employed in their ministry, should if it were possible be partakers of their table and fire also: for surely the most fell or savage beasts that bee, are made tame by such communication and fellowship in their feeding. Heereat I could not chafe but laugh: And why then doe we not (quoth he) my good friend, put in practise the old order, and bring abroad the fifth laid up for store, according to the common proverbe, as also the Chenix or measure that Pythagoras so much talketh of, & upon which he forbiddeth a man to sit: giving us thereby a lesson, that wee should learne to leave somewhat for the next day, and on the even to remember and thinke upon the morrow. We Boeotians have this by-word amongst us, common in every mans mouth: Leave somewhat for the Medes: ſince time that the Medes overran and forſeized the whole province of Phocia, and waſted the frontiers and marches of Baria: but ſurely we ſhould have evermore ready at hand this ſaying: Save ſomething alwaies for ſtrangers and gueſts, that may come in unlooked for: And to ſpeake what I thinke; for mine owne part, I milike utterly that hungry table that Achille kept, which evermore was found bare and void: For when as Ulyſſes came embassage unto him, they found no meat at al ſtirring; whereupon he was forced even then to kill ſomewhat, and to dreſſe the ſame out of hand for their ſuppers: Another time alſo being minded to entertaine king Priamus friendly; when he came unto his pavilion:

*He then beſtir'd himſelfe, and caught up ſoone,
A good white ſheepe, whoſe throas he cut anon.*

but about cutting it up, quartering, jointing, ſeething and roſting, he ſpent a great part of the night: whereas Eumais a wiſe ſcholar of as wiſe a maſter, was nothing at all troubled at the ſudden and unexpected comming of Telemachus; but preſently willed him to ſit downe, made him good cheere, ſetting before him platters full

*Of good ſheſh meats, which were of former ſtore,
All ready raſt, and left the night before.*

But if you thinke that to be but a ſmall matter, and lightly to be regarded, yet I am ſure confeſſe you will; that this is not a thing of little importance; namely to refrain and containe the appetite, when as there is enough yet before a man; to provoke and ſatiſfie it, for thoſe who are wont to abſteine from that which is preſent, have leſſe deſire to that which is abſent: Then Zucius added thus much, that he remembered how hee had heard his grandmother ſay: That the table was a ſacred thing: Which if it be ſo (quoth he) there ought no thing that holy is, to be empty; and for mine owne part, I am of this minde: That the table is a representation and figure of the earth; for beſides that, it feedeth us, round it is, and ſtandeth firme and ſure; in which regard, ſome have called it properly, Peſta; and like as we would have the earth to beare and bring forth alwaies ſome thing or other for our profit; ſo we thinke, that we ſhould never ſee the table void, nor left without ſome viands upon it.

THE FIFTH QUESTION.

That we ought eſpecially to beware of the pleaſures which we take in naughtie muſicke, and how we ſhould take heed thereof.

AT the ſolemnity of the Pythicke games, Calliſtratus the ſuperintendent, deputed by the high commiſſion and counsell of State, named Amphyctiones, for to overſee and keepe good order, put backe a certaine miſtrel, who plaid upon the flute, though he were a country man of his and a friend, becauſe he came not in time to preſent himſelfe for to be inrolled among thoſe that were to contend for the prize, which he did according to the ſtatutes and lawes of thoſe games provided in that behalfe: but one evening when he had invited us to ſupper, he brought him forth into the banquet among us, ſet out and adorned in his faire robes and chaplets magnificently, as the maner is to be ſcene at ſuch games of prize, and attended beſides with a goodly daunce and quire of fingers, well and trimly appointed; and I aſſure you, a brave ſhew it was at the firſt entrie, and a pleaſant paſtime worth the ſeeing and hearing: but after that hee had tried and founded the whole companie there met, and perceived many of them how they were inclined, and that for their delight and pleaſure which they preſently tooke, they would be carried away, and ſuffer him to do what he liſt himſelfe; namely, to play laſcivious tunes, and in geſture to repreſent the ſame accordingly; then he ſhewed himſelfe openly, and gave us an evident prooffe and demonſtration; that muſicke will make thoſe more drunke, and diſtemper their braines woofe (who in conſideratly at all times, and without all meaſure exceedingly give themſelves unto it) than all the wine that they can drinke. For now by this time, they could not be content as the were ſet at they table, to houre and hollow with open throat, and withall, to keepe a clapping with their hands one at another; but in the end, the moſt part of them leapt from the boord, and began withall, to daunce and to foot it, yea, and otherwiſe to ſhew diſhoneſt and filthy geſtures, farre unbecoming gentlemen, but yet ſutable to the tunes hee founded, and the ſongs that hee chanted; but afterwards, when they had made an end, and that the banquet (as it were after a fit of furious madneſſe) was come againe to it ſelfe, and better ſetled, Lamprias was deſirous to have ſaid ſomewhat; and rebuked in good earneſt, this miſrule and diſorder of the the youth, but that he feared withall, that he ſhould be thought too rigourous, and give offence unto the companie; untill ſuch time as Calliſtratus himſelfe gave him his hint, and incited him ſo to do, by ſuch a ſpeech as this: For mine owne part (quoth he) even I alſo, do acquire them of intemperancie, the ſimple deſire of hearing muſicke, and ſeeing ſports: howbeit, I am not altogether of Ariſtoxenus opinion, when he ſaith, that theſe be the onely pleaſures that be woorth a whoope, and at the end whereof, a man ſhould ſay, Kαὶ οὕτως, that is to ſay, Oh, well and trimly done! For ſurely, men are wont to attribute ſo much unto certaine daintie meats and ſweet perfumes and ointments, calling them trim and fine, and giving this praife unto them, that they be well dreſſed and conſected; yea, and it is an ordinary ſpeech to ſay: That it is well with us, when we have bene at a delicate and coſtly ſupper. I ſuppoſe alſo, that Ariſtote himſelfe alledged not a ſufficient cauſe, that the ſolace and pleaſure by faire ſights and ſweet muſicke, and generally, the contentment that we have by the eie and the eare, is to be exempted from the crime of intemperancie, becauſe as he ſaith, theſe be the onely delights proper unto man; whereas in all others, brute beaſts do communicate with us, and have the benefit of them: for I ſee that there be manie creatures which have no uſe of reaſon, and yet take pleaſure in muſicke; as for example, ſtags, in flutes and pipes; and at the time when mares are to be covered with ſtallions, there is a certaine ſound of the hautboies and a ſong to it, named thereupon, Hypoboros: and Pindarus ſaith in one place, that he was moved with the ſong,

*Like as the dolphin ſwimmes apace,
Directly forward to that place
Whereas the pleaſant hautboies ſound,
And whence their miſt doth ſome nere bound;
What time, both winds and waves do lie
At ſea, and let no harme.*

And as they daunce, they beare up their heads and eies aloft, as joying in the object which they ſee of others likewiſe dauncing; for they ſtrive to imitate and counterſeit the ſame, ſtirring and wagging their ſhoulders to and fro: I cannot ſee therefore, what ſingularitie by it ſelfe there is in theſe pleaſures, becauſe they onely are reſpective to the ſoule, and others belong unto the bodie, and do ſeize and reſt in the bodie; whereas tunes, meaſures, daunces, and ſongs, paſſing beſides and beyond the ſenſe, doe ſaſten their delight and tickling pleaſure, upon the very joy and contentment of the minde; which is the reaſon that none of theſe delectations are hidden, nor have need either of darkeneſſe to cover them, or of walles to environ, encloſe, and keepe them in, as women are wont to ſay by other pleaſures; but contrariwiſe, built there are for theſe delights of the eie and eare, cirques and races, theaters and ſhew-places; and the greater company that there is with us to ſee or heare any of theſe, the greater joy we take, and the thing it ſelfe is more ſtately: but this is plaine, that deſirous we are, not of a number of witneſſes to teſtifie our intemperance and naughtie pleaſure, but we care not how many ſee our honeſt exerciſes and civill ſports or recreations.

After that Calliſtratus had ended his ſpeech, Lamprias perceiving that thoſe favourers and maintainers of ſuch eaſe ſports, tooke better heart, and became more audacious by theſe words; ſet in hand to ſpeake now in deed as he meant before; in this maner: This is not the cauſe, good ſir Calliſtratus, the ſonne of Leon; but in mine opinion, our ancient forefathers have not done well, to ſay that Bacchus was the ſonne of Oblivion; for they ſhould rather have ſaid, that he was his father; conſidering, that even now by his means you have forgotten, that of thoſe faults and miſdemours which are committed by occaſion of pleaſures, ſome proceed from intemperance; others from ignorance or negligence: for where the hurt and damage is evident, there men (if they ſinne) doe it becauſe their reaſon is forced and overcome by intemperance; but looke where the hire and reward of incontinencie and looſeneſſe doth not directly enſue, nor preſently upon the committing of a fault, there all their delinquencie is to be aſcribed unto ignorance, for that ſuch leaſd acts, they both approve and perpetrate, becauſe they wiſt not what hurt would follow: and therefore ſuch as doe exorbitate and miſgovern themſelves in eating or drinking exceſſively, as alſo in the immoderate uſe of women; which enormities be ordinarily accompanied with many maladies, much expence, decay of eſtate, loſſe of goods and an ill name beſides; we uſually call looſe, diſſolute, and intemperate perſons: ſuch an one was that Theodectes, who being diſeaſed in his eies; whenſoever hee eſpied his ſweet heart whom he kept as his harlot, would ſalve her in theſe tearmes, καὶ οὕτως οὐκ ἔστιν:

*All haile my sweet and lovely light,
T be onely joy of mine eie-light.*

And such another was Anaxarchus of Abdera:

*Who (by report) knew well what miseries
He lived in, but yet his nature was Inclined so to pleasure, which men wise,
And sages dread most part; that he also
Was thereby drawn and caried unto sin,
Out of that way which judgement set him in.*

But those who hold out manfully, and stand upon their owne guards, for feare they bee caught 10 and overcome with the grosse pleasure of the belly, and the parts under it, of taste and of smelling; and yet neverthelesse suffer themselves to be circumvented and surprized by other delights, which secretly forelay them, and lie in ambush, hidden close within their eies and cares; these men (I say) although they be nothing lesse passionate, dissolute, and incontinent than the others, yet we rearme them not so for all that: and why so? because they know not the danger wherein they stand; they runne on headlong through ignorance, thinking they shall bee masters over their pleasures, yea, though they taried at the theater all the long day, from morning to night, to see and heare plaies and other pastimes, without bit of bread or drop of drinke;
as if forsooth an earthen vessell or pitcher should boast it selfe and stand much upon this, that it is not stirred and taken up by the belly or the bottome, and yet easily removed and caried from 20 place to place by the two cares: and therefore Arceflam was wont to say: That it skilled not which way one committed filthinesse; for behind and before, was all one: so that we ought to feare that wantonnesse and pleasure which tickleth us in our cares and eies both: neither are we to thinke a citie impregnable, which having all other gates fast made with strong locks, fortified also with crosse barres, & portcullisses, if the enemies may enter in at one other gate; nor to take our selves to be invincible & unconquered by pleasures, for that we be not caught & taken within the temple of Venus; in case we suffer our selves to be taken in the chappell of the Muses, or else at some theatre: For surely such a passion may overtake and captivate our soule as well here as there, yea, & betake it unto pleasures, for to hale & pull, carie & harie us as they list: and these verily doe infuse and powre into our spirits, poisons more eger and piercing, yea, and in 30 greater varieties, I meane of songs, daunces, muscicall accords and measures, than all those be, which either cooks, confectioners, or perfumers can devise: by the strength whereof, they leade and carie us whither they will, yea, and corrupt us so, as that we cannot chuse but convince and condemne our selves by our owne testimonie against us: For as Pindarus said very well:

*We cannot charge, nor yet blame-worthy binke,
What ever, for our present meat and drinke
The sacred earth to us affordeth bath,
Or sea, with windes, that is so fell and wrath.*

And to say a truth, there is no daintie cates, no delicate viands, fish or flesh; no nor this passing good wine which we drinke, that for any pleasure & contentment which they yeeld unto us, carrieth us to set up any such noises, like as ere while, the found and playing of the flutes did, which 40 filled (I say) not this house onely, but I beleve well, the whole citie, with outcries, utas, clapping of hands, and alarms: and therefore we are to stand in great feare and dread of such pleasures as these; for exceeding forcible they be, and most powerfull, as those who stay not there, as those doe which affect either taste, feeling, or smelling; to wit, in the unreasonable part of the soule, without passing any farther; but they reach unto the very judgement, and discoure of reason: moreover, in other delights and pleasures, although reason should faile and not be able to withstand them, but give over in plaine field: yet there be other passions a good many which will resist and impeach them: for say there be some daintie and delicate fish to be bought and sold in the market; nigardise oftentimes holdeth backe a gluttons fingers from drawing 50 out his purse-strings, who otherwise would bee buse and readie enough to helpe his deintie tooth: covetousnesse likewise otherwhiles turneth away a wanton leacher and whoremaster from meddling with a deare and costly courtesane, who holdes her-selfe at an exceeding high price; like as Menander in one of his comedies bringeth in a pretie pageant of this matter:
for when as a certaine baud had brought unto a banquet where divers youtnes were drinking, and making merrie together, a passing faire wench, younge withall, and trimly set out in every point,

point, for to entice and allure them, they

Cast downe their heads, and like good merry mates, Fell so their junkets hard, and deintie cates.

For when it stands upon this point, that a man must take up money at interest, or els goe without his pleasure; certes, it is a shrewd punishment to bridle his lust and incontinence; for we are not alwaies so willing and ready to lay our hand to our purses: now the eies and cares of such as love musicians and minstrels, and other such gentleman-like sports, and recreations as we call them, satisfie their furious appetites & affections, in founding musick, plaies, & shewes, for nothing and without any cost: for why? such pleasures as these, they may be sped with, and enjoy in many places, at the publicke and sacred games of prize, in theaters, and at feasts, and all at other mens charges; and therefore an easie matter it is to meet with matter enough for to spoil and undoe them quite, who have not reason to governe and direct them. Heereat hee made a pause, and so there was some silence for a while: And what would you have (quoth Cal-listram) this reason, either to doe or say for to succour and save us? for she will not fasten round about our cares, those little cales or bolsters to cover our cares with, which Xenocrates speaketh of, neither will she cause us to rise from the table so soone as we heare a musician to tune his lute or prepare his pipe: No in truth (quoth Lamprias) but looke how often soever as wee fall into the danger of these pleasures, we ought to call upon the muses for to succour us; we must flee into that mountaine Helicon of our ancients: for such an one as is enamoured upon a sumptuous and costly stumper, we cannot tell how to match by and by with a Penelope, nor marrie unto Panthea; but if one take pleasure in bawdy ballades, lascivious songs, and wanton daunces, we may soone divert him from thence, by setting him to reade Euripides, Pindarus, or Menander; and so wash a filthie care, and furred all over with salt (as Plato saith) with a sweet and potable lotion of good sayings and wise sentences: for like as magicians command those who are possessed or haunted with evill spirits, to rehearse and pronounce apart by themselves Ephesian letters, or words for a counter-charme; even so when we are among these vanities, where minstrels play their parts, and moriske dauncers their may-games, fetching their frisks and gait-bols,

*Shaking themselves in furious wise,
With strange allarmes and hideous cries:
Wagging and stinging every way
Their necks and heads all while they play.*

Let us then call to remembrance the grave, holy and venerable writings of those ancient Sages, and conferring them with these sottish sonets, ribaud rimes, and ridiculous reasons, we shall not be endangered by them, nor turne side (as they say) and suffer our selves to be carried away with them downe the streame.

THE SIXTH QUESTION.

40 Of such guests as be named shadowes; and whether he that is called by one, may go unto another to supper; if he may, when, and to whom.

Homer in the second booke of his Ilias, writeth of Menelaus, how he came of his owne accord unbidden, to a feast that his brother Agamemnon made unto the princes and chiefe commanders of the armie:

*For why? he well conceived in his minde,
That * troubled much, his brother he should finde.*

And as he would not neglect and oversee thus much, that either the ignorance or forgetful-nesse in his brother, should be otherwise scene; so he was lesse willing to discover it himselfe in 50 failing for to come; as some froward and peevish persons are wont to take holde of such over-sights and negligences of their friends, being better content in their hearts thus to be neglected, than honoured, because they would have advantage, and somewhat to complaine of. But as touching such as are not invited at all to a feast, nor have no formall bidding (whom now adaies, we call shadowes) and yet are brought in by those who were invited, there arose one day a question, how this custome first came up and tooke beginning. Some were of opinion that Sacrates began it, who perswaded Aristodemus upon a time, being not bidden to goe with him to a feast at Agathons house, where there fell out a pretie jest and a ridiculous; for Aristodemus tooke no

* And therefore might forget his owne brother.

no need when he thither came, that he had left Sorster by the way behinde him, and so himselfe entred before into the roome; which is as much as the shadow before the bodie, and the light coming after: but afterwards, at the feasting and entertainment of friends that are travellers, and passe by as strangers, especially, if they were princes or great governours, because men knew not who were in their traine, and whom they deigned this honour, for to sit at their owne table, and to eat and drinke with them; the custome was to request themselves, for to bring with them whom they would, but withall, to set downe a determinate number; for feare lest they should be so served as one was, who invited to a supper, Philip king of Maedonie, into the countrey: for he came unto his hostes house with a great retinue after him, who had not provided a supper for many guests: Philip perceiving that his friend was hercupon in great perplexitie, and knew not what to doe, sent unto every one of his friends that he brought with him, a servitour of purpose to round them secretly in the eare, that they should fo eat of the viands before them, as that they reserved a piece of their stomacke for a daintie tart or cake that was to come in: by which meanes, whiles they looked evermore when the said dish should come to the table, and did eat more sparily in hope of it, of those meats which stood before them, there was sufficient for them all. But whiles I seemed thus to play upon the point before the company there present, Florus thought good that this question ought to be handled in good earnest, and more seriously; namely, as touching those shadowes abovesaid: Whether it might stand with honesty and good manners, to follow or goe with them who were bidden? As for Cesernius his sonne in law, he utterly condemned that fashion: For a man ought (quoth he) to obey the counsell of

Liciodus, who writeth thus:

Above all others, to thy feast, Invite thy friend who loves thee best.

If not so, yet be sure at leastwise to bid thy familiars and those of thine acquaintance, for to participate with thee in thy sacred libations and thanksgivings to the gods at the table, in discourses there held, in the courtesies passing to and fro; and namely, in drinking one to another: but now a daies it is with men that make feasts, as with those who keepe ferrie-barges or barks to transport passengers; for when they take in men aboard, they permit them to cast into the vessell what fardels or baggage they have besides; for even so, we making a feast for some especial persons, give them leave to fill the place with whomsoever they please; whether they be honest men & of worth or no, it makes no matter. And I would marvell much, if a man of quality, and one that knoweth good manners, would come thus bidden (as it were) at the second hand, which is all one as unbidden, being such an one, as many times the master of the feast himselfe knoweth not; and if he be one of his acquaintance and knowledge, and yet unbidden, surely it were more shame now to go unto his house, as it were, to upbraid him and cast in his teeth, as if he came unto his feast without his good will, and yet would take his part thereof, even by violence and strong hand. Moreover, to go before or tarrie after him, who would seeme to bid one to another mans table, carrieth some shame with it, and would make a modest and honest man dismaied and blanke: neither is it a decent thing to have need of witnesses, and a warrant (as it were) betwene him and the master of the house, to insinuate thus much, that he is come indeed, not as one formally bidden to supper, but as the shadow of such and such a man: besides, to daunce attendance upon another, and observe when he hath bene in the stoupe, is anointed and washed, waiting the houre when he will goe, sooner or later; this in my simple judgement is a very base and mechanicall thing, favouring strongly of the bonfon or parasit Gnaibo, if ever there were such a small-feast as Gnaibo, who haunted mens tables where it cost him naught: furthermore, if there be no time or place, where in a mans tongue may be better permitted to say thus:

*Art thou dispos'd to boast, to cracke and brave

than at a banquet, where commonly there is most libertie allowed and intermingled in all that is done and said, and every thing is well taken, as in mirth; how should a man behave and governe himselfe at such a place, who is not a lawfull and naturall bidden guest indeed; but as a man would say, a bastard and subreptitious crept in, and intruded I wot not how into a feast, without all order of inviting? for say that hee doe speake freely at the boord, or say he doe not, lie open he shall both for the one and the other, to the calumniation of them there present: neither is it a small inconvenience to be made, a mark for scurrile tearmes, and a meere laughing stocke, namely; when a man putteth up, and endureth the base name of a shadow, and will be content to answer thereunto? for I assure you, to make small account of unseemely words, words, is the next waie to leade men unto undecent and dishonest deedes, and to acquaint them therewith by little and little: wherefore when I invite others to a feast or supper unto mine owne house, I allow them otherwhiles to bring their shadowes with them (for the custome of a citie is much, and may not well be broken) but surely, when I have my selfe beene called upon, to goe with others to a place where I am not bidden, I have ever yet denied, and could not for any thing be brought unto it. Upon which words ensued silence for a time, untill Florus began againe in this wise: Certes this second point is more difficult and doubtfull than the other; for when wee are to entertaine strangers that be travellers (as hath beene said before) we must of necessitie invite them in this order: the reason is, because it were 10 incivillitie and discourtesie, to part them and their friends in a strange place, whom they were wont to have about them; and againe, it is no easie matter to know, whom a man hath in his company. See then (quoth I) whether they who have given libertie unto them that make a feast, thus to invite guests, that they may take others unto them (as you say) permit not them also whom they would bring, as their shadowes, to obey, and so to come unto a feast; for it standeth not with honesty, to graunt and give that, which is not meet for to demand or give; nor in one word to sollicite or exhort one to that, whereunto he would not willingly be solicited, either to doe or give his consent: but as for great States and rulers, or strangers travelling by the way, there is no such inviting or choise to be made; for entertained they must be whom 20 soever they bring with them: but otherwise, when one friend feasteth another, it were a more friendly and courteous part, for himselfe to bid the familiars or kinsfolke of his said friend, knowing them so well as he doth; for by this meanes greater honour he doth unto his friend, yea, and winneth more thanks at his hands againe, when the partie invited shall know that he loveth them best, that most willingly he desireth to have their companie, as taking pleasure that they be honored and intreated to come as well, for his sake; and yet for all this, it would otherwhiles be wholly referred unto his discretion that is bidden: like as those who sacrifice unto some one god, doe honour likewise and make vowes unto those who are partakers of the same temple and altar in common, although they name them not severally by themselves, * * For there is neither wine, daintie viands, nor sweet perfumes, that give such contentment and pleasure at a feast, as doth a man whom one loveth and liketh well of sitting by his side or neere

30 unto him at the table: moreover, to aske and demand of the man himselfe, whom one would feast, what viands or what banquetting dishes or pastry works he loveth best; as also to seeke and enquire of the diversitie of wines and pleasant odors he delighted in, were a very uncivill and absurd part: but when a man hath many friends, many kinsfolks & familiars, to request such an one to bring with him those especially whose companie he liketh best, & in who he taketh greatest pleasure, is no absurditie at all, nor a thing that can be offensive: for neither to faile in one ship, nor to dwell in the same house, ne yet to plead in the same cause, with those whom we are not affected well unto, is so displeasing & odious, as to sit at a supper with them against who our heart doth rise; and the contrary is as acceptable: for surely the table is a very communion and societie of mirth and earnest, of words and deeds; and therefore if men would be merry there,
40 and make good cheere, I see no need, that all manner of persons indifferently should meet, but those onely who have some inward friendship, and private familiaritie one with another: as for our meates and fauces that come up to the boord, cooks I confesse doe make them of all manner of sapours, different as they be, mixing them together, and tempering, harsh, sowe, milde, sweet, sharpe, subtil, and biring, one with another: but a supper or feast, is nothing acceptable and contenting, unlesse it be composed of guests who are of the same humour and disposition: and for that, as the Peripateticke philosophers doe affirme, that there is one Primum mobile, above, or principall moover in nature, which mooveth onely, and is not mooved; and another thing beneath, and in the lowest place, which is mooved onely, and mooveth not; but 50 betweene these two extremities, there is a middle nature, that mooveth one and is mooved by another; even so, (say I) there is the same proportion among three sorts of men; the first of those who invite another; the second of such as are invited onely; and the third of them that doe invite others, and are invited themselves: and now because wee have spoken already of the first and principall feast-maker, who inviteth, it were not a misse to say somewhat now of the other two folks: He then who is bidden, and yet hath leave to bidde others; ought in great reason (as I thinke) to be careful and take heed, that he forbear to bring with him a great number or multitude, lest hee should seeme to make spoile of his friends house, as of an enemies territory, and as it were to forage there for all those that belong unto him; or to doe as those who come to occupie and inhabit a new countrey, that is to say, by bringing with him so many of his owne friends, discale, or at leastwise exclude and put by his guests, who invited him, and so by that meanes the masters of the feasts might be served as they are, who set fourth suppers unto Hecate or Proserpina, and to those avertucan gods, or apotropai, whom men call upon, not to doe good, but to avert evill, for they themselves nor any of their house lick their lips with any jot of all that cheere; onely they have their part of all the smoke and troubles belonging thereto: for otherwise they that alledge unto us this common saying:

At Delphi when one hath done sacrifice,

Must buy his owne viands, if he be wise.

speake it but merily and by way of jest; but certainly it befallth even so in good truth and earnest unto those who intertaine either strangers or friends so rude and uncivill, who with a number of shadowes, as if there were so many harpies or cormorants and greedy guls, consumed and devoured all their provision: secondly, a friend that is himselfe solemnly invited, must be careful, that he take not with him, for to goe unto another mans house, those that he first meeteth or that come next hand, but such especially, as he knoweth to be friends, and of familiar acquaintance with the feast-maker, as if he strived a vie to prevent him in bidding of them; if not so, to have those with him, of his owne friends, whom the master of the feast himselfe could have wished and made choise of, to have bidden; as for example, if he be a modest man and a civill, to sort him with modest and civill persons; if studious and learned, to furnish his table with students & good scholars; if he have bene beforetime in authority, to fit him now with personages of power & authority; and in one word, to acquaint him with those, whom he knoweth he would be willing to salute, and entertaine with speech and communication; for this is a wise kinde of courtiesie and great civilitie, to give unto such a personage occasion and meanes, to salute, embrace, and make much of them: whereas hee who commeth to a feast with such about him as have no conformitie at all unto the feast-maker, but seeme meere aliens and strangers; as namely, with great drunkards, to a sober mans house; to a man that is a good husband, wary, and thrifty in his expences, with a sort of dissolute rustians and swaggering companions; or unto a yong gentleman, that loveth to drinke heartily, to laugh, to jest, and to be merie, with grim fires, and severe ancients, such as in their talke are grave, and by their long beards, may be taken for sages and profound clearks; such an one (I say) is a very absurd fellow, thus to requite the hospitall courtiesie of his friend, with such impertinent incongruity: for he that is invited, must be as careful to please the first inviter, as the feast-maker, his guest; and then acceptable shall hee be and welcome indeed, if not himselfe onely, but those also who come with him or for the love of him, be of good carriage and lovely behaviour. As for the third person, who remaineth to be spoken of, to wit, who is bidden and brought in by another; if he take pepper in the nose, and can not abide to be called a shadow; certainly hee is afraid of his owne shadow: but in this case, there would be very great circumspection had; for it is no point of honestie and good manners, to be soone intreated, and ready to follow every one indifferently at his call; considered it would be, and that not slightly, what he is who moveth thee to go with him to such a feast; for if he be not a very familiar friend, but one of these rich magnificoes and portly personages, who would (as it were) upon a scaffold make a shew unto the world of a number of favourites and followers to guard and attend him at his heeles; or such an one as would seeme to doe much for thee, or to grace and honour thee greatly by taking thee in this order with him, thou oughtest flatly to denie him, and refuse such courtiesie: well, say that he be a friend and familiar person, yet must not thou by and by for all that, bee ready and obey, but then onely, when there is some necessarie occasion for to commune or speake with the master of the feast or with the other partie, and that otherwise thou canst meet with no good opportunitie for to doe it; or if he be newly returned from some long voiage, when he hath bene a great time away, or els about to depart, and so seeme (for very good will) desirous of thy companie at supper; or if it appeare that he meaneth not to take with him many, nor those strangers and unknownen, but either thy selfe alone, or some few others of his familiars; or after all these considerations, if thou maiest perceive, that by this occasion and opportunitie of thy companie, he doth practise to contract some beginning of farther acquaintance, friendship and amity, and namely, if he be reputed an honest man, and woorthy to be loved and regarded, who thus is desirous of thy companie, and earnest with thee to go with him; for wicked and leaud persons, the more they seeme to claipe and take hold, and hang upon us, the more we ought to shake them off as burres, or els to leape over them as briars and brambles: nay, admit that they be honest enough, who would have our companie, and

and bring us to a man that is not honest, we ought not to go with them, lest we chance to take poison with honic, that is to say, get the acquaintance of a naughtie man, by the meanes of an honest minded friend: moreover, absurd it is, to goe unto a mans house whom we know not at all, or with whom we never had any manner of dealing and acquaintance, unless he be a personage of great make for singular vertue, as we have before said, or that this occasion may serve as a foundation or ground-woke of some farther love and amitie; for then it were not amisse to be easily intreated, and to go willingly without any ceremoniall complement unto him, under the wing and shadow of another. As for those who be already our familiars, unto such above all others we may be bolde to goe at the motion of another; for by that meanes we give reciprocal libertie and leave unto them for to repaire likewise unto us at the request of others. There was one Philip indeed, a buffon and scurrile jester, who was wont to say: That to go unto a feast, formally invited, was simply more ridiculous, than to come as a shadow by the bidding of another: but in truth, more honourable and pleasant it is for honest men and good friends, to resort unto their friends, who be likewise honest and vertuous, in seasonable time (without being invited or expected) with other friends; for thereby they both reioice the heart of those that enterteine them, and doe honour unto such as bring them: but above all, most undecent it is, to goe unto princes, rulers, rich men and great States, when we are not invited by themselves, but brought by others; for in any case avoid we must, the imputation and note not undeserved, of impudencie, incivilitie, want of good manners, or ambitious insolence.

THE SEVENTH QUESTION.

Whether it be a lawfull and decent thing, to admit minstrell-wenches to a feast, for to play and sing?

In our citie Cheronea, there was held a great discourse one day at the table, where Diogenianus the Pergamian was present, as touching the care-sports which were to be admitted at a banquet; and much adoe we had to defend our selves, and to confute a long bearded philosopher that was there, one of the Stoicks sect forsooth, who alledged against us, Plato, blaming and condemning those who brought into their feasts, minstrell-wenches, to pipe and sing, and to be heard, as if they were not able themselves to enterteine good speeches one with another; and yet present there was, a scholar, out of the same schoole, Philp a Prusian, who said: That such personages were not to be named in this question, who are brought in as speakers at Agathons boord, for that their speeches sounded more sweetly and melodiously, than all the flutes and citrons in the world: no marvell it was therefore, that these minstrels had no audience at such a feast, but rather, that the guests sitting there at the table, forgot not altogether to eat and drinke, for the great pleasure and contentment which they tooke in hearing such discourses. And yet Xenophon was not allhamed to endure in the presence of Socrates, Antisthenes, and other such personages, a pleasant conceited jester named Philippus; no more than Homer to teach men: That an onion was a good sauce to draw on wine: And Plato having inserted in manner of an interlude or comedie within his Banquet, the speech of Aristophanes as touching love: at the last setting as it were the backe doores of the hall wide open, brings in a pageant, fuller of varietie and vanitie than all the rest, to wit, Alciades little better than drunke, crowned with chaplets and garlands of flowers, and marching in a maske or mummerie: then follow the altercations and debates with Socrates as touching Agathon, and that encomiasticall praise of Socrates (O blessed saint Cherites!) that even Apollo himselfe (were it lawfull for to say) if he had entred in place with his harpe ready strung and tuned for to play, the company would have requested him to stay his hand; untill the foresaid speech had bene finished and brought to an end: And did these personages indeed (quoth hee) notwithstanding they had so great grace in their discourses, use nevertheless these pleasant sports and pastimes betwene, garnishing their feasts therewith, and all to make the companie to laugh and be merry? And shall wee being intermingled with persons managing affaires of State, with merchants, occupiers, and with many (it may so fall out) altogether untutored, and somewhat rustically, banish out of our feasts and banquets this amiable delight and pastime; or else rise from the table and be gone, as if we would die from such Sirenes as soone as ever wee seee them comming? It was thought a strange and woonderfull matter in Clitomachus the campion and professour of performing games of priue; that so soone as ever there was any talke begun of love matters, hee would leave the companie and depart: and when a grave philosopher avoideth the sound of the flute, and goeth out of the feast, and as if he were afraid of a minstrell wench, preparing her selfe to sound and sing, putteth on his shoes, and calleth incontinently to his page for to light his torch; shall he not in so doing be thought woorthie to bee hissed at, and laughed of every one, for taking offence, and abhorring these harmelesse pleasures; like as these bettills which flie from perfumes and sweet odors? For if there be any time or place allowed for these disports, it is at feasts and banquets principally: Then (I say) and there are wee to give our minds to such delights; all while we sacrifice unto Bacchus: For mine own part Euripides, howsoever otherwise he pleaseth me verie well, doth not satisfie me heerein, when he ordeineth as touching musick, that transferred it should be from feasts and banquets, unto sorrowes and pensive sadnesse: for in these cases, there would be some good, sober and wise remonstrance at hand (like as a physitian with sicke folke) to helpe al: but otherwise we are to mingle these delights of musick with the gifts of Bacchus, in manner of a sport and recreation: Certes a pretie speech it was of a Lacedemonian, who being at Athens one time, when new tragedies were to be acted, and the authours of them to contend for the best games, seeing the sumptuous furniture and provision of those who were the masters of the revils, and such pastimes, together with the painfull labour in teaching and prompting of parts, and what adoe there was in ordering of the dances and shewes thereto belonging: whiles one strived to goe beyond another: Oh, what a foolish citie is this (quoth he) to imploy so much travell and serious studie in idle plaies and disports! For to say a truth, when we are at our plaies, we must doe nothing else but play, and not to buy so deare (with such cost and dispendes, yea, and with the losse of time, which were better bestowed about other good affaires) an idle sport: marie at the table, when our spirit is sequestred from other busynesse, we may taste a little of such delights, and in the meane while, consider withall, what profit such solace may afford.

THE EIGHTH QUESTION.

What Acroames or Ear-Sports, are especially to be used at supper time?

When these words had passed, the sophister above-said, would gladly have replied againe: but I for to interrupt and stay his speech, began first and said: Nay rather Diogenianus, I thinke it better to consider upon this point; that seeing there bee many care-delights to content our hearing, which of them is most meet and fit? and if you thinke so good, let us referre the matter to this wise man heere in place, and request him to give his judgement: for being as he is, inflexible, and a man subject to no passions, we shall never need to feare that he wil so much trip, as to preferre a thing that is more pleasant, before that which is better. Then he at the request and exhortation of Diogenianus and us, without any delay: As for other pastimes (quoth he) at theaters, exhibited upon the stage and scaffold of plaiers and dauncers, I reject and banish them all; onely I admit one kinde of sport to delight the eare, which not long since came to be taken up at Rome, in feasts and banquets, and it is not yet divulged abroad in every place: For you know well (quoth he) that among the dialogues of Plato, some there be which containe a continued narration, of a thing done or said, others againe consist of certain devised personages, talking and discoursing together: of these personall dialogues, those that be easiest; children use to learne, and con them without booke, together with expressing the gestures agreeable to the qualitie, manners, and nature of the persons, who are feigned and brought in; a confirmation also and framing of the voice, yea, and a countenance and disposition every way answerable to the words that they pronounce: this manner of pastime hath bene wonderfully well accepted among grave persons, and men of honour; but such as bee effeminate or have daintie & delicate eares, by reason that they are rude, illiterate, and ignorant what is good and honest; and who, as Aristoxenus was wont to say, will be ready to cast up their gorge, and vomit yellow cholour, when they heare any good harmony, mislike them and would not abide the hearing: and I would not marvell verily, if they reject and condemne them utterly, being so possessed with womanish deintinesse. Philip then perceiving some there in place, not to take these words well: Stay there (quoth he) my good friend, and forbear in this wise to raile upon us, for we were the first, who were offended with this manner and fashion, when it began at Rome, yea, & was reprooved those who would have Plato serve the turne, for to make folke merry at the boords; and laboured all they could, that *Plato*s dialogues forsooth should bee rehearsed and heard, amid tartes, march-paines, comfitures, and sweet perfumes: considering considering, that if some verses of Sappho, or Anacreons odes should be rehearsed: Me thinks I ought for very shame and reverence, set the cup downe out of my hand, if I were about to drinke: many more things to this effect I have in my head, which I am afraid to utter for feare I might be thought of purpose to make head, and to dispute against you: and therefore to this friend heere of ours, together with the cup as you see, I give the charge, for to with a salueth eare (as they say) with potable liquor of pleasant speech: then Diogenianus receiving the cuppe at his hand: But (quoth hee) I heare no other yet but all good sober speeches; so that it seemeth that the wine doth not worke in our heads, nor overcome our braines; and I feare mee, that I my selfe shall bee capitulated and articked against; howbeit, if I must speake to my minde, I am of opinion, that many of these matters which are presented unto our eares, for to tickle and please them, ought to bee cut off; and namely, tragedies above all others, as being a thing (iwis) not very well befitting a feast, for that it speaketh in too grave and bafe a voice, representing besides, such arguments and acts, as moove the hearers to pitie and compassion. I reject also, out of our daunces, that which is called Pyladon, as being over-stately, and too full of pompe, exceeding pathetical besides, and requiring many persons and actours: but if we may admit any of those country kinds, which Socrates recounteth, when he speaks of daunces, I receive that which is called Babylonian, which of it selfe beareth a lower port, and soundeth much like to the rusticke daunce, called Cordax, or resembling Echo Pan, or some Satyre dancing amorously and wantonly with Cupid: as for the comedie, that which was called Petus, that is to say, the ancient kinde first used, it sorteth not well with the table, nor would be acted before men when they be drinking and merrie; in regard of the inequality thereof: for that earnestnesse and libertie of speech, used in those glancing digressions, called megealos, is too free and over vehement; also, the facilitie and readinesse to scoffe, flout and jibe, is too full and common, over-broad and plaine besides, full of undecent and dishonest verbs, and as full of filthy and lascivious nownes. Moreover, like as at the feasts of great princes and potentates, there standeth alwaies waiting by every one of them that sit at the boord, a cuppe-bearer, to give him drinke when he calleth for it; even so there had need to be some Grammarian or other at hand continually, for to expound ever and anon, the meaning of divers termes used in these comedies; to wit, what signifieth in Eupolis the poet, this word Lalmodias; also, what the poet Plato meanes by Cinefus, in his comedies; and what is meant by Lampon, in Cratinus; likewise one or other for the purpose, to give the hearers to understand, who they be whom the actours let flie their scurrile scoffes at: so that by this meanes, our feast must be like a Grammar schoole, or els all the frumps and mocks that be flung and discharged, will light in vaine, and lose their grace, for want of being understood. But to come unto the new comedie, what should a man say any thing of it but this, that it is so incorporate in feasts and banquets, that a man may better make a supper without wine, than without Alexander? for why? the phrase or manner of speech in these comedies is sweet, pleasant, and familiar, the matter such, as neither can be despised of the sober, nor offensive to the drunken; besides, the vertuous and contentious sayings therein, delivered in simple and plaine tearmies, runne so smooth, that they are able to soften and make pliable evrie way; the stiffest and hardest natures that be, by the meanes of wine, like as barres of yron in the fire, and to reduce them to humanitie. To be short, the temperature thoroughout of mirth and gravitie together, is such, as it seemeth that this comedie was devised first for nothing els, but both to pleasure and profit those who had taken their wine liberally, and were now well disposed to mirth: moreover, even the amorous objects therein presented, are not without a singular use and benefit, for those who being already set in an heat with wine, are within a while after to goe to bed and sleepe with their wedded wives: neither shall you finde among all his comedies, as many as he hath written, any filthy love of a young faire boy; and as for the deflowing of young maidens and virgins, about which there is such adoe in his comedies, they ordinarily doe end in marriages and all parties be pleased. As touching the love of harlots and professed courtesans, if they be proud, disdainfull and presumptuous queanes, certainly our wanton affection that way, is well cooled and danted, by certaine chastisements or repentances of young men, who are represented in these comedies, to come againe unto themselves, and acknowledge their follies; but as for those kinde harlots, which are of good natures, and for their parts doe answer againe in true love, either you shall have in the end their owne fathers found, who may provide them husbands, or els there is some measure of time set out for to gage their love, which at the last after a certaine revolution and course run, turneth unto civill and bashfull behavior. I know well, that all these matters and observations, unto those who are otherwise occupied and busied in affaires, be of no importance; but at a table, where men are set of very purpose to be merrie and to solace themselves, I would wonder, if their dexterity, delight, and good grace, doth not bring with it some amendment and ornament into the minds and conditions of those who take heed unto them, yea, and imprint a certaine zeale and emulation, to frame and conforme themselves unto those that be honest and of the better sort.

At these words, Diogenianus paused a while, were it for that he had made an end of his speech, or to take his winde, and breathe himselfe a little: and when the fopfisher beganne to replice and came upon him againe, saying, that in his opinion there should have bene some places and verses recited out of Aristophanes. Philip speaking unto me by name: This man (quoth he) hath his desire satisfied, now that he hath so well recommended his friend Menander, in whom he taketh so great delight, and in comparison of whom, he seemeth to have no care nor regard at all of any other: but there remaine yet, many other matters, which wee are wont to heare for our pleasure, which hitherto have not bene examined; and yet very willing I am, to heare some discourse of the: as for the pretty works of imagers, who cut out & grave in small living creatures, if it please this stranger here & Diogenianus, we will put over the controversie & the decision thereof untill to morrow morning, when we are more sober. Then began I to speake, and said: There be yet, other kinde of sports and plaies, named Mimi, of which, some they call Hypotheses, as it were mortalities and representations of histories; others, Paggia, that is to wit, ridiculous fooleries; but neither of them both, doe I take meet for a banquet; the former, both because they require so long time in the acting, and also, for that they require so costly furniture and preparation; the other, are too full of ribaudry, of filthy and beaulty speeches, not well becoming the mouthes of pages and lackies, that carry their masters slippers and pantofles after them, especially, if their masters be honest and wife men: and yet many there are, who at their feasts, where their wives sit by their sides, and where their young children be present, cause such foolish acts and speeches to be represented, as trouble the spirits and disorder the passions of the minde more, than any drunkenesse whatsoever. But for the play of the harpe, which is of so great antiquitie, and ever since before Homers time, hath bene a familiar friend and companion with feasts, and alwaies entertained there, it were not meet nor honest for to dissolve that ancient friendship, and of so long continuance; but we would request those minstrels that play and sing to the harpe, to take out of their songs those dolefull plaints, dumps, and sorrowfull lamentations, which be so ordinary in them, and to chaunt pleasant ditties and fresh galliards, meet for those who are met to be merrie and jocund. Moreover, as touching the flute and hautboies, they will not be kept out, do what a man will, from the table; for if we do but offer our libations, by powring our wine in the honour of the gods, we must needs have our pipes, or els all were marred, yea, and chaplets of flowers upon our heads; and it seemeth that the gods themselves doe sing thereto and accord: moreover, the sound of the flute doth dulce the spirits, it entrench into the eares with so milde and pleasant a tune, that it carrieth with it a tranquillitie and pacification of all motions, even unto the soule, in such sort, that if there did remaine in the understanding and minde, any grieft, any care or anxietie, which the wine had not dissolved and chased away, by the gracious and amiable noile thereof, and the voice of the musician singing thereto, it quieteth it, and bringeth it asleepe: provided alwaies, that this instrument keepe a meane and mediocritie, so that it move not the soule too much, and make it passionate, with so many tunes and notes that it hath, at what time as the laid soule is so drenched and wrought soft with wine, that it is ready to be affected therewith: for like as sheepe and other cattell, understand not any articulate language of a man, carrying a sense and understanding therewith; howbeit, with certaine whistles or chirps, done by lips or hands, or with the sound of some pipe or shell, the shepheards and other herdmen can tell how to raise them, or make them lie downe and couch; even so, the brutish part of our soule, which hath no understanding, nor is capable of reason, may be appeased, ranged and disposed as it ought to be, by songs and sounds, by measures, tunes and notes, as if it were charmed and enchanted by them: but to speake what I thinke, this is my conceit, that neither sound of flute, nor lute and harpe, by it selfe, without mans voice and song to it, can make merrie the companie met together at a feast, so much as a good speech, well and properly fitted; for so we must accustom our selves in good earnest, to take our principall pleasure and delight in speech, as to spend the most part of that time in discourse and communication: as for song and harmony, we are to make (as it were) a sauce to our speech, not to lick them up and swallow them downe alone by themselves: for like as no man will reject and refuse the pleasure that cometh by wine & viands taken for the necessitie of our nouriture, and bringing therewith commoditie

of our health; but that which entrench by sweet feasts and perfumes is not necessarie, but superfluous & delicate, Socrates sent away (as it were) with a box of the eare; even so we ought not to heare the sound of a flute or plalterie, which striketh and beareth upon our eares onely, but if it follow or accompanie our speech, which doth feast and exhilarate the reason that is in our soule, we may well admit and receive the same. And verily, for mine owne part, I thinke, that the reason why in old time Apollo punished that presumptuous Marsyas, was this, that when he had closed up his mouth with his pipe and muzzel together, he presumed to contend and strive (having nothing but the bare sound of the naked flute) against him, who together with the sound of the harpe, had the song also and musicke of the voice: let us therefore in this one thing especially, beware and take heed, that in the companie of those men, who by their speech and learned discourses are able to delight and pleasure one another, we bring not in any such thing to enter in at their eares, which may be an impeachment and hinderance rather of their delight, than a delectation it selfe: for not onely they be foolish and ill advised, as Euripides saith:

*Who having of their owne at home enough themselves to save,
Will seeke els where, and from abroad, their remedie to have.*

but also, that they being provided sufficiently of meanes in themselves, to make their recreations of, and to solace their hearts, labour neverthelesse all that ever they can, to have their delights from others. For the magnificence of that great king of Persia, wherewith he meant to entertaine Amalides the Lacedæmonian, seemed (I assure you) very grosse, absurd and impertinent, namely, when he dipped and wet a chaplet of roses, saffron, and other odoriferous flowers, intermingled together, in a precious oile, and so sent it unto him, doing injurie by that meane to the flowers, and utterly quenching and marring that native beautie and fragrant sweetnesse of their owne; seembly, no lesse absurditie it were, when a feast hath mirth and musicke enough in it selfe, to goe about for to enchant and encharme it with other minstrellie from abroad, and so for a strange and borrowed delight, to bereave the guests of their owne and proper, and as one would say, change the principall for the accessorie. I conclude therefore, that the fittest season for such amusement and occupying of the eares is, when the feast beginneth a little to grow turbulent, and to fall into some contentious debate and braule, by heat of opinionative arguing, for to alay and quench all, that it breake not out, to opprobrious tearmes; or to repress a disputation, which is like to passe the bounds of reasoning, and to grow unto an unpleasant and fopfish alteration; yea, and to stay all litigious wrangling and vehement invectives, becoming rather pleas at barre, or the orations in the publicke hall of a city, untill such time as the banquet be reduced into the former calme and tranquillitie.

THE NINTH QUESTION.

That to consult at the table, while men are drinking wine, was an ancient custome among the Greeks as well as Persians.

Nicostratus upon a time invited us to a supper; and when we were set, there arose some speech as touching certaine matters, upon which the Athenians were the morrow after to sit in counsell, and to debate in a generall assemblie of the citie: now, as one of our companie cast out this word, and said: This is the Persian fashion, my masters, thus to consult and holde a counsell at the board. And why Persian rather than Grecian (quoth Glaucias) for a Grecian I am sure he was, that said:

Tas eis auto masins, boudi zi qum aqumov.

That is to say,
From bellie full, best counsell doth arise,
And surest plots men in that case devise.

And Greeks they were, who under the conduct of Agamemnon held Troy besieged; who as they were eating and drinking together,

The good old Nestor first began, Wisely upon the point to lean.

who also was himselfe the author of this meeting, and advised the king to invite his nobles, and the principall captaines of the armie to a dinner, for to sit in counsell in these tearmes:

Sff 3

Make

*Make now a feast, I you advise my lord,
And bid your auncient peeres; who when as boud
They be all set; make who gives counsell best,
Obey his need, and see therein your self.*

And therefore the most nations of Greece which were ruled under the best lawes, and most constantly retained their auncient ordinances and customes, laid the first foundation of their government and counsell of State upon wine: for those guilds and societies in Candy, which they called Andreia, as also the Phiditia in Sparta, were instituted and held for privie counsels and assemblies of senators; like unto that, if I be not deceived, which even in this citie heere of Athens goeth under the name of Prytanion, and Thestrotbesion; and not farre different from these, in that night assemble of the principall personages, and most politicke States-men whereof Plato speaketh in his books, unto which he referreth the causes and affaires of most importance, which require greatest consultation: those counsellors of State also in Homer:

*Who offer wine to Mercurie,
the last of others all,
It has time as now, bed-time it is,
and them to sleepe doth call.*

doe not they I pray you joine wine and words together? when they are about therefore to depart, and retire themselves into their bed-chambers, the first thing that they do, is to make their prayers, and powre out their libations of wine, unto the wisest God of all others, as if he were present with them, and their superintendent to oversee them: but they who were indeed the most auncient of all others, called even Bacchus himselfe * Eubulus, as if they had no need at all of Mercurie, and in regard also of him, they attributed unto him the name of * Euphrone.

THE TENTH QUESTION.

Whether they did well who sat in consultation at the table?

WHEN Glaucias had spoken these words, we all thought that these turbulent and litigious debates had bene well appeased and laid asleepe; but to the end that they might so much the rather die and be buried in oblivion; Nicofratrus provided another question and said: At the first (quoth he) I made no great matter of this custome, nor regarded it much, taking it to be a meere Persian fashion; but now seeing it is discovered to be an order also among the Greeks, requisite and necessarie it is to render some reason thereof, for to defend it against an evident absurditie, which at the first sight presenteth it selfe; for that the discourse of reason in manner of the crie, is hardly to be governed by us, and untoward for to be brought to performe her worke in a great quantitie of moisture, and the same as yet stirring and waving: and besides, all odious griefes, which on every side appeere and come forth to wine, like as snakes, lizards, and such like serpents, are brought to light and shew themselves to the sunne, cause the minde to be wavering, inconstant, and irresolute: as therefore a bed or pallet is better than a chaire, for them that are disposed to drinke and make merry, for that it containeth the body at full, and exempteth it from all maner of motion; even so the best way is, to keepe the soule quiet and in repose altogether; and if that may not be, to do by it as men doe by children that can rest and stand on no ground, but be evermore stirring; namely to give unto it, not a sword or a javelin, but a rattle or a ball, like as Bacchus putteth into the hands of drunken folke the ferula balke (a most light weapon and instrument either to offend or defend withall) to the end that as they be readie to strike, so they might be least able for to hurt: for the faults that bee committed in drunkenness ought to passe lightly in mirth, and go away with a laughter, and not to be lamentable tragical, and bringing with them great calamities. Moreover, that which is the chiefe and principall thing in consultation of great affaires, to wit, that hee who for want of wit and knowledge in the world, should follow the opinion of those who are of great conceit, deepe judgement, and long experience, this meanes wine bereaveth us of; inasmuch as it seemeth hereupon to have taken the name avos in Greeke; because as Plato saith, it causeth them drinke it freely, * avos, that is to say, to have a good conceit and weening of themselves, as if they were very witty and wise: for how ever they take themselves to be eloquent, faire, or rich, as ordinarily they doe all of them; yet they esteeme better of their owne wit and wisdom, dome, than of any thing else: and this is the reason that wine is talkative and full of words; it filleth us with lavish speech, and the same unseasonable; yea, it maketh us to have a marvellous good opinion of our selves in each respect, as if we were woorthy to command and prescribe unto others, more meet to be heard than to heare, and fitter to leade and goe before, than to follow & come after: But (quoth Glaucias then) an easie matter it is for any man to collect and alledge much tending unto this point, considering how evident and plaine the thing is: it were good therefore to heare a discourse to the contrary, if haply any person, young or old, will stand up in defence of wine. Then our brother, full cunningly and sliely, like a crafty sophist: Why (quoth he) thinke you that any man is able so presently and upon a sudden to devise and 10 speake unto the question in hand, all that may be said probably thereto? And why (quoth Nicofratrus) should not I so thinke, considering for many learned men in place, and those who love wine well enough? at which word the other smiled and said: Are you in deed sufficient, even in your owne conceit, to discourse upon this point before us, and yet indisposed, and altogether unable to consider upon State matters, and affaires of government, because you have taken your wine well? and is not this all one, as to thinke that he who hath drunke freely, seeth well enough with his eies, and howsoever he heareth not perfectly with his eares those whom hee speaketh and talketh with, yet for all that he hath the perfect hearing of those who either sing or play upon the flute? for as it is likely, and standeth to great reason, that good and profitable things should affect and draw the outward senses more unto them, than those which are 20 gaudie onely and fine; even so no doubt, such matters make the minde also more intente: and if a man for that he hath plied his drinking overmuch, cannot haply comprehend well the difficult subtilties of some high points in philosophic, I nothing marvell therat; but if the question be of matters and affaires of State, great likelihood there is, that if he be called away thereto, he should gather his wits more close together, and be more vigorous; like as Philip king of Macedonia, who having plaid the foole, and made himselfe ridiculous at Cheronea, after the battell there, both in word and deed, upon his liberrall drinking, presently assoone as hee fell to treatie of peace and articles of agreement, hee compoised his countenance to gravitie, knit his browes, and cast behinde him all vaine fooleries, wanton gestures and unseemly behaviour, and so gave unto the Athenians a sober, discreet, and well advised answer. And verily one thing it is to drinke well, and another thing to be starked drunke: such as be so farre gone and overseene with drinke, that they know not what they do or say, ought as we thinke, to take their beds and sleepe; as for those who have taken their wine in deed too much, and be scarce sober (howbeit, otherwise men of wit and understanding) we shall never need to feare that they will faile in judgement, yea, and forget their experience, considering that we daily see these dancers, singers and minstrels performe their parts no worse at feasts, for all their liberrall drinking, than in the publicke theaters: for the skill and knowledge, whereof they have gotten the habit, is evermore so present and readie with them, that it maketh their bodies active and nimble, able to performe those parts and functions directly, yea, and to answer the motions of the minde accordingly with confidence. Many there be also, in whose heads and hearts 40 wine so worketh, that it putteth into them an assured boldnesse and resolution, which helpeth them much to the performance of any great actions, and the same is nothing insolent and outrageous, but milde and gracious. And thus we read of Aeschylus the poet, that he endited and wrote his tragedies when he was thorowly set in an heat with wine; in such sort, as that they all were conceived by the influence of Bacchus, and not as Ovidius saith, that one of them, and namely, the greatest (intituled, The seven prizes before Thebes) was begotten (as it were) by Mars. For wine being of power to enchaife the bodie and minde both, according as Plato saith, causeth the bodie to be perspirable, quicke and active, opening all the pores and passages thereof, giving way unto the fantasies and imaginations easily to runne forth, drawing out together with them, the assurance of reason and boldnesse of speech: for you shall have men, whose invention naturally is good enough, in whom (when they be sober and fasting) the same is colde, timorous, and in manner frozen; let them once be well plied with wine, cup after cup, you shall see them evaporate and smooke out, like as frankincense doth by the heat of fire. Furthermore, the nature of wine, chafeth away all feare, which is as contrarie unto those who sit in consultation, as any thing in the world; it quencheeth also, many other base and vile passions, such as mallice and rancour; it openeth the double plaies and folds of the minde, displaying and discovering the whole disposition and nature of a man, by his very words; yea, it hath a vertue to give franke and liberrall speech; and consequently, audacie to utter the truth; without which, neither ther experience nor quickenesse of wit availeth ought : for many there be, who putting in practice, and making use of that which commeth quickly into their heads, speed better, and have greater successe, than those who warily, cautelously, and with much subtiltie, seeme to conceale and keepe in that which presenteth it selfe unto them, and be very lateward in delivering their opinion : we are not therefore to feare wine in this regard, that it stirreth up the passions of the minde; for it inciteth not the worst, unless it be in the wickeddest men, whose counsell is at no time sober: but as Theophrastus was wont to call barbars (hoppes, drie bankets without wine; even so, there is a kind of winelesse drunkenesse, and the same, fowre and unpleasant, dwelling continually within the mindes of men that be vicious and without good bringing up; troubled and vexed alwaies with some anger, with grudge, malice, envie, emulation, contention, or illiberal basenesse; of which vices, wine abating the edge of a great part, rather than sharpening them, maketh men not forth fooles, and blockish dolts, but ready and apt, and yet circumspect, cautelous, and wary; not supine and negligent in matters concerning their profit; but yet indoltrous, and making choise of that which is good and honest: but such as tearme wily-craftinesse, by the name of fine wit, and take erroneous opinion and mechanickall nigardie, for wisdom, may even aswell and with as good reason say, that as many as when they be drinking at the table, speake their mindes roundly, and utter with libertie what they thinke, be senselesse fooles: but contrariwise, our ancients called Bacchus, Endeides and Amor, which is as much to say, as Deliverer and Freer; being of opinion, that there was to be ascribed unto him, a great part of divination, not for that he was furious, raging & mad, as Euripides said, but because he delivereth the minde, and freeth it from all servile feare, diffidence and cowardise, giving us freedome and libertie to speake the truth, and use franknesse of speech one to another.

* avos that is, a wit and prudent counsellor.
* avos that is, inventive or confident.

* Wine of weening.

The Proëme.

Hey that chase philosophie out of feasts and banquets (Sofism Senecio) do not the same, but worke farre, than those who take away the light from thence; for that when the lampe is gone, such persons as be made temperate and well disposed, will be nothing the worke therefore, making as they doe, more account of a reverent regard, than of the mutual sight one of another: whereas, if rudenesse, ignorance and leaudnesse be joined with wine, the very golden lampe of Minerva, if it were there, could not possibly make the feast or banquet lovely, gracious, modest, and well ordered: for that men should feed and fill themselves together in silence, without a word saying, were the fashion that favoured very much of stil swine at their drasse, and perhaps a thing impossible: but whosoever reserveth speech in a feast, and withall, admitteth not the wife and profitable use thereof, is more worthy to be laughed at, than he who thinketh verily, that guests should be ever eating and drinking at a supper, but not filletth unto them, wine undelaied, unseasoned, and which is meere of it selfe; or setteth before them, viands unseasoned, without salt or sauce, and the same not cleanly dressed; for that there is no meat or drinke so unfavorie, unpleasant and hurtfull, for want of good and orderly handling, as words carried unseemly, and without discretion, at a banquet: which is the reason, that philosophers when they reproove drunkenesse, call it a doting by wine; and surely, this dotage is no other thing, but raving or vaine, foolish and undiscreet using of words: now when disordinate babling and foolish talke, meeteth once with wine in a banquet, it can not chuse but the issue thereof will be reprochfull contumelie, insolencie, brainicke follie and villanie, which of all others, is a most unpleasent end, and farthest from all mufes and graces: and therefore it is no foolish ceremonie and absurd fashion, which the women in our countrey observe at their feasts called Agronia, where they make semblance for a while, as if they sought for Bacchus, being fled out of the way, but afterwards give over seeking, and say that he is gone away, and run to the mufes, and there lurketh, and lieth hidden among them: and anon, when supper is ended, they use to put forth darke riddles, and propose questions one to another, hard to be solved: the mysterie whereof, teacheth us thus much, that both we, ought at the table, to use such speech as doth containe some good learned speculation and erudition; and also, that when those discourses are joined with wine and drunkenesse, then they be the mufes who hide and cover all furious outrage and enormitie, which also is willing to be deteined and kept by them.

THE FIRST QUESTION.

As touching those daies which are enabled by the nativitie of some renowned persons; and withall of that progenie or race which is said to be derived from the gods.

This book then, which is the eighth in order of our symposiaques or discourses at the table, shall containe in the first place, that which not long since we chanced to heare and speake, that day whereon we celebrate the feast of Platoes nativity: for having solemnized the birth day of Socrates upon the sixth of February; the morow after, which was the seventh of that month, we did the like by Plato; which gave us occasion, and ministred matter first to enter into a discourse fitting the occurrence of these two nativities; in which Diogenianus the Pergamian, began first in this manner: Ion the poet (quoth he) said not amisse of fortune, that being as he was, different from wisdom in many things, yet she brought forth effects not a few like unto her; and as for this, it seemeth that she hath caused it to fall out very well and fitly, and not without some skill, (raih though she be otherwise) not only for that these two birth-daies jumpe so nere one unto the other, but also because, that of the master who was of the twaine more ancient, commeth also in order before the other. Whereupon it came into my head also to alledge many many examples of occurrents happening likewise at one and the same time; and namely, as touching the birth and death of Euripides, who was borne that very day whereon the Greeks fought the navall battell of Solanis at sea with the king of Perſia, and whole fortune it was to die the same day that Dionys the elder tyrant of Stelle was borne; as if fortune of purpose (as Timæus saith) had taken out of the world a poet, who represented tragicall calamities, the very same day that she brought into the world the actour thereof. Mention also was made of the death of king Alexander the Great, which fell out just upon the same day that Diogenes the Cynicke philosopher departed this life: and by one generall voice accorded it was, that king Attalus left his life, the very day that hee celebrated the memoriall of his nativitie: and some there were who said, that Pompey the Great died in Aegypt, the same day of the yere that he was born; though others affirmed that it was one day sooner: semblably, there came into our remembrance at the same time Pindarus, who being borne during the solemnitie of the Pythicke games, composed afterwards many hymnes in the honour of that god, for whom those games were solemnnized. Then Florus said, that Carnæus was not unworthy to be remembered upon the day of Platoes nativitie, considering he was one of the most famous pillars that supported the schoole of Academics; and both of them were borne at the festivall times of Apollo; the one in Athens, what time as the feast Thargelia was holden; and the other, that very day when as the Cyrenians solemnnized it, which they call Carnæ; and both of them fell out just upon the seventh day of Februarie; on which day you my masters, who are the prophets and priests of Apollo, doe say that himselfe was borne, and therefore you call him Hedamagenes: neither doe I thinke, that they who attribute unto this God, the fatherhood of Plato, doe him any dishonour, in that he hath begotten and provided for us a physician, who by the meanes of the doctrine of Socrates, even another Chiron, cureth and healeth the greater infirmities and more grievous maladies of the soule. Moreover, it was not forgotten, how it was held for certeine, that Apollo appeared in a vision by night, unto Ariston the father of Plato, and a voice besides was heard, forbidding him expressly not to lie with his wife, nor to touch her for the space of ten moneths. Hereupon Tyndares the Lacedæmonian seconded these words, and said, that by good right we were to sing and say thus of Plato:

*He seemed not the sonne of mortall might;
Some god for fire, he may avouch by right.*

I howbeit, for my part, I am afraid, that to beget repugneth no lesse with the immortalitie of the deitie, than to be begotten; for surely, even the act of generation, implieth also a mutation and passion: and king Alexander the Great signified no lesse one time, when he said, that he knew himselfe principally to be mortall and subject to corruption, by having companie with a woman, & by his sleep: for that sleepe is occasioned by a relaxation proceeding from feebleness: and as for all generation, performed it is by the passage of some portion of ones selfe into another; and to much therefore is lost & gone from the principall: and yet on the other side, I take heart againe, and am confirmed, when I heare Plato himselfe to call the eternall God, who never was borne nor begotten, Father and Creatour of the world, and of other things generable; not that God doth engender after the manner of men, by the meanes of naturall seed; but by another power doth ingenerate and infuse into matter, a vertue generative, and a principle, which altereth, moveth, and transmuteth the same:

For even by windes that female birds inspire, Conceive they be, when they to breed desire.

Neither doe I thinke it any absurditie, that a god companying with a woman, not as man, but after another sort of touching & contraction, and by other meanes, altereth and replenisheth her, being a mortall creature, with divine and heavenly seed: And this is (quoth he) no invention of mine: for the Aegyptians hold that their Apis is in that manner engendred by the light of the moone, striking upon his dam, whereby she is conceived; and generally they admit thus much, that a god of the male sex, may deale with a mortall woman: but contrariwise, they thinke not that a mortall man is able to give unto any goodesse the beginning of conception or birth; for they are of opinion, that the substance of these goddesses, consisteth in a certeine aire, and spirites, yea and in certeine heats and humors.

THE SECOND QUESTION.

How Plato is to be understood, when he saith: That God continually is exercised in Geometry.

After these words, there ensued some silence for a while; and then Diogenianus beginning againe to speake: How thinke you masters (quoth he) are you contented & well pleased, considering that we have had some speech already of the gods, and that on the day wherein we solemnize the nativitie of Plato, that we make him partaker also of our conference, and take occasion thereby, to consider upon what intention and in what sense he hath said, that God continually practiseth Geometry, at leastwise if we may presuppose and set down, that he it was who was the author of this sentence: Then said I: Written it is not in any place of all his bookes; howbeit, held to be a saying of his, and it favoureth much of his stile and maner of phrase. Whereupon Tyndares immediately taking the words out of his mouth: Thinke you (quoth he) Diogenianus, that this sentence covertly and in mysticall teames, signifieth any darke subtiltie, and not the very same, which Plato himselfe hath both said and written in praising and magnifying Geometry, as being the thing which plucketh those away who are fastened unto sensible objects, and averteeth them to the consideration of such natures, as be intelligible and eternall; of the contemplation whereof is the very end of philosophie, even as the view and beholding of the secret sacred things, is the end of religious mysteries: for the naile of pleasure and paine, which fasteneth the soule unto the bodie, among other mischiefs that it doth unto man, worketh him this displeasure as it should seeme aboveall, that it causeth sensible things to be more evident unto him, than intellectuall, and forceth his understanding to judge by passion more than by reason: for being accustomed by the sense and feeling of extreame paine, or exceeding pleasure of the body, to be intentive unto that wandring, uncerteine, and mutable nature of the bodie, as seeming a thing subsistent, blinded he is, and loseth altogether the knowledge of that which is essentiall indeed, and hath a true being, forgoing that light and instrument of the soule, which is better than ten thousand bodily eies, and by which organe alone, he might see the deitie and divine nature: for so it is, that all other sciences which we name mathematicall, as in so many mirrors, not twining and warping, but plaine, smooth, and even, there appeere the very tracts, prints, and images of the truth of things intelligible: but Geometry especially which Philo calleth the mother citie, and mistress commanding all the rest, doth divert and gently withdraw by little and little, the minde purified & clesed from the cogitation of sensittive all things: and this is the reason that Plato himselfe reprooved Eudoxus, Architas, and Menæchmus, who went about to reduce the duplication of the cube or solide square into mechanicall instruments, and artificiaall engines, as if it had not bene possible, (if a man would set unto it) by demonstration of reason to finde out and comprehend, two middle lines proportionall; for he objected unto them: That this was as much as to destroy and overthrow the best thing in Geometry, when by this meanes they would have her turne backe againe unto sensible things, and keepe her from mounting up aloft, and embracing those eternall and incorporall images; upon which God being continually intentive, is therefore alwaies God.

After Tyndares, Florus a familiar friend of his, and one who made semblant alwaies by way of sport and gave it out in word, that he was timorous of him: Well done of you (quoth hee) in and that you would not have this speech to be your owne, but a common saying of every man, and that you would seeme to argue and prove, that Plato sheweth how Geometry is not necessary for you would seeme to argue and prove, that Plato sheweth how Geometry is not necessary for the gods, but for men: for God hath no need of any mathematicall science, as an engine or instrument to turne him from things engendred, and to bring about and direct his intelligence and understanding unto those that be of an eternall essence: For why? In him, with him, and about him they be albut take heed rather, & see whether Plato hath not covertly under these dark words lipt and signified somewhat that is pertinent and proper unto you, which you have not marked and observed, in that hee joineeth Lycurgus with Socrates, no lesse than Pythagoras, as marked and observed, in that hee joineeth Lycurgus with Socrates, no lesse than Pythagoras, as Diocarymus was of opinion: for Lycurgus as you know very well, chased out of Lacedæmon, arithmetically proportion as a popular thing, turbulent and apt to make commotions; but hee brought in the Geometricall, as befitting the civill and modest government of some few wise sages, and a lawfull roialtie and regall dominion: for the former giveth equally unto all according to number; but the other unto every one, by reason and with regard of desert and worthinesse; this proportion (I say) maketh no confusion of all together, but in it there is an apparent discretion and distinction between the good and the bad, dealing alwaies unto every one their owne, not by the balance or los, but according to the difference of vice and vertue: God therefore useth this proportion, and applieth it unto things: and the same it is (my good friend Tyndares) which is called Dice and Nemesi; teaching us there by, that we ought to make of justice, equalitie, and not of equality, justice; for the equalitie which the common sort seeketh after, and is indeed the greatestt injustice that may be, God taketh out of the world, and as much as possibly may be, observeth that which is fit and meet for every one according to desert and worthinesse, going heerein Geometrically to worke, by reason and law defining and distributing accordingly.

When we had praised this exposition and interpretation of his, Tyndares said: That he envied such commendation, exhorting Autobulus to set against Florus, to confute him, and correct that which he had delivered. That he refused to do; howbeit, he opposed and brought forth a certeine opinion and conceit of his owne: Thus it is (quoth he) Geometrie is not a speculative skill of mens manners and behaviour, nor yet occupied about any subject matter whatsoever, but the symptomes, accidents, and passions of those extremities or termes which accomplish bodies: neither hath God by any other meanes framed and made the world, but only by determining or making finit that matter which was infinit in it selfe, not in regard of quantitie, greatnesse, and multitude; but for that being as it was, inconstant, wandering, disorderly, and unperfect, our auncients were wont to call it infinit, that is to say, undetermined and unfinished: for the forme and figure is the terme or end of every thing that is formed and shapen; the want whereof made it of it selfe to be shapelesse and disfigured: but after that numbers and proportions come to be imprinted upon the rude and formelesse matter, then being tied and bound (as it were) first with lines, and after lines, with superficies and profundities, it brought forth the first kinds and differences of bodies, as the foundation and ground-woke for the generation of aire, earth, water, and fire: for impossible it had beene, and absurd, that of matter so wandering, so errant, and disorderly, there should arise equalities of sides, and similitudes of angles, in those solide square bodies, which were called Octaedra and Eicosaedra, that is to saie, with eight and twentie baces: likewise in pyramidals and cubes, unless there had been some worke-man to limit, ordeine, and dispose every thing Geometrically; thus a limit or terme being given unto that which was infinit; all things in this universall world, composed, ordered, and tempered accordingly in excellent manner, were first and made, and are made now every day; notwithstanding the said matter striveth and laboureth daily to returne unto her infinit estate, as very loth and refusing to be thus geometrized, that is to say, reduced to some finit and determinate limits; whereas reason on the contrarise, restraineth and comprehendeth her; distributing her into divers Ideas, from which all things which are ingendred, take their generation and constitution.

He had no sooner thus said, but he requested me to contribute somewhat also of mine owne unto this discourse and question in hand: but I for my part, commended highly their opinions, thus delivered, as being naturally and directly devised by themselves and their owne proper inventions, saying withall: That they caried with them sufficient probabilitie: But for that (quoth I) you should not be displeased and offended with your selves, nor altogether have your eie abroad and looke unto others, listen and heare what meaning and interpretation of the said sentence, was most approoved unto our masters and teachers: for there is among the propositions, or positions rather, and theoremes geometrically, one above the rest, to wit; When two formes or figures are given and put downe, to set a third thereto, equall to the one, and semblable to the other; for the invention whereof, it is said, that Pythagoras sacrificed unto the gods: for this Theorem without all doubt is more gallant, witty, and learned, than that, by which he did demonstrate, and proove that the slope line *Hypotenus*a, avaieth as much as the two laterales, which make a right angle in a triangle: Well said of you (quoth Diogenamus) but what serveth this for the matter now in question? You shall understand soone (quoth I) in case you will call to memory that division in Timaeus, whereas the philosopher made a tripartite distribution of those principles, whereby the world had the beginning of generation; of which, the one he called by a most just name, God; the second Matter; and the third Forme or Idea: So the matter of all subject things is most difordinate; the Idea of all mouldes and patterns, most beautifull; but God of all causes simply the best: Thus would not he admit, or leave any thing, as farre forth as possibly might otherwise be, infinit and undeterminate; but adorne nature with proportion, measure, and number, making of all subjects one thing, in quantitie quantity equall to the matter, & in quality semblable to the forme, setting therefore before him this proposition, having already twain a third to it he made, doth make and preserve for ever, equal to the matter, & semblable to the forme, to wit, the world; which being alwaies in regard of that inbred necessitie of a bodie, subject to generation, alteration, & all kinds of passion, is aided and succoured by the creatour and father thereof, who determineth the subsistence by reason of just proportion, according to the image of the patron, whereby the pourprife and circuit of this universall world is more beautifull, being thus vast and great, than if it had beene lesse and competent.

THE THIRD QUESTION.

What is the reason that the night is more resonant or resounding than the day?

As we sat at supper one evening in Athen; with Ammonius, we heard a great tumult & nois which rang all the house over, of people in the street without, crying aloud; Capitaine, capitaine: now was Ammonius then the third time prator or capitaine of the cite: Hee sent forth immediately some of his men about him, to see what the matter was; who presently appeased the hurly, and dismissed those who had raised this outcry: upon which occasion wee in the meane while entred into question: Why those who are within house heare them very well that cry without; but they that are abroad heare not so easily those within, crying as loud? Ammonius incontinently made answer and said, that this question had already beene solved by Aristotle in this wise: For that the voice of those within being once gotten forth and flowen into a wide place of much aire, vanishest away, and is dissipated immediately; whereas the voice of them without, when it is entred in, doth not the like, but is retained and kept close, and so by consequence more easie to be heard: But there is another thing (quoth hee) which requireth rather to have a reason rendred thereof; namely: Why in the night season all voices doe resound greater than in the day time, and besides the greatnesse, are more cleere, distinct, articulate, & audible? For mine owne part (quoth he) I am of this minde, that the divine providence hath in great wisdom ordeined, that our hearing should be more fresh and quicke, when as our sight serveth us in little or no stead at all; for seeing that the aire of the night which according to Empedocles,

*Wandereth alone, and solitary,
And doth blind eyes about her carry.*

is obscure and darke, looke how much defect it maketh in our sight, so much it supplieth and requiteth in our eares: but for that of things also which necessarily are done by nature, the causes ought to be fought out, and the proper & peculiar office of a philosopher and naturalist, is to busie himselfe in seeking after the materiall causes, & instrumentall principles; which of all you will first come forth with some probable reason, as touching this matter? whereupon there being some pause & silence for a time, Boetius said thus: VVhen I was my selfe a yong man, and a student, I made use otherwhiles of those principles which are in Geometrie called Positions: and certeine propositions I supposed as undoubted truthe, without any need of demonstration: but now will I use some of those which heere tofore have beene proved by Epicurus, as for example: Those things which be, are caried in that which is not, nor hath any being: for much vacuities or voidnesse there is stored as it were, and intermingled among those atomes or indivisible little bodies of the aire, which when it is spread abroad in spacious capacities, and by reason of the raritie and thinnesse thereof, runneth too and fro round about: there be a number of small, void, and emptie places, among those little motes or parcels scattered here and there, and taking up the whole region: but contrariwise, when they are pent in, and a restraint and compression made of them, being thrust together into a little space; these small bodies being huddled perforce one upon another, leave a large void space, to vague and range abroad: and this doth the night by reason of cold; for heat doth loosen, disgregate, scatter and dissolve all thicke things, which is the reason why those bodies which either boile, thaw, or melt, occupie more room: contrariwise, such which gather, congeale, and beefrozen, come together close, and be united, leaving an emptie place in those vessels wherein they were contained, and from which they be retired: The voice therefore coming among, and lighting upon many of these bodies thus scattered and dispersed thicke everie where, either is drowned altogether at once or disgregated and broken as it were in pieces, or else intercepted with many impeach-

ments to withstand and stay it: but where there is a space void, and wherein there is not a bodie, it having a free and full course, and the same not interrupted, but plaine and continued, cometh so much the sooner unto the eare, and together with that swiftnesse, retaineth still the articulate, expresse, and distinct sound of every word in speech: for you see how emptie vessels, if a man knocke upon them, answer better to every stroke, and carrie the sound and noise a great way off; yea, and many times they yeeld a sound that goeth round about, and continueth a good while, redoubling the noise; whereas let a vessell be filled either with solid bodies, or els with some liquor, it is altogether deafe and dumbe, if I may so say, and yeeldeth no sound againe; for that it hath no place nor way to passe thorow. Now among solid bodies, gold and stone, because they be full and massie, have a very small and feeble sound, that will be heard any way, and that little which they doe render, is soone gone: contrariwise, brasse is verie vocall, resonant, and (as one would say) a blab of the tongue; for that it hath much emptinesse in it, and the substance or masse thereof, is light and thinne, not compact of many bodies, huddled together, and thrust one upon another; but hath soison and plentie of that substance mingled together, which is soft, yeelding and not resisting the touch or the stroke, which affordeth easinesse unto other motions, and so entreteining the voice gently and willingly, sendeth it untill it meet something in the way which stoppeth the mouth; for then it staith and ceaseth to pierce any further, because of the stoppage that it findeth. And this is it (quoth he, in mine opinion) that causeth the night to be more resonant, and the day lesse; for that the heat in day time which dissolveth the aire, causeth the intervalles betwene the atomes or notes above said, to be the smaller: this onely I would request, that no man here doe oppose himselfe to contradict the premises and first suppositions of mine: Now when as Ammonius willed me to say somewhat, and replie against him: As touching your formost supposals, friend Boerhus (quoth I) about the great emptinesse, let them stand, since you will have it so; but whereas you have set downe, that the said emptinesse maketh much for the motion and easie passage of the voice, I like not well of that supposition; for surely, this qualitie not to be touched, smitten, or made to suffer, is rather proper unto silence and still taciturnitie; whereas the voice is the striking and beating upon a sounding bodie; and a sounding bodie is that which accordeth and correspondeth to it selfe, moveable, light, uniforme, simple and pliable, like as is our aire; for water, earth and fire, be of themselves dumbe & speechlesse; but they found & speake all of them, when any spirit or aire is gotten in, then (I say) they make a noise: as for brasse, there is no voidnesse within it; but for that mixed it is with an united and equall spirit, therefore it answereth againe to claps and knocks, and therewithall resoundeth: and if wee may conjecture by that which our eie seeth and judgeth, yron seemeth to be spongeous, and as it were worne-eaten within, full of holes, and hollowed in maner of hony-combs; howbeit, a metall it is of all other, that hath the worst voice, and is most mute: there was no need therefore to trouble the night so much in restraining, compressing, and driving in the aire thereof so close of the one side, and leaving so many places and spaces void on the other side; as if the aire impeached the voice, and corrupted the substance thereof, considering it selfe is the very substance, forme and puissance of it: over and besides, it should follow thereupon, that unequall nights, namely, those that be foggie and mistie, or exceeding colde, were more resonant than those that be faire and cleere; for that in such nights, those atomes are clunged close together, and looke where they come, they leave a place void of bodies: moreover, (that which is easie and evident to be seene) the colde Winter night ought by this reckoning to be more vocall and fuller of noise, than the hot Summers night; whereof, neither the one nor the other is true: and therefore (letting this reason, such as it is, goe by) I will produce Anaxagoras, who saith: That the sunne causeth the aire to move and stirre after a certaine trembling motion, as if it did beat and pant; as it may appeare by those little mores and shavings (as it were) in maner of dust, which flutter and flie up and downe thorow those holes; whereas the sunne-shine passeth, such as some Greeks call πλάσι: which (saith he) chirming (as it were) and making a humming in the day time, cause by their noise, any other voice or sound not so easie to be heard; but in the night season, as their motion ceaseth, so consequently, their noise also is gone.

After I had thus said, Ammonius began in this wise: We may be deemed haply ridiculous (quoth he) to thinke that we can refute Democritus, or to go about for to correct Anaxagoras; howbeit, we must of necessitie take from these little bodies of Anaxagoras his devising, this chirming noise before said, which is neither like to be so, nor any waies necessarie: sufficient it will be to admit the trembling motion and stirring of them, dancing as they doe, in the same light, and by by that meanes disgregating and breaking the voice many times, and scatter it to and fro: for the aire (as hath bene said already) being the very body and substance of the voice, if it be quiet and settled, giveth a direct, united and continued way unto the small parcels and movings of the voice, to passe along a great way: for calme weather and the tranquillitie of the aire, is resonant, whereas contrariwise, tempestuous weather is dumbe and mute: according to which, Simonides hath thus written:

*For then, no blasts of winde arose on hie,
Shaking tree-leaves; that men need once to feare
Lest they might breake sweet songs and melodie, Stopping the sound from passage to their eare.*

For often times the agitation of the aire, permitteeth not the full, expresse and articulate forme of the voice, to reach unto the sense of hearing; howbeit, somewhat it carrieth alwaies thorow from it, if the same be multiplied much and forced aloud: as for the night, in it selfe it hath nothing to stirre and trouble the aire; whereas the day hath one great cause thereof, to wit, the sun, as Anaxagoras himselfe hath said.

Then Thrasylus the sonne of Ammonius, taking his turne to speake: What should we meane by this I pray you in the name of Jupiter (quoth he) to attribute this cause unto an invisable motion of the aire; and leave the agitation, tossing and division thereof, which is so manifest and evident to our eies: for this great ruler and commander in the heaven, Jupiter, doth not asier an imperceptible maner, nor by little and little, stirre the smallest parcels of the aire, but all at once, so soone as he sheweth his face, excitieth and moveth all things in the world, which they no sooner see, but they obey and follow; as if together with the new day, they were regenerate againe, and entred into another manner of life, as Democritus saith; letting themselves unto their businesse and affaires, not without some noise & effectual cries: in which sense Ithyca called not impertinently the morning, or dawning of the day Chytus, for that now we begin to heare others, yea, & to speake aloud our selves: whereas the aire of the night being for the most part calme and still, without any waves and billowes, for that everie thing is at rest and repose, by all likelihood conveyeth the voice entier and whole unto us, nor broke nor diminished one jot. At these words, Aristodemus of Cyprus, who was one of our companie: But take heed Thrasylus, (quoth he) that this which you say be not convinced and refused by the battels and marches of great armies in the night season, for that upon such an occasion the noise and outcries be no lesse resounding and cleere, how troubled and waving soever the aire be, than otherwise: and peradventure there is some cause thereof, proceeding also from our selves; for the most part of that which we speake in the night season, is of this nature, that either we command some body after a turbulent manner, as if a passion urged us thereto, or if we demand and aske ought, we crie as loud as we can; for that the thing which wakeneth and maketh us to rise at such a time (when as we should sleepe and take our repose) for to speake or doe any thing, is no small matter or peaceable, but great and important, halting us for the urgent necessitie thereof unto our businesse, in such sort, that our words and voices which then we utter, go from us in greater force and vehemency.

As men thereby unto their works may rise.*

THE FOURTH QUESTION.

How it comes to passe, that of the sacred games of prize some use one maner of chaplet, and some another, yet all have the branch of the date tree? Also why the great dates bee called Nicolai?

During the solemnitie of the Isthmick games, at what time as Sophs was the judge and directour thereof now the second time: other feasts of his I avoided; namely, when as hee invited one while many strangers together; and otherwhiles a number of none else but citizens, and those one with another; but one time above the rest, when as hee feasted those onely who were his greatest friends, and all, men of learning, I my selfe also was a bidden guest, and present among them; now by that time that the first service at the table was taken awaie, there came one unto the professed orator and rhetorician Herodes, who brought unto him from a scholar and familiar of his, who had wonne the prize, for an encomiasticall or laudatorie

torie oration that he had made, a branch of the date tree, together with a plaited and broided coronet of flowers; which when he had curteously received, he returned them backe to him again, saying withall: that hee marvelled why some of these sacred games had for their prize this crowne, and others that, but generally all, a branch of date tree: For mine owne part (quoth he) I cannot perswade my selfe that this ariseth upon that cause which some alledge; namely, the equality and uniformitie of the leaves, springing and growing out as they doe, alwaies even and orderly, one just against another directly, wherein they seeme to contend and strive a vie, resembling thereby a kinde of combat; and that victorie it selfe tooke the name in Greeke Núñ, as it were not given, that is to say, not yeelding nor giving place: for there be many other plants which as it were by weight and measure, distribute nourishment equally unto their boughes and branches growing opposite in that manner, and heerein observe exactly a wonderfull order and equality: but in my conceit, more probabilitie and apparence of reason they alledge, who imagine & suppose, that our auncients made choice of this tree, because they tooke a love to the beautie, tallnesse, and streight growing thereof; and namely Homer, who compareth the beautie of Nausicaa the Phæocian queene, unto the plant or stem of a faire date tree: for this you all know verie well, that in old time they were wont alwaies to cast upon those victorious champions who had wonne the prize, roses, and rose champion flowers; yea and some otherwhiles apples and pomegranates, thinking by this meanes to recompence and honour them: but there is nothing else so much in the date tree, to commend it so evidently above other trees: for in all Greeke fruit it beareth none that is good to be eaten, as being imperfect and not ripe enough; and if it bare here as it doth in Syria and Aegypt, the date which of all fruits for the lovely contentment of the eie, is of all sights most delightfome, and for the sweetnesse of taste, of all banquetting dishes most pleasant, there were not a tree in the world comparable unto it: and verily the great monarch and emperor Augustus by report, for that he loved singularly well, one Nicolaus a philosopher Peripateticke, in regard that he was of gentle nature and sweet behaviour, tall and slender withall of stature, and besides of a ruddy and purple colour in his visage, called the fairest and greatest dates, after his name, Nicolai, and to this day they beare that denomination.

In this discourse, Herodes pleased the company no lesse with the mention of Nicolaus the philosopher, than he did with that which he had spoken to the question: And therefore (quoth Sossius) so much the rather ought we every one to devise for to conferre unto this question propounded, whatsoever hee is perswaded concerning it: Then I for my part first, brought forth mine opinion as touching the superiouritie of this date tree at the sacred games, because the glorie of victours and conquerors, ought to endure and continue incorruptible, and as much as possibly may be not age and waxe old: for the date tree liveth as long as any plant whatsoever that is longest lived: and this is testified by these verses of Orpheus:

*Living as long as plants of date trees tall,
Which in the head be greene and spread withall.*

And this is the onely tree in manner, which hath that propertie indeed, which is reported though not so truly, of many others: And what is that? namely, to carie the leaves firme and fast, so as they never fall off; for we do not see, that either the lawrell or olive tree, nor the myrtle, nor any other trees which are said to shed no leafe, keepe alwaies the same leaves still; but as the first fall, others put forth, and by this meanes they continue alwaies fresh and greene, living evermore as cities and great townes doe; whereas the date tree never loseth any of those leaves which once came forth, but continueth still clad with the same leaves; and this is that vigour as I take it which men dedicate and appropriat especially to the force or strength of victorie.

When Sossius had made an end of this speech, Protagenes the Grammarian calling by name unto Praxiteles, the discourser and historian: Shall wee suffer these oratours and rhetoricians (quoth he) alter their usuall maner and profession, to argue thus by conjectures and likely probabilities; and can we alledge nothing out of histories pertinent directly unto this matter? and verily for mine owne part, if my memorie faile me not, I have not read long since in the Attique annales, that Thestes, who first let out games of prize in the isle Delos, brake & plucked from the sacred date tree, a branch, which thereupon was called Spadi; and Praxiteles said as much: But some men (quoth he) might aske of Thestes himselfe, what reason induced him (when he proposed the prize of victorie) to pull a branch from the date tree, rather than from the laurell or olive tree? and what will you say, if this be a Pythicke prize? for that the Amphyctones honored first first at Delphos, the victours, with a branch of date tree and laurell, in honour of Pythius Apollo, considering that the maner was not to consecrate unto that God, the laurell or olive onely, but also the date tree; like as Nicias did, when in the name of the Athenians, he defraied the charges of games, in Delos; and the Athenians, at Delphi; and before them, Cypselus the Corinthian; for otherwise, this God of ours hath evermore loved those games of prize, yea, and was desirous to win the victorie, having strove personally himselfe in playing upon the harpe, in singing, and flinging the coit of brasse; yea; and as some some say, at hurl-bats and fist-fights; favouring men also, and taking their part at such combats; as Homer seemeth to testifie, when he bringeth in Achilles, speaking in this wise:

Two champions now, who simply are
Of all the armie best,
My pleasure is, shall forth advance;
And looke who is so best,
And favoured at buffet-fight,
By god Apollos grace,
As for to win the victorie,
And honour, in that place.

Also when he speaketh of archers, he saith expressly, that one of them who invocated upon Apollo, and praied unto him for helpe, had good successe, and carried away the best prize; but the other, who was so proud, and would not call upon the god for his aid, missed the marke & scope whereat he shot. Neither is it likely or credible, that the Athenians dedicated their publicke place of exercise, unto Apollo, for nothing, and without good cause; but surely thus they thought, that the same God unto whom we are beholden for our health, giveth us also the force and strong disposition of bodie, to performe such games and feats of activitie. But whereas, some combats there be, sleight and easie; others, hard and grievous: we finde in writing, that the Delphians sacrificed unto Apollo, by the name of Pythes, that is to say, the champion at fist-fight: but the Candians and Lacedæmonians offered sacrifice unto the same God, surnamed, the Runner. And seeing as we do, that the maner is to present in his temple within the citie of Delphos, the prizes or dedications of the spoiles and bootie gained from the enemies in war, as also to consecrate unto him the Trophæes; is not this a great argument and testimonie, that in this God it lieth most to give the victorie and conquest? And as he went forward, and was minded to say more, Cephisus the sonne of Theon, interrupted his speech, saying: These allegations (beleeve me) favour not of histories, nor of Cosmographicall books; but being fetched immediately out of the minds of those Peripateticall discourses, are handled and argued probably to the purpose: and besides, whiles you take up the fabricke or engine, after the maner of tragedian plaiers, you intend as it should seeme, to afright by intimating the name of Apollo, those that contradict and gainsay your opinions: and yet (as well becometh his goodnesse and bountie) he is indifferent and alike affected unto all, in clemencie and benignitie: but we following the tracts & steps of Sossius, who hath led us the way very well, keepe our selves to the date tree, which affordeth us sufficient matter to discourse thereof againe: for the Babylonians doe chaunt and sing the praises of this tree; namely, that it bringeth unto them three hundred and threescore sorts of fundrie commodities; but we that are Greeks, have little or no profit thereby: howbeit, good philosophie may be drawn out of it, for the better instruction of champions and such as are to performe combats of prize, in that it beareth no fruit with us: for being a right goodly, faire, and very great tree, by reason of the good habit and disposition thereof, yet is it not here among us, fruitfull; but by this strong constitution that it hath, it implотиeth and spendeth all nouriture to feed and fortifie the bodie, after the maner of champions, by their exercise, so as there remaineth but a little behinde, and the same not effectually for feed: over and above all this, one qualitie it hath, proper, and peculiar to it selfe alone, and that which agreeth not to any other tree, the which I intend to shew unto you: For the woodie substance of this date tree aloft, if a man seeme to weigh and presse downe, with any heavey burden, it yeeldeth not, nor stoupeth under the poise, but curbeth upward archwise, as withstanding that, wherewith it is charged and pressed; and even so it is with those combatants in sacred games: for such as through feeblenesse of bodie, or faintnesse of heart seeme to yeeld, those, the said exercises doe bend and keepe under; but as many as stoutly abide, not onely with their strong bodies, but also with magnanimous courage, these be they that are raised up on high, and mount unto honour.

THE FIFTH QUESTION.

What is the cause that they who saile upon the river Nilus, draw up water for their use, before day-light?

One there was, who demanded upon a time the reason, why the water-men who saile and row upon the river Nilus, provided themselves of that water which they drinke, in the night, and not by day. Some said, it was, because they feared the sunne, which by enchaunting and heating the water, maketh it more subject to corruption and putrefaction: for whatsoever is warmed or made hot, the same is alwaies more ready and disposed to mutation, and doth soone alter, by relaxation of the proper and native qualitie that it hath: whereas colde, by restraining, seemeth to containe and keepe each thing in the owne kinde or nature; and water, especially. Now, for the truth of this, that the coldnesse of water hath vertue to preserve, the snowe is a sufficient testimonie, which keepeth flesh a long time sweet, and without corruption; but contrariwise, heat causeth all things to goe out of their owne nature, yea, even honie it selfe; for being once boiled, marred it is; but if it continue raw, it not onely keepeth it selfe well enough, but helpeth to preserve other things: and for a further prooffe of this matter, the water of lakes and pooles is a principall thing to confirme the same; for as potable it is, and as good to drinke in Winter, as any other waters; but in Summer, the same is starke naught, and breedeth diseases: and therefore, since the night answereth to Winter, and the day to Summer, those water-men of Nilus above said, are of this opinion: That water will continue longer before it turne and corrupt, if it be drawn in the night season. To these allegations, which of themselves seemed to carry probabilitie enough, reason also includeth as an evident & inartificiall prooffe to strengthen and confirme the experience and beleefe of these water-men; for they said, that they drew water, while the river was yet still and quiet; for in the day time, many men either saile upon it, or otherwise, fetch water from it; many beasts also, passe to and fro in it; whereby it is troubled, thicke and muddie; and such water will soone putrefie: for whatsoever is mixed, more easily taketh corruption, than that which is pure and simple, considering that mixture maketh a fight, and fight causeth change and alteration. Now, who knoweth not that putrefaction is a kinde of mutation? which is the cause that painters call the mixtures of their colours, by the name of phlegma, that is to say, faulnes and infect: the common use also of our speech carrieth it, to call that which is unmixed and meere of it selfe, ἀσύντακτος is ἀσύντακτος, that is to say, incorrupt and sincere: but principally, if earth be mingled with water, it changeth the qualitie, and marreth the nature of it quite for ever, for being potable and good to drinke: and therefore it is, that dormant and dead waters, which stand in hollow holes, are more subject to corruption than others, as being full of earthie substance; whereas, running streames escape this mixture, and repell the earth which is brought into them: good cause therefore, had Hesiodus to commend

*The water of some lively spring, that alwaies runnes his course,
And which no muddie earth among,
doth trouble and make worse.*

For holsome we holde that which is incorrupt; and incorrupt we take that to be, which is all simple, pure and unmixed: and hereto may be adjoined, for to confirme this opinion of theirs, the fundrie kinds and differences of earth: for those waters which run thorow hillie and stonie grounds, because they carrie not with them, much of the earth or soile, are stronger and more firme, than such as passe along marishes, plaines and flats. Now the river Nilus keeping his course within a levell and soft country; and to speake more truly, being (as it were) bloud tempered and mingled with flesh, is sweet doublelesse, and full of juices that have a strong and nutritive vertue; but ordinarily, the same runneth mixed and troubled; and so much the rather, if it be stirred and disquieted; for the moving and agitation thereof, mixeth in the terrestriall substance with the liquid humour; but when it is quiet and at repose, the same felleth downe to the bottom, by reason of the weight. Thus you see why they draw up their water in the night-season; and withall, by that meanes they prevent the sun-rising; which alwaies doth catch up and corrupt that which is in all waters most subtle and light.

THE SIXTH QUESTION.

Of those who come late to supper; where, discourse it is, from whence be derived these names of refections in Greeke ἀσύντακτος, αἰνός, and δειπνός.

MY younger sonnes upon a time had staid longer at the theater, than they should, to see the sights, and heare the care-sports which there were exhibited; by occasion whereof, they came too late to supper; whereupon Therapion sonnes called them in mirth & sport αυτοσύντακτος and συντακτικός, as one would say, supper-letting, and night-supping-lads, with other such like names; but they, to be meet & quit with them againe, gave them the tearme of αὐτοσύντακτος, that is to say, runners to supper. Heere with one of the elder forth there present, said: That hee who came late to his supper, ought rather to be called αὐτοσύντακτος, because he maketh more haste with an extraordinary pace, for that he hath seemed to staie too long: to which purpose he related a pretie tearme of Bastus, the buffon or pleasant jester to Cesar, who was wont to call those αυτοσύντακτος, that is to say, desirous of suppers, who at any time came tardie: For (quoth he) although they have businesse to call and keepe them away, yet for the love of good cheere and sweet morcels, they refuse not to come (late though it be) whensoever they are invited. Heere came I in with the testimonie of Polycharmus, one of the great oratours, who managed the State of Athens: in an oration of his, where making an apologie of his life unto the people in a frequent assembly, he spake in this wise: Loe, my masters of Athens how I have lived: but besides manie other things which I have already alledged, take this moreover: that whensoever I was bidden to any supper, I never came last, for this seemed to be very popular and plausible; whereas contrariwise, men are wont to hate them as odious persons, and furlly lords, who come late, and for whom the rest of the companie are forced to staie. Then Sostratus willing to defend the young boies: But Aleam (quoth he) called not Pittacus, Zephadorpidas, because he supped late in the night, but for that it was ordinary with him to delight in none other guests, and table companions, but base, vile, and obscure persons; for to eat early or betimes, was in old time counted a reproch; and it is said, that this word αὐτοσύντακτος, that is to say, a breakfast, was derived of ἀσύντακτος, that is to say, intemperance. Then Theron interrupting his speech: Not so (quoth he) but we must give credit rather unto those who report the auncient manner of life in old time: for they say, that men in those daies being laborious, painfull, and temperate in their living withal, tooke for their repast early in the morning, a peece of bread dipped in wine, and no other thing, and therefore they called this breakfast of theirs, Ακρασίμα, of Ακρατον, which is meere and pure wine: and as for δείπνον, it significeth those viands which were prepared for repast in the evening; for δείπνον, betokeneth late in the evening, at what time their manner was to suppe; namely, after they had dispatched their other affaires. Heere occasion was given to demand from whence were derived these words δειπνός, that is to say, supper, and αἰνός, dinner: and thought it was that Ariston and Ακρασίμα, signified both one thing: and for prooffe heereof, they reported them to Homer, who saith: That Eumaeus provided Ariston by the breake of day, as appeareth by this verse:

*No sooner did day light appeere,
But they prepared their owne dinner.*

And it seemeth very probable that this repast αἰνός, tooke the name of the morn-tide, and is as much to say, as δειπνός, now for the refection called δειπνός, that is to say, supper, it was so called, in τῶν νυκτῶν διασύντακτος, because it gave repose from their labours; for men used to take their supper after they had done some businesse, or else in the very time that they were about the same; this also may be shewed by the testimonie of Homer, who saith:

*But what time as the woodman minding rest,
From hewing trees, his supper soone had rest.*

Unlesse a man will haply say, that Ariston, that is to say, a dinner or breakfast, tooke that name, because folke use to dine or breake their fast, with that which first came to their hands, without any labour or dressing thereof in the kitchen: and δειπνός, that is to say, supper, was so called, because there was some labour employed about the dressing thereof; and therefore αἰνός, is as much to say, as δειπνός, that is to say, very easily, and soone provided; but δειπνός, as one would say, δυσχερὲς, that is to say, done with much paine and travell. But our brother Lamprias, who naturally was given to scoffing, and loved a life to be merry and to laugh: Since that (quoth hee) we are allowed allowed so great libertie for to prate thus and talke so idly as we doe, I am able to proove unto you, that the Romane words are ten thousand times more properly devised, and expresse these things better than the Greeke: for they called a supper, Cena, which is as much as meate; for the good fellowship and companie of those that supped (as it were) in common together: for the olde Romans, howsoever they dined or brake their fast ordinarily by themselves alone, yet they supped ever with their friends about them. Now their dinner, they called, Prandium, of the houre or time thereof, as if they would say prandium for prandium is as much as dinner, that is to say, morning or noone-tide at the farthest; and to repose or rest after dinner, is expressed by the word exsilium: or els perhaps, Prandium significeth a breakfast or morning repast, when as men do eat before they be exsilium, that is to say, before they have any need or want of victuals: and now to say nothing of many things, which they expresse by meere Greeke words; as for example, how they call beds, Strata, of stratus; wine, Vinum, of vinum; oile, Oleum, of oleum; honny, Mel, of mel; to taste, Gustare, of gustus; to drinke one unto another, Propinare, of propinare; who can denie, but their word, Comessatio, that is to say, Banqueting, is derived of our Greeke word comessatio; and Misce, that is to say, to temper and mixe wine, of mixeo in Greeke? for thus saith Homer:

*She sooke the cup, and once againe,
In it she tempered pleasant wine.*

also a table, they called Menfa, because it stood in mensa, that is to say, in the mids; and bread, Panis, for that it flaked panis, that is to say, hunger; also a chaplet or garland of flowers, Corona, of the word corona, an helmet, or corona, the head; for in one place, Homer called an helmet or head piece, corona, that is to say, Corona, a coronet; likewise, Cadere, that is to say, to beat or kill, of cadere; and Dentes, that is to say, teeth of dentes; and last of all, Labra, that is to say lips, of labra; Labrum, that is to say, receiving and taking in meat with them. To conclude therefore, either we are to heare such derivations as these, without laughing thereat; or els we must not give them to easie access (as it were by undermining) unto words, as unto walles; partly to overthrow and beat downe some, and in part to batter and breake others.

THE SEVENTH QUESTION.

Of certaine Pythagorean precepts, for bidding in any wife to admit swallows into the house, and commanding to ruffle the bed clothes, so soone as a man is risen.

Sylla of Carthage, upon my returne to Rome, after I had bene long absent, invited me to a supper for my welcome home; for so the Romans termed such a courtesie; and to beare mee companie, he had other friends, and those not many in number; among whō was one Lucius of Tuskane, a disciple of the Pythagorean philosopher, Moderatus: this Lucius perceiving that our Philinus did eat of nothing which ever had life (as the usuall maner of him and other Pythagoreans was to doe) fell into speech as touching Pythagoras himselfe, and affirmed that a Tuskane he was, not as some others, because his father, and his ancestours, were Tuskans, from whom he was descended; but for that he was himselfe borne, reared, brought up, and taught in Tuscanie; which he proved principally, by certaine symbollicall and allegoricall precepts of his; as for example, among others, that he commanded those who were new risen out of their beds, to ruffle the clothes together; also that the print of a pot or cauldron, should not be left upon the ashes, after it is taken away, but that the ashes ought to be stirred together; item, that no swallows should be admitted into the house; likewise, that no man should step over a before, nor keepe within house; those creatures which had hooked claws: For these rules, and such like (quoth he) which the Pythagoreans deliver in word, and set downe in writing, the Tuskans onely observe and keepe in deed. Which when Lucius had said, strange it was thought, and absurd above the rest, to chafe and keepe out of the house, fillic swallows, harmlesse and gentle creatures, as well as those that have crooked clees, which are the most bloudy and cruell of all others: for whereas some ancient interpreters gave the solution and exposition onely, as if covertly it implied thus much, that we should avoid the companie of secret whisperers, backbiters and slanderers; Lucius himselfe approved not thereof; for the swallow whispereth not at all; it chattering in deed and talketh (as one would say) loud enough; and yet not more than pies, partridges and hennies. But what thinke you by this (quoth Sylla) that in regard of the tale that goes of Progne, who killed her yong sonne Irys, they hate * swallows for that abominable act, and therefore would seeme to cause us for to detest a furr off, such infamous cases, for which they say, both Terem and the women, partly did perpetrate, & in part suffered horrible and unlawfull things; whereupon, to this very day, these birds be called Daulides? But Gorgias the sophist, by occasion that a swallow mewted over his head, and squirted her dung upon him, looking up unto her: These be no faire casts (quoth he) Philomela; or is this also common to the rest? For the Pythagoreans doe not exclude or banish out of house the nightingale, * which beareth a part in the same tragedies, and is faultie with the rest. Peradventure (quoth I then) there is as much reason in the one as the other (ô Sylla) but consider, and see whether the swallow be not odious and infamous with them for the same cause, that they reject and wil not enterreine those creatures which have hooked talions; for she likewise feedeth upon flesh, and besides, killeth and devoureth especially, grasshoppers, which are sacred and muscical: moreover, she flieth close by the ground, hunting and catching little fillic creatures (as Aristotle saith) furthermore, she is the onely creature of all the other, that be under the same rouse with us, which lodgeth there of free cost, living without contributing ought, or paying any rent: yet the stork which hath no covert by our house, nor warmth by our fire, ne yet enioyeth any benefit, pleasure, or helpe at all by our meanes, giveth us otherwhiles some tribute and custome (as it were) for marching onely upon the ground; for up and downe she goes, killing roades and serpents, mortall enemies to mankind, and lying in wait for our lives; whereas the swallow having all those commodities at our hands, no sooner hath nourished her yong ones, and brought them to some perfection, but away she goes and is no more to be seene, so disloyal and unthankfull she is: and that which of all others is worst, the flie and the swallow bee the onely creatures haunting our houses as they doe, that never will be tamed, nor suffer a man to touch and handle them, nay they will not admit any fellowship, societie, or communion with him, either in worke or play: the flie indeed hath some reason to be afraid of us, for that she susteineth harme by us, and is chased and driven away so often: but the swallow hateth man naturally, she will not trust him, but remaineth alwaies suspicious and untamed: now if wee are to take these and such like speeches, not directly according to the litterall sense, and as the words onely doe imply, but rather by way of an oblique reflexion, as the resemblances of things appearing in others: certes Pythagoras propoeth unto us heerein, the very pattern of an unthankfull and faithlesse person, admonishing us not to receive unto our familiar acquaintance and amitie, those who for the time, and to serve their owne turne, draw neere unto us, and retire themselves under the rouse of our house, and that we ought not to make them inward with us, communicating with them, our house, our domestical altar, and those things which are in stead of most sacred obligations. When I had thus said, it seemed that I had given the companie encouragement and assurance to speake, for they began boldly to apply unto the other symbollicall precepts, their morall expositions: And Philinus for his part said, that in commanding to confound the forme of the pot or cauldron imprinted in the ashes, they taught us this lesson, not to leave any marke or apparent impression of anger; but after it hath once done boiling what it will, and is fetled and cooled againe, to ridde away all ranckor and malice, yea and to burie all in perpetual oblivion. As for the shuffling of the bed clothes together, when we are newly risen, some thought there was no hidden matter meant thereby, but signified onely, that it was not seemely or honest, that the make or print in the bed should remaine as an expresse image to be seene, of the place, wherein man and wife had lien together: But Sylla guessed otherwise and conjectured that heerein was contained a dehoration to divert us from sleeping on bed in the day time, when as even in the very morning the preparation and meanes to sleepe was so immediately taken away: for that we ought to take our rest and repose in the night, but in the day time to be stirring and about our businesse, not suffering to remaine in our beds so much as the tract of our bodie; for a man lying asleepe, is good for nothing, no more than when he is dead: and heere to seemeth to allude and accord, another precept of the Pythagoreans which they give unto their friends, for bidding them not to ease any man of his burden, but rather to lay on more, and seeme to surcharge him still, as not approving any sloth or idleness whatsoever: now for that during these discourses, Lucius neither approved nor disapproved ought that was said, but sat still, heard all, said nothing, and pondered every thing in himselfe: Empedocles calling unto Sylla by name, said as followeth:

THE

* For Philomela, Terem was turned (as the poets faine) into a swallow, who perished, after fifty a Terem to kill her own child, by Terem, and there it up before him as a dish of meat, to the house, for that he had defouled the land Philomela.

For Philomela, (as the poets faine) was turned into a swallow, who perished, after fifty a Terem to kill her own child, by Terem, and there it up before him as a dish of meat, to the house, for that he had defouled the land Philomela.

THE EIGHTH QUESTION.

Why the Pythagoreans, among all other living creatures, abstaine most from eating fish.

IF Lucius our friend (quoth he) be offended, or take no pleasure in our sayings, it is high time that we should give over and make an end: but if these things fall within the compasse of their precept for silence; yet this I thinke ought not to be concealed, but may well be revealed and communicated unto others, namely: What the reason is, that the Pythagoreans abstained principally from eating fish? for so much we finde written of the auncient Pythagoreans: 10 I my selfe have fallen into the company and conference of certaine disciples of Alexicrates, a man of our time; who fedde a litle sometimes of other living creatures, yea and sacrificed them unto the gods; but for no good in the world would they so much as taste of a fish: not as I take it for that cause which Tyndares the Lacedæmonian alledged, who thought that this was done for the honour they had to silence; in regard whereof, the philosopher Empedocles whose name I beare, who was the first that ceased to reach Pythagorically, that is to say, to give rules and precepts of hidden wisdom, calleth fishes Ellapas, as having ἑλπίαν ἐν αὐτοῖς, that is to say, their voice tied and shut up within; but for they thought, taciturnitie to be a singular and divine thing, and in one word, that even the gods themselves doe shew by deeds and effects, without voice or speech unto wise men, what their will and pleasure is: Then Lucius mildly and simply 20 answered: That the true cause indeed might peradventure lie hidden still and not be divulged: howbeit, there is nothing to hinder or let us, but that we may render one reason or other which carrieth with it some likelihood & probability: so Theon the grammarian began first to discourse upo that point saying: it was very difficult to shew & prove that Pythagoras was a Tuscan born; but for certaine known it was, that he had made his abode a long time in Aegypt, & conversed with the sages of that countrey, where he approved, embraced, and highly extolled manie of their religious ceremonies, and namely, that as touching beanes: for Herodotus writeth, that the Aegyptians neither sowe, nor eat beanes, no nor can abide so much as to looke upon them: and as for fishes, we are assured that their priests, even at this day, abstaine from them, and living as they doe, chaste and unmarried, they refuse salt likewise; neither will they endure to eat 30 it as a meat by it selfe, nor any other viands wherein any sea salt commeth; whereof divers men alledge divers & sundry reasons: but there is one true cause indeed, & that is the enmitie which they beare unto the sea, as being a savage element, a meere alien, & estranged fro us, or to speak more truly, a morall enmitie to mans nature; for the gods are not nourished therewith, as the Stoicks were of opinion: that the furies were fed from thence: but contrariwise, that in it was lost the father and favour of that countrey of Aegypt, which they call the delux or running out of O'iris, and in lamenting his generation on the right hand, and corruption on the left, covertly they give us to understand, the end and perdition of Nilus in the sea: In which consideration, they are of opinion, that lawfull it is not, once to drinke of the water, as being not potable; neither doe they thinke, that any thing which it breedeth, bringeth forth, or nourisheth, is 40 cleane and meet for man; considering that the same hath not breath and respiration common with us, nor food and pasture agreeable unto ours; for that the very aire which nourisheth and mainteineth all other living creatures, is pernicious and deadly unto them, as if they were engendred first, and lived afterward in this world against the course of nature, and for no use at all: and marvell we must not, if for the hatred they beare unto the sea, they hold the creatures therein, as strangers, and neither meet nor worthy to be intermingled with their blood or vitall spirits: seeing they will not deigne so much as to salute any pilots or mariners whensoever they meet with them, because they get their living upon the sea.

Sylla commending this discourse, added moreover, as touching the Pythagoreans, that when they sacrificed unto the gods, they wuld especially tast of the primices or parcels of flesh which they had killed: but never was there any fish that they sacrificed or offred unto the gods. Now when they had finished their speech, I came in with mine opinion: As for those Aegyptians (quoth I) many men there be as well learned, as ignorant, who contradict them, & plead in the behalfe and defence of the sea, recounting the manifold commodities thereof, whereby our life is more plentifull, pleasant, and happie: as touching the surcease as it were of the Pythagoreans, and their forbearing to lay hand upon fishes, because they are such strangers unto us, it is a very absurd and ridiculous device, or to say more truly, it is a cruell and inhumane part, and favoring favoring much of a barbarous Cyclops, seeing that to other living creatures they render a reward and recompence, for their kinred, coulénage and acquaintance, by killing, eating, and consuming them as they doe: and verily reported it is of Pythagoras, that upon a time hee bought of the fishiers a draught of fish; and when he had so done, commanded that they should be all let out of the net into the sea againe: surely this was not the act of a man, who either hated or despised fishes as his enemies or strangers; considering that finding them prisoners as he did, he paid for their ransom, and redeemed their liberty, as if they had bene his kinsfolke & good friends: and therefore the humanitie, equitie, and mildnesse of these men, induceth us to thinke and imagine cleane contrary, that it was rather for some exercise of justice, or to keepe themselves in ure and custome thereof, that they spared and pardoned those sea-creatures; for that al 10 others, give men cause in some sort to hurt them; whereas poore fishes offend us in no maner: and say their nature and will were so disposed, yet cannot they execute the same: moreover, conjecture we may and collect, by the reports, records, and sacrifices of our auncients, that they thought it an horrible & abominable thing, not onely to eat, but also to kill any beast that doth no hurt or damage unto us: but seeing in proceesse of time how much pestered they were, with a number of bealls that grew upon them, and overspred the face of the earth; and withall being as it is said, commaunded by the oracle of Apollon at Delphos, to succour the fruits of the earth, which were ready to perish; they began then to kill them for sacrifice unto the gods: yet in 20 so doing, they seemed to tremble and feare, as troubled in minde, calling this their action ἱερὸν καὶ σέβειν, that is to say, to doe or perpetrate, as if they did, and committed some great deed in killing a creature having life; and even till at this day they observe a ceremony with all religious precisenesse, not to massacre any beast before it hath given a nod with the head, after the libations and effusions of wine upon it, in signe and token of consent; so strict they were and wary to commit no unjust act. Certes, to say nothing of other bealls, if all men had forborne to kill and eat no more, but pullen and conies, within short time they should not have bene able to have dwelt within their townes or cities, nor enjoyed any fruits of the earth: & therefore although necessitie at the first had brought in the use of eating flesh; a very hard matter it were now, in regard of pleasure, to put down & abolish the same: whereas the whole kind of sea-creatures using neither the same aire and water with us, nor comming neere unto our fruits, but being 30 (as a man would saie) comprised within another world, & having distinct bounds and limits of their owne, which they cannot passe, but immediately it costeth them their life, for punishment of their trespassse, given unto our belly none occasion or pretence at all, more or lesse, to runne upon them: so that the whole hunting, catching, and running after fish, is a manifest worke of gourmandise and daintie feeding; which without any just or lawfull cause, troubleth & disquieteth the seas, and descendeth into the very bottome of the deepe; for we have no reason at any time to call the red sea-barbell ἰσχυρὸν, that is to say, come devourer; nor the guilt-head πυρρὸν, that is to say, vine waster, or grape eater, nor yet any mullets, lubins, or sea-pikes, σπυρμακίδες, that is to say, seed gatherers, as we name divers land bealls, noting them thereby for the harme and annoiance they doe unto us: neither can we impute unto the greatest fish 40 in the sea, the least wrong or shrewd turne, wherewith wee charge, in our exceeding neerenesse and parsimonie, some cat or wezill, a * mouse, or rat which haunt our houses: in which regard, they precisely condemning themselves, not for feare of law onely, to doe wrong unto men, but also by the very instinct of nature, to offer no injurie unto any thing in the world that doth them no harme, nor displeasure, used to feed on fish lesse than on any other meat: & admit there were no injustice in the thing, all busie courtesie of men in this point, being so needlesse as it is, bewraeth great intemperance and wastfull gluttony: and therefore Homer in his poeme deviseth this, that not onely the Greeks encamping upon the streight of Helle'spont, abstained wholly from eating fish, but also that the delicate and daintie toothed Phacians, the wanton and licorous woers likewise of lady Penelope, dissolute though they were otherwise, and all 50 islanders were never served at their tables with any viands or cates from the sea: no nor the companions of Ulysses in that great and long voiage of theirs which they had at sea, ever laid hooke, leape, or weele, or calt net into the sea for fish, so long as they had a bit of bread, or handfull of meale left:

But when their ship had vintails none,
But all therein was spent and gone.

even a litle before that they laid hands upon the kowes of the sunne, then began they to fish; not in wis for any deintie dishes, but even for necessary food:

With

* Some reade mice, a mice.

*With bended hookes, for now their man,
Great hunger bit, and guts did gnaw.*

So that for extremer need they were forced to eat fish, and to kill the sunnes kine : whereby wee may perceive that it was a point of sanctimonie and chastitie, not onely among the Aegyptians and Syrians, but the Greeks also, to forbear feeding upon fish ; for that beside the injustice of the thing, they abhorred as I thinke, the superfluous curiositie of such food.

Hereupon Neslor tooke occasion to speake : And why (quoth he) is there no reckoning made of my countrey-men and fellow-citizens, no more than of the Megarians ? and yet you have heard me to say often times, that the priests of Neptune, whom we call Hieromnemones, never eat fish : for this god is surnamed Phytalmios, that is to say, the President of breeding and generation in the sea; and the race descending from that ancient Hellen, sacrificed unto Neptune, by the name and addition of Patrogenios, that is to say, the stock-father and principall Progenitor, being of opinion, that man came of a moist and liquid substance, as also, be the Syrians, which is the very cause that they worship and adore a fish, as being of the same kinde, generation, and nouriture with themselves ; philosophizing and arguing in this point, with more appearance and shew of reason, than Anaximander did, who affirmed not, that men and fishes were bred both in the same places ; but avouched that men were first engendered within fishes themselves, and there nourished like their yong frie ; but afterward, when they became sufficient and able to shifte and helpe them, they were cast forth, and so tooke land : like as therefore, the fire catcheth the wood, whereby it was kindled and set a burning, though it were father and mother both unto it ; according as he said, who inserted the marriage of * Ceryx among the works of Hesiodus ; even so Anaximander in pronouncing, that fish was both father and mother unto men, taxeth and condemneth the feeding thereupon.

THE NINTH QUESTION.

Whether it be possible, that new diseases may be engendered by our meats ?

Philo the physician constantly affirmed, that the leprosie, called Elephantiasis, was a disease not known long since ; for that none of the ancient physicians made any mention of this maladie ; whereas they travelled and busied their braines, to treat of other small trifling matters, (I wot not what) and yet such subtilties as the common sort could hardly comprehend. But I produced and alledged unto him for a witnesse out of philosophie, Athenodorus, who in the first booke of his Epidemiall or popular diseases, writeth, that not onely the said leprosie, but also Hydrophobie, that is to say, the feare of water, occasioned by the biting of a mad dogge, were first discovered in the daies of Aesclepiades : now as the companie there present, marvelled that these maladies should newly then begin, and take their consistence in nature ; so they wondered as much on the other side, how so great and grievous diseases could be hidden so long, and unknown to men : howbeit, the greater part inclined rather to this second & later opinion, as being more respective and favourable to man ; for that they could not be perswaded, that nature in such cases should in mans bodie (as it were in some citie) studie novelties, and be evermore inventing and working new matters. As for Diogenianus, he said, that the passions and maladies of the soule, held on their common course, and went the accustomed way still, of their predeceffours : And yet (quoth he) wickednesse is very manifold in sundry sorts, and exceeding audacious, to enterprise any thing : and the mind is a mistress of herselfe, and at her owne command ; having puissance to turne and change easilly as she thinketh good : and yet that disordinate confusion of hers, hath some order in it ; keeping a measure in her passions, and containing herselfe within certaine bounds, like as the sea, in the flowings and tides ; in such sort, as that she bringeth forth no new kinde of vice, such as hath not bene knownen unto those in olde time, and of which they have not written : for there being many different sorts of lusts and desires ; infinite motions of feare, as many kinds of paine, and no fewer formes of pleasure ; which would require great labour to reckon up, and not to give over.

*These neither now nor yesterday
Began, but all have lived ay :
And no man knowes, nor can say well,
Since when they first to men befell.*

nor yet whereupon any new maladie or moderne passion hath arisen in our body ; considering it hath not of it selfe the beginning of motion properly as the soule hath, but is knit and conjoined with nature by common causes, and composed with a certaine temperature : the infinite varietie whereof, wandereth notwithstanding within the pourprife of set bounds and limits ; like unto a vessell which lying at anchor in the sea, nevertheless doth wave, and is tossed within a round compasse : for neither the fester constitution of a disease is without some cause, bringing into the world irregularly and against all law of nature, a generation and power from that which hath no being at all : nor an easie matter is it for a man to finde out a new cause, unless withall, he do set downe a new aire, strange water, and such meats as our forefathers never tasted of, imagining, that they are run hither to us now and never before, out of (I wot not what) other worlds ; or imaginative inter-worlds and spaces betwene ; for sicke wee fall by meanes of the same things whereof we live ; and no peculiar and proper seeds therbe of diseases ; but the naughtinesse and corruption of such things whereby wee live, in regard of us, and our owne faults and errors besides, about them, are they which trouble and offend nature : these troubles have perpetually the same differences, though the same many times take new names ; for these names are according to the ordinance and custome of men ; but the maladies themselves are the affections of nature : and so those diseases of themselves finite, being varied & diversified by these names infinite, have deceived and beguiled us : and as there is not lightly and upon a sudden, committed in the Grammaticall parts of speech, or in the Syntaxis, and construction thereof, any new barbarisme, solecisme, or incongruities ; even so the temperatures of mens bodies, have their falles, errors and transgressions, which be certaine and determinate, considering that in some sort, even those things which are against nature, be comprised and included in nature : and this is it, that the witty inventors and devisers of fables, would signifie in saying : That when the giants made warre against the gods, there were ingendered certaine strange and monstrous creatures every way, at what time as the moone was turned cleane contrary, and arose not as she was wont : and verily, their meaning was, that nature produced new maladies, like unto monsters, but withall, imagine and devise a cause of such change and alteration, that is neither probable nor yet incredible ; but pronouncing and affirming, that the augmentation more or lesse of some diseases, causeth that newnesse and diversitie in them, which is not well done of them (my good friend Philo :) for this intention and augmentation may well addetherto frequency and greatnesse ; but surely it transporteth not the subject thing out of the first and primitive kinde : and thus I suppose the leprosie or Elephantiasis to be nothing els, but the vehemencie of these scurvie and scabbie infections ; as also the Hydrophobie, or vaine feare of water, no other but an augmentation of the passions of stomacke or melancholie : and verily, a wonder it were, that we should not know how Homer was not ignorant hereof ; for this is certaine, that he called a dogge λυσιπτερος, of this raging accident whereto he is subject : and hereupon men also, when they are in a rage, be said likewise λυσιπτεροι. When Diogenianus had thus discoursed, Philo himselfe, both seemed somewhat to answer and refuse his reasons ; and also requested me to speake in the behalfe of the ancient physicians, who were thus challenged and condemned for their ignorance or negligence in these principall matters, in case it were true, that these maladies were not of a later breed and more moderne than their age. First therefore, it seemed unto me, that Diogenianus put not this well downe for a good supposal, that tensions and relaxations, according to more or lesse, make no differences, nor remove the subject matters out of their kinde : for by this meanes we should likewise say, that vineger differed not from wine that is souring, nor bitternesse from stypticitie or sourenesse, nor damell from wheat, ne yet garden mints from the wilde mint : but evident it is, that these do degenerate, yea, and become altered in their very qualities ; partly by relaxations, as the things doe languish and lose their heart ; and in part, by tension, as they be reenforced, and take vigor : for otherwise, we must be forced to say, that the flame differeth not from a white or cleere winde, nor a light from a flame, nor frost from dew, nor haile from raine ; but that all these be but the inforcements onely and tensions of the same things ; and so constantly we shall be driven to affirme, that blindness and dimme sight differ not, and inordinate passion of vomiting, called Cholera, is nothing different from a keekish stomacke and a desire to cast, but onely according to augmentation and diminution, more or lesse : and all this is nothing to the purpose ; for if they admit and say ; that this very tension and augmentation in vehemencie, came but now of late, as if this novelty were occasioned by the quantitie and not the qualitie, yet the absurditie of the paradox remaineth nevertheless : moreover, seeing that Sophocles (speaking of those things, which because they had not bene in times past, men would not beleeve to be at this present) said very well in this wise :

*All kind of things both good and bad,
Once at the first their being had.*

This also seemeth very probable and to stand with great reason, that maladies ran not forth all at once, as if the barriers had bene set open for the race, and they let out together: but some came alwaies successively behinde at the taile of others, and each one tooke the first beginning at a certaine time: And a man may well conjecture and guesse (quoth I) that such as arose of want and indigence, as also those that came of heat and colde, were the first that assailed our bodies; but repletions, gluttonies, and delicate pleasures, came afterwards together with sloth and idleness; which by reason of abundance of victuals, caused great store of superfluities and excrements, from whence proceeded sundry sorts of maladies; the complication whereof and intermixture one with another, bringeth evermore some new thing or other: for every naturall thing, is orderly, and limited; because that nature is nothing els but order it selfe, or at leastwise the worke of order: whereas disorder (like to the fame that Pindarus speake of) is infinit, and can not be comprised within any certaine number; so that whatsoever is unnaturall, the same immediatly is unlimited and infinit: for, the truth we can not deliver but one way; marie to lie, a man may finde an infinit number of meanes, by occasion of innumerable occurrents; also accords muscical and harmonies, stand upon their certaine proportions; but the errors that men commit in playing upon the harpe or other instrument, in song, and in dauncing, who is able to comprehend? although Phrynichus the tragedian poet said of himselfe thus:

*In dance I finde as many sorts
And formes of gestures and disports,
As waves in sea, and billowes strong Arise by tempest all might long.*

And Chrysippus writeth that the divers complications of ten propositions, which they call Axioms, and no more, surmount the number of ten hundred thousand: but Hipparchus reprooved this, and taught that the affirmative doth containe of connexed propositions, one hundred thousand, and besides, one thousand fortie and nine; but the negative of the same propositions comprehendeth three hundred and ten thousand, with a surplusage of nine hundred, fiftie and two: and Xenocrates hath set downe, that the number of syllables, which the letters in the alphabet, being coupled and combined together, do afford, amount to the number of one hundred millions, and two hundred thousand over: why should it therefore bee thought strange and wonderfull, that our body having in it so many faculties, and gathering still daily, by that which it eateth and drinketh, so many different qualities, considering withall, that it useth motions and mutations, which keepe not one time nor the same order alwaies; the complications and mixtures of so many things together, bring evermore new and unusuall kinds of maladies, such as Thucydides wrot, was the pestilence at Athens, conjecturing that this was no ordinarie and usuall maladie, by this especially, for that the beasts of prey, which otherwise did eat of flesh, would not touch a dead bodie: those also who fell sicke about the red sea (as Agathircides maketh report) were afflicted with strange symptoms and accidents, which no man had ever read or seene, and among others, that there crawled from them certaine vermin like small serpents, which did eat the calves of their legs and the brawnes of their armes; and looke whensoever a man thought to touch them, in they would againe, and winding about the muskles of the flesh, ingendered inflammations and impostumes with intolerable paine. This pestilent disease, no man ever knew before, neither was it ever seene since by others, but by them alone, like as many other such accidents; for there was a man who having bene a long time tormented with the disurie or difficultie of his urine, delivered in the end by his yard, a barley straw knotted as it was with joints: and we know a friend and guest of ours, a yong man, who together with a great quantitie of naturall seed, cast forth a little hairie worme or vermin with many feet, and therewith it ranne very swiftly: Aristotle writeth also, that the nourse of one Timon of Cilicia, retired her selfe for two moneths space every yeere, and lurked in a certaine cave all the while, without drinke or meat, or giving any other apparence of life, but onely that shee tooke her breath: certes recorded it is in the Melonian books, that it is a certaine signe of the liver diseased, when the sicke partie is verie busie in spying, seeking, and chafing the mice and rats about the house; a thing that now a daies is not seene: let us not marvell therefore, if a thing be now engendered that never was seene before, and the same afterward cease as if it had never bene; for the cause lieth in the nature of the bodie, which sometime taketh one temperature, and one while another: but if Diogenianus bring in a new aire, and a strange water, let him alone, seeing he

he is so disposed: and yet we know well that the followers of Democritus both say, and write, that by the worlds which perish without this, and by the strange bodies which from that infinitie of worlds runne into this, there arise many times the beginnings of plague and pestilence, yea and of other extraordinary accidents: we will passe over likewise the particular corruptions which happen in divers countries, either by earthquakes, excessive droughts, extreme heats, and unusuall raines, with which it cannot be chozen, but that both winds and rivers which arise out of the earth, must needs be likewise infected, diseased, and altered: but howsoever those causes wee let goe by, yet omit we must not, what great alterations and changes be in our bodies, occasioned by our meats and viands, and other diet and usage of our selves; 10 for many things which before time were not wont to bee tasted or eaten, are become now most pleasant dainties; as for example; the drinke made of honie and wine; as also the delicate dish of a farrowing swines shape or wombe; as for the braine of a beast, it is said, that in old time they were wont to reject and cast it from them, yea, and so much to detest and abhorre it, that they would not abide to heare one to name it; and for the cucumber, the melon or pompion, the pomecitron and pepper, I know many oldfolke at this day, that cannot away with their taste: credible it is therefore, that our bodies receive a woonderfull change and strange alteration by such things in their temperature, acquiring by little and little a divers qualitie, and superfluities of excrements farre different from those before: sensibly wee are to beleieve that the change of order in our viands, maketh much heereto; for the services at 20 the boord, which in times past were called the coldtables, to wit, of oysters, sea-urchings, Greene fallads of raw lettuce, &c such other herbs, as it were the light forerunners of the feast, as transferred now by Plato, from the rearward to the forefront, and have the first place, whereas before in old time, they came in last: a great matter there is also in those beavers or fore-drinkings called Propomatus, for our ancients would not drinke so much as water before they did eat; and now a daies, when as men are otherwise fasting &c have eat nothing, they will be in maner drunke, & after they have well drenched their bodies, they begin to fall unto their meats, and whiles they be yet boiling, they put into the stomacke those things that bee attenuant, incisive and flatuic, for to provoke and stirre up the appetite, and still fill themselves up full with other viands: but none of all this hath more power to make mutation in our bodies, nor to breed new maladies, 30 than the varietie of sundry fashions, of bathing of flesh: for first & formost it is made soft, liquid, and fluid as iron is by the fire, and afterwards it receiveth the temper and tincture of hard Steele, by cold water: so that methinks if any one of those who lived a little before us should see the dore of our stoupes and baines open, he might say thus:

*Heere into runneth Achéron,
And fire-like burning Phlegethon,*

Whereas in our forefathers daies, they used their bathes and hot-houses, so milde, so kinde, and temperate: that king Alexander the Great, being in a fever, lay and slept within them: yea the Gauls wives, bringing thither their pots of pottage, and other viands, did eat even there with their children, who bathed together with them: but it seemeth in these daies, that those who 40 are within the stoupes and baines, be like unto those that are raging madde, and baile as dogs, they puffe and blow like fed swine, they lay about them and tosse every way; the aire that they draw in, as it were mingled with fire & water, suffereth no piece nor corner of the body in quiet and rest, it shaketh, tosseth, and remooveth out of place, the least indivisible parcell thereof, untill such time as we come to quench and allay the same thus inflamed and boiling as they doe: There is no need therefore ô Diogenianus (quoth I) of foren and farre fetched causes from without, neither of those new worlds and intervals betwene: for to goe no further than to our selves, the very change onely of the fashion of our diet, is a sufficient meane both to breed, and also to abolish and cause to ease any maladie in us.

THE TENTH QUESTION.

What is the reason that we take least heed of dreames in the end of Autumne, and give small credit unto them?

FORasmuch lighting upon physcally problemes or naturall questions of Aristotle, which were brought to Thermopyla, for to passe the time away, filled both himselfe with many doubts, as ordinarily men do, who are by nature studious, and also put as many into the heads of others, giving testimony heereto: Aristotle who saith: That much knowledge breedeth many occasions fions of doubt; as for other questions, they afforded unto us no unpleasant pastime and recreation, in the day time as we walked in the galleries abroad; but that probleme concerning dreams, (namely, that they be uncertein, lying, & false, especially during those months whē trees shed their leaves) was let on foot again (I wot not how) after supper by Phavorinus, when he had done with other discourses: As for your familiar companions my children, they were of opinion, that Aristotle, himselfe had sufficiently solved the question, & there needed no farther enquire into the matter, nor any speech more to be made thereof, but even to attribute the cause, as he did, to the new gathered fruits of that season: for being as they were, fresh and Greene still in their strength and full of vigour, they engendred in our bodies many ventosities and bred much trouble and agitation in the humours: for likely it is not, that new wine alone doth worke, 10 boile, and chaufe, nor that oile onely, being new drawn and pressed, yeeldeth a noise as it burneth in lampes, by occasion that the heat causeth the windinelle and spirit thereof to evaporate and walme out: but we see that come also newly inned, & all fruits of trees presently upon their gathering, are plump, full, and swelled againe, untill such time as they have exhaled forth all that is flatusous, and breathed out the crudities thereof: now that there be certeine meates that cause troublefome dreames, and engender turbulent visions and fancies in our sleepe, they brought in and alledged for their testimony the instance of beanes, and the head of the pulpe or pour-cuttle fish, which they are bidden to abstaine from, who would divine and foretnew things that come by dreames. As for Phavorinus, howsoever he was himselfe at all times wonderfully affected & addicted to Aristotle, and one who attributed unto the Peripateticks schole 20 this singular commendation, that their doctrine carried more probabilitie and resemblance of the truth, than other philosophers whatsoever; yet at this present he came out with an old rustie reason of Democritus, taken out of the smoake (where it had gathered a deale of thicke foot) for to furbish, scoure, and make it bright againe: for this was the vulgar opinion which Democritus put downe for a supposition: That certeine images doe enter and pierce deepe into our bodies thorough the pores, which as they rise againe from the bottome, cause those visions which appear unto us as we sleepe; that these came out of all parts wandering, as presented from utensils, habillemens, & plants, but principally from living creatures, for that they moove & stir much, and besides are hot, having not onely the expresse similitudes and fundry formes of bodies imprinted in them, as Epicurus thinketh (who thus farre forth followeth Democritus, and leaveth 30 him there) but also drawing therewith the apperances of the motions of the minde, of counsel, of uttall milde affections, as also of vehement passions, wherewith they entring in, doe speake as if they were living things, and distinctly carie unto those that receive the same, the opinions, the words, the discourses and affections of such as transmit the same, if in their entrance they reteine still the expresse figures and nothing confused; which they doe especially, all while that their way and passage thorough the aire, cleere and united, is speedy, quick, and not empeached by any hinderance: considering than, that the aire of the Autumnall quarter, in the end when as trees doe cast their leaves, hath much asperitie and inequality, it turneth aside and putteth by diversly those images, causing their evidence to be feeble and transitorie, as being 40 darkened by the tardity and slownesse of their pace in the way: whereas contrariwise, when they runne forth in great number, and swiftly out of those things that swell with fulnesse, and burne, as it were, with desire to be delivered of them, then as they passe they yeeld their resemblances all fresh and very significant. After this, calling his eie upon Autobulus, and smiling withall: Me thinks (quoth he) that I perceive you, and whose about you, to adresse your selves already for to maintaine a kinde of fight against these images, & that you meane to fasten with your hands and catch hold of this old opinion, as if it were some rotten picture, to doe it some violence: Goe to (quoth Autobulus) will you never leave these fashions, to play with us in this manner for wee know well enough iwis, that you hold and approve the opinion of Aristotle, and that for to give a lustre thereunto, you have set this of Democritus by it, as a shadow 50 and foile: that conceit therefore of Democritus, we will turne over and put by, and take in hand for to impugneth this reason of Aristotles, which imputeth all to these new fruits, and unjustly without all reason, blaming & discrediting that which we all love so well; for both Summer & Autumn will beare witness, that when we eat these fruits, more fresh and Greene, even at such time as they are most succulent, and verdant: (as Antimachus said) our dreames are lesse lying and deceitfull: but these months which we name, the Fall of the leafe, pitching their tents as it were, and taking up their standings close to the Winter, have reduced already, both come of the field, and also the fruits of trees, which remaine uneaten by their perfect concoction, to this this passe that they looke slender, and in some fort rived, as having lost by this time, that violent, beady, and furious force which was in them. As touching new wine, they that drinke it soonest, doe it in the moneth * Anthisteron, that is to say, Februarie, presently after winter, and that day upon which they begin to taste it, we in our country call ephebe shuaves, that is to say, the day of good fortune; but the Athenians name it, of opening their tunnes or wine vessels, Pithagias: but so long as the Must or new wine is working still, and in the heat, we see, that all men even the very artificers and labourers are afraid to taste of it, and to meddle withall: let us forbear therefore to slander and blame the good gifts of the gods, and goe we rather another way to worke for the inquisition of the cause, unto which the very name of the season, and of these 10 windic and vaine dreames doth lead us: for this time is called anthisteron, that is to say, the fall of the leafe, to wit, the end of Autumne; when by reason of cold, and drinessse, trees shedde their leaves, unlesse it be some which are hot and fatty, by nature, as the olive, the lawrell, and the date trees, or very moist, as the ivie and myrtle; for such as these, their temperature helpeth, others not, by reason that this glutinous humour which holdeth the leaves upon the tree, continueth not; because that their naturall humiditie is congealed with cold, or else dried up, being so feeble and little withall: to flourish therefore, to grow, and to be fresh, in plants, and much more in living creatures, commeth of moisture and heat; and contrariwise, cold & drinessse are deadly enemies: & therefore Homer very properly, is wont to call men who are fresh and lusty shups, that is to say, moist and succulent; as also to joy and be merry, he expresseth by the verbe laibos, that is to say, to be hot; contrariwise, that which is dolorous and fearefull, he termeth ephebe or ephebe, that is to say, stiffe & starke for cold; a bodie that is dead, he termeth chthon, that is to say, without moisture; as also chthon, that is to say, a verie anatomy, died in the smoake, or against the sunne; which are two words devised to traduce & note their extreme drinessse: moreover, blood which is the thing within us, of principall strength & vertue, is both hot and moist; but old age is destitute both of the one and the other: now it seemeth that the later end of Autumne is the very age of the yere, having performed his revolution; for as yet the moisture is not come, but the heat is gone already, or at leastwise is very feeble, & that (which is a great signe of cold & drinessse) this season causeth bodies to be disposed unto diseases. This being laid on a ground, necessary it is that the soule should have a sympathy & fellow 30 feeling of the indispositions of the bodie, & that when the spirits be incaffate & thickened, and the powre and facultie of divination or foreseeing future things, must needs be dimmed and dulled, much like as a mirrour or looking glasse, overcast with some thicke mist: no marvell therefore if it send and transmit nothing in phantasie and imaginations, that is plaine, expresse, articulate, evident, and significant, so long as it is rough and unpolished, not smooth and resplendent.

5 What

- 5 What was the reason of Plato, when hee said, that the soule of Ajax, came in the 20. place to the lot?
- 6 What is covertly signified by the fable wherein Neptune is feigned to be vanquished? and why the Athenians put out of their kalender the second day of August?
- 7 What is the cause that the accords in musicke are divided into a ternarie?
- 8 Wherein differ the intervals, melodious, and accordants in musicke?
- 9 What is it that maketh accord or symphony? and what is the reason that when a man striketh two strings accordant together, the melodie is more base?
- 10 How it cometh to passe that the ecliptick revolutions of sunne and moone, being in number equal, yet the moone is seene to be oftner eclipsed than the sunne?
- 11 Thus we continue not alwaies one and the same, for that our substance evermore passeth still away.
- 12 Whether is more probable of the ruaine, that the starres be in number even or odd.
- 13 A question of contrary lawes and covenants, drawen out of the third booke of the Rhapsodie of Homers Iliad.
- 14 Of the number of the Muses, cerseine discourses and reasons, not after a vulgar and common manner delivered.
- 15 That there be three parts of dauncing, * motion, gesture, and shew; and what each of these is: also what communie there is betwene the art of poetrie, and the skill in dauncing.

THE NINTH BOOKE OF Symposiaques or banquet-discourses.

The Proëme.

His ninth booke of Symposiaques (so Sofus Senecio) containeth the discourses held at Athens, during the festivall solemnities of the Muses; for that this number of nine, forth and agreeth well with the said Muses. Now if the number of questions handled in this booke, surmount the ordinarie Decade of the former books, you are nothing to marvell thereat, because we ought to render unto the Muses all that apperteineth unto the Muses, without taking away or deteinuing ought from them, no more than from holy sacrifices; considering that we owe unto them many things besides, and the same more beautifull than this.

THE FIRST QUESTION.

Of verses cited and pronounced in season and to good purpose, or otherwise.

Ammunius being captaine of the citie of Athens, was desirous in favour of Diogenius to take view and knowledge, how the young men profited, who were students in Grammar, Geometrie, Rhetoricke and Musicke; whereupon he invited to supper, the most famous regents and masters, that were thoroughout the whole citie. There met also with them, and were present, many other learned and studious persons, in great frequentie, yea, and in maner all his friends and familiars: As for Achilles, verily, at the funerall games and solemnities of Patroclus, he had onely those to sup with him, who had fought hand to hand in single combat to the utterance, with this intent (as it is said) that if haply there had bene any choler or heat of revenge inkindled and inflamed betwene these men, while they were in armes, they should now lay downe and quit the same, meeting thus at one feast, eating and drinking together at one table: but it hapned the same contrary at this time unto Ammonius; for the jealousie, contention, and emulation of cleane contrary at this time unto Ammonius; for the jealousie, contention, and emulation of these schoolemen and masters of art aforesaid, became the hotter, and grew to the height amid their cups; for by this time, they fell to argue, yea, and to challenge and defie one another, reasoning, and disputing without all order or judgement: whereupon, at the first he commanded the musician Eraton, to sing unto the harpe; who began his song in this wise, out of the works of Hesiodus:

Of quarrell and contention,
There were as then, more sorts than one.

for which I commended him, in that he knew how to applie the dittie of his song so well unto the present time; which gave occasion afterwards unto Ammonius of this argument; namely, to discourse of verses in season, and to good purpose pronounced; saying: That herein there appeared not onely a good grace, but also ensued otherwhiles great commoditie thereof. And presently every mans mouth was full of that Rhapsodian poet; who at the marriage of king Proteus, when he espoused his owne sister, and was thought herein to commit a strange and unlawfull act, began his song with these verses out of Homer:

- 10 Great Jupiter, to Juno then, did call His sister deere and wedded wife withall.
as also another, who being to sing after supper before king Demetrius, at what time as he sent unto him his sonne Philip, being as yet a very infant, came readily forth with these verses:
Thy child, see that you well bring up in vertuous discipline;
As fits the race of Hercules, and keepe a some of mine.

Anaxarchus likewise, when Alexander at supper time flung apples at him, arose from the boord, rehearsing this verse out of Euripides:

- 20 Some god one day, in veritie
By mortall hand shall wounded be.

But most excellently of all others, a Corinthian lad, who being led away prisoner, as the citie was forced and lost, when Ammonius taking a survey of those children who were free borne, commanded as many of them as had any knowledge in literature, for to write before him, wrote extempore these verses:

Thrice and foure times those Greeks were blest, I say,
Whose hap it was, to die before this day.

And by report Ammonius took such ruth and compassion heereat, that he shed teares, and for this youtnes sake, set at libertie as many as were of his kined and alliance. There was remembered also, the wife of Theodorus the tragedian, who when the time drew neere, that such poets and actors were to strive for the best game, would not suffer him to lie with her; but after he was returned home from the theater, where he had gotten the victorie, and gained the prize, when he came toward her, she kissed and welcomed him home with these verses:

O noble sonne of Agamemnon, now
To do with me your will, good leave have you.

Semblably, some there were in place, who heereupon inferred many other verses as unfitly alledged, and altogether out of season; for that it was not thought amisse or unprofitable, both to know the same, and to beware thereby; and namely, that which is reported concerning Pompeius Magnus, when he returned from a great expedition and warlike voiage, unto whom his little daughter was presented by her schoolemaster; and for to shew unto him how he had profited in learning, when a booke was brought unto her, the said schoolemaster opened it, and turned to this place for her to reade, which beginneth thus:

From warre thou art returned safe and sound,
Would God, thou hadst bene there lefthead on ground.

Also, when uncerteine newes (without any head or author) was brought unto Cassius Longinus, that his sonne was dead in a strange country, so as he could neither know the truth, nor yet do away the doubtfull suspition thereof, there came an vaine bruit and headlesse rumor, raised (no doubt) by some malicious person; as if you neither had knowen nor read this sentence:

- 50 No publicke fame, nor vox populi
Was ever known in vaine to die.

As for him, who when a Grammarian in the idle of Rhodes, called for a theame, to varie upon, and to shew thereby his learning before the people in a frequent theater, gave him this verse:

Arise out of this isle, I do thee read,
Most wicked wretch that lives, and that with speed.

it is hard to say, whether he did it of purpose, contumeliously, to deride this poore Grammarian.

rian, or committed an error against his will? But to conclude this discourse of verses inserted aptly and otherwise alleged, did very pretily appease the stirre and tumult among the regents and masters of art above said.

THE SECOND QUESTION AND THE THIRD.

What is the cause why Alpha, (or A) was ranged first of all other letters? as also, what proportion, the number of vowels and semi-vowels hath bene composed and ordained?

Whereas the use and custome was at Athens, during the foresaid feasts in the honour of the Muses, that lots should be carried round about the city, and they that chaunced by drawing to be matched together, propound one unto another questions of learning: Ammonius fearing lest some professors of one and the same art, should be committed in opposition together, tooke this order, and ordeined, that without any lottery at all, a Geometrician might propose a question unto a Grammarian; the Rhetorician unto a Musician, and so reciprocally answer them againe by turnes: Heereupon Hermias the Geometrician put forth first unto Protagoras the Grammarian, a question, urging him to tell the cause, why, A was set foremost of all the letters? who rendred unto him a reason which goeth for currant in the schooles: For this is certaine (quoth he) that vowels may claime by a most just title, the place before all consonants, whether they be mute or semi-vowels: and seeing that of vowels some be long, others short, and a third sort doubtfull, and as they say, of a double time: these of the last kinde, ought by good right to be esteemed of greater worth and puissance than the rest; and of them, that is, to have and hold the place of a capitaine, which in composition and making of a diphthong, goeth alwaies before the other two, and never commeth behinde; and that is Alpha, which neither secondeth iota, or upsilon so, as that it will in such composition yeeld or helpe to make one syllable of those twaine: but in a kinde of anger and indignation, leape backe againe unto her proper place: contrariwise, set Alpha with whether you will of the other two, so as the may goe before, she will accord very well, and both together will make one entire syllable, as we may see in these words, αἰώνιος, αἰώνιος, as also in αἰώνιος, and an infinit number of others: thus in these three respects she hath the victorie, and carrieth the prize, like unto those champions who are winners in Quinquettum, or the five severall games, for she hath the vantage above the multitude of other letters, in that she is a vowel above vowels, because she hath two times, as being one while long, and another while short, and even of these double timed vowels she hath the preeminence, by reason that she standeth alwaies before, and never followeth or commeth behinde others.

When Protagoras had made an end of his speech, Ammonius called unto me by name and said: How now Plutarch, wilt thou say Cadmus, being (as you are) a Boeotian as he was? for it is said, that he placed Alpha before all other letters, for that Alpha in the Phœnician language signifieth a bee, reputed among them, not in the second or third place, according to Hesiodus, but 40 even the very first and principall of necessarie mooveables belonging to a man: Nor I (quoth he) for I am bound to succour (what I can) mine owne grand-father, rather than the very grand-fire of Bacchus; for my grand-father Lamprus was wont to say: That the first distinct and articulate voice which a man pronounceth, is by the power of Alpha; seeing that the breath and spirit within the mouth, is formed principally by the motion of the lips, which as they are opened and divided a sunder, yeeld by that simple overture this voice first, which of all others likewise is most simple, and performed with least adoe, calling neither for the tongue to helpe it, nor waiting for the use thereof, but issueth forth; even when it lieth still and stirreth not out of the owne place: and therefore it is the first voice that infants utter: heereupon also commeth this word αἰώνιος in Greeke, which signifieth as much as to heare any voice, for that alwaies such a sound as A is usually heard: yea, and many other like vocables, as αἰώνιος, that is to say, to sing; αἰώνιος, that is to say, to pipe; and αἰώνιος, to cry or holla; yea and these words αἰώνιος to elevate or lift up, and αἰώνιος, that is to say, to open: not without good cause tooke these names upon the deduction and lifting up of the lips, whereby such a sound as A, is let forth, and falleth out of the mouth, and therefore the names of other mute consonants, all save one, are helped by this A, which serveth as a light to cleere their blindness: for there is but Phi, or P only only, wherein the power of this letter or sound is not employed: as for Phi and Chi, the one of them is P, and the other K, pronounced with (h) or an aspiration.

Heereunto when Hermias said, that he approved well of both reasons: Why doe not you then (quoth I) expound and deliver unto us, what is the proportion if there be any, in the number of letters; for in mine opinion there is, which I collect by this argument, in that the multitude of mute consonants and semi-vowels, in regard one of another, as also in respect of vowels, ariseth not so by chance, but according to the first proportion which we call Arithmetically, for there being 9 and 8. it commeth to passe that the middle number betweene, as it is surmounted one, so it is equally surmounted of the other, and the two extremes being brought together, the greater in respect of the lesse, beareth the just proportion of the number of mutes, to that of Apollo; for 9. is attributed to the muses, like as 7. to Apollo, which being joined together, make the duple of that which is in the middes, to wit, of 8. and that by good reason; for that the semi-vowels betweene both, doe participate the power and efficacy of the extremes, to wit, mutes and vowels; according to the figure here represented:

Mutes. Semi-vowels. Vowels.

Mercurie (quoth hee) was the first god who found our letters in Aegypt: therefore the Aegyptians when they would represent the first letter, doe paint Ibis, a fowle dedicated to Mercurie: but not well in my judgement, thus to give the precedence and superiority of all other letters unto a beast that uttereth neither voice nor sound at all: Moreover, unto Mercurie is consecrated of all numbers, the quaternarie especially, and many there be who have written, that borne he was upon the fourth day of the month: now if you multiply fowre by fower, you arise to sixteene, the just number of those first letters which were called Phœnician, invented first by Cadmus. Of the other letters which afterwards were added to the rest, Palmides devised one fowre; and Simonides put thereto another fowre: moreover, the first perfect number of all others is 3. as having a beginning, a middle, and an end: after it the number of 6. because it is known very well to be equal in all the parts thereof: of these now, if 6. be multiplied by 4. and the first quadrat or cube (8) by the first perfect number (3) they bring forth 24. the full number of all the letters in the alphabet. Whiles he thus spake still, Zopyrion the Grammarian was perceived evidently to laugh at him and mumble somewhat betweene his teeth secretly: but so soone as he had made an end of speech, he could hold no longer but out hee spake and said: That all this was nothing else but frivolous bibble-babble: For that (quoth Zopyrion) there can no sound reason at all be given, but even by adventure and chaunce it fell out, that so many letters there were, and those placed in such order as they be: Like as (quoth he) that the first verse of Homer's Iliad, should containe so many syllables just, as the first of his Odyssea: and againe, that the last of the one, should answer in number of syllables even, to the last of the other, is altogether a casual thing, hapning so by meere fortune and not otherwise.

THE FOURTH QUESTION.

Whether hand it was of Venus that Diomedes wounded?

After this, when Hermias addressed himselfe to propose unto Zopyrion a question, we inhibited and staied him. But Maximus the Rhetorician, came with a long fetch a farre off 50 out of Homer, and demanded of him: Whether hand it was of Venus that Diomedes wounded? With that Zopyrion to quit him againe, asked him presently: Of whether legge king Philip haulted? The case quoth Maximus is not all one and the same: for Demosthenes hath left unto us no meanes for to answer this question: but if you confesse once that you know not, others there be who will shew you the very place where Homer telleth them who have any wit to conceive, which hand of hers was hurt? Zopyrion at this speech seemed to be astonied and stand in a maze: whereupon whiles he held his peace, we requested Maximus, to point unto us the place afore said:

aforesaid: First and formost (quoth Maximus then) considering that the verses runne in this wife:

*Then leapt aside bold Tidesus sonne, and traversing his ground,
stept so, and with sharpe pointed speare,
her hand aloft did wound.*

It is plaine and evident; that if he had meant to have smitten her left hand; hee needed not to have leapt at one side; for he had the left hand of Venus just opposite unto his owne right hand, when he directly affronted her: and more propable it is, and stands to greater reason, that his intent was to hurt the stronger hand, and that which held Aeneas her sonne, whom shee seemed with violence to carie away, and which being wounded, the might be forced to forgoe her hold, and let his body goe. Secondly, when Venus was returned up into heaven, Minerva by way of scoffing, laughed at her, and said to Jupiter in this wife:

*No doubt, faire Venus hath suborn'd some Greekeish dame to love,
And follow one of these Tröy knights, whom she affects above
All other wights: and whiles she stroak't this lady gently, see,
Her soft hand met with some gold clasp, and so came ras'd to bee.*

And verily I suppose, that even your selfe good sir, an excellent regent and professour as you are, if at any time you would seeme in making much of one of your scholars; to stroke and softly to handle him, will not doe it with your left hand, but with the right; and even so, verie like it is, that Venus, the most gentle and courteous goddesse of all others, in this manner dealt with the Grecian ladies, when she perswaded them unto her minde.

THE FIFTH QUESTION.

What is the reason that Plato said, how the soule of Ajax came to the lot, in the 20. place. 30

THis prettie discourse aforesaid, pleased the whole company, and made them all merrie, but one Grammarian named Hylas, whom Sofus a professour in Rhetoricke, seeing to sit all silent, sad and heavy, (for that in deed he had spied not very well, whensoever he made prooffe of his scholars proceedings) came out with these verses aloud:

Ajax soule, the sonne of Telamon, Remained still, and all alone.

and the rest of the verses following, he delivered in an higher note than ordinat, and rehearsed them aloft unto him, in this wife:

But now good sir come hither, that my words you may well heare, Repreſſe your ire, this anger quench, and tame your moodie cheere.

But Hylas grumbling still in anger, bewaierd no lesse by his crosse and impertinent answer, saying: That the ghost of Ajax in hell, tooke her turne in the 20. place, and her lot was according to Plato, to be transmuted into the nature of a lion: But for mine owne part (quoth he) I thinke many times of the old mans saying in the comedie:

*Better it were an asse to bee
Indeed, than for a man to see Those live prefer'd in worldly pelfe,
Who are for woorth behinde himselfe.*

Heereat Sofus laughing heartily: But I beseech you good Hylas (quoth hee) meane while that we are turning into asses, and taking pack-saddles on our backs (if you regard and respect any thing the honour of Plato) declare unto us the reason, why hee said: That the soule of Ajax (him I meane who was Telamons sonne) came in the twentieth place to have her choice from the lottery? Which when Hylas flatly refused to doe, (for he thought that they made a mocking flocke of him, because he had but bad successe in his former trials:) my brother tooke the matter in hand: And what say you (quoth he) to this? may it not bee, for that Ajax caried the name alwaies for beautie, greatnesse and valour,

Next after Peleus sonne (I say.)

Who was sent peere for prowess ay?

And you know that twentie makes up the second decade; and the decade or number of ten is of all numbets principall and most puissant, like as Achilles was among the princes of the Greeks. With that we al set up a laughter: Then Ammonius, Well (quoth he) Lamprias, you are disposed thus to jest and play with Hylas butface of your owne accord, you have undertaken the charge, to deliver the cause hereof, let us intreat you to impart it unto us; not by way of sport and merriment, but in good earnest. Lamprias was at the first not a little troubled at this challenge; but after he had paused, and thought upon the matter a while, in the end he spake to this effect: It is an ordinary thing (quoth he) with Plato, to play with us many times merrily, by certeine devised names that hee useth: but whensoever hee inserteth some fable in any treatise of the soule, he doth it right soberly, and hath a deepe meaning, and profound sense therein: for the intelligent nature of heaven, he calleth, a Chariot volant, to wit, the harmonick motion and revolution of the world: and heere in this place whereof we are now in question (to wit, in the end of the tenth booke of his Common-wealth) he bringeth in a messenger from hell, to relate newes of that which he had there himselfe seene; and calleth him by the name of Era, a Pam-phylian borne, and the sonne of Armenius, giving us covertly (by an ænigmaticall conveyance) thus much to understand: That our soules are engendred by harmonie, & so joined to our bodies, but when they be disjoined, and separate from them, they runne together all into aire from every side, and so returne againe from thence unto second generations: what should hinder then but this word * ερασ, was put downe by him, not to shew a truth whereof he spake, but rather ερασ, as a probable speech, and conjectural fiction, or else, a thing spoken (as it should seeme) to a dead bodie, and so uttered * vainly and at a venture in the aire: for Plato alwaies toucheth three causes, as being the philosopher who either first knew, or principally understood how fatal destiny is mingled with fortune: and againe, how our freewill is wont to be joined with either of them, or is complicate with both: and now in this place before cited, hee sheweth excellently well, what power each of these causes hath in our humane affaires, attributing the choice and election of our life unto free will, (for vertue and vice befree, and at the command of no lord) and trying to the necessitie of fatal destiny, a religious life to Godward in them, who have made a good choise, and contrariwise in those who have made a choise of the worst: but the cadences or chaunces of lots, which being cast at a venture, and lighting here and there, without order, befall to every one of us, bring in fortune, and preoccupare or prevent much of that which is ours, by the sundry educations or governments of common-wealth, wherein it hapneth each of us to live: for this I would have every one of you to consider, whether it bee not meere folly and without all reason, to seeke for a cause of that which is done by fortune and casually; for if lot should seeme to come by reason, there were to be imputed no more to fortune or adventure, but all to some fatal destiny or providence.

30 While Lamprias delivered this speech, Marcus the Grammarian, seemed to count and number (I wot not) what upon his fingers to himselfe apart: but when he had made an end, the said Marcus named aloud all those soules or spirits which are called out in Homers Nereys: Among which (quoth he) the ghost onely of Eupenor wandering still in the middle confines, is not reckoned with those beneath in another world, for that his bodie as yet is not interred and committed to the earth: as for the soule of Tiresias also, it seemeth not to be numbered with the rest,

*To whom now dead Proserpina, above the rest did give,
This gift alone right wise to be,
although he did not live.*

as also the power to speake with the living, and to understand their state and affaires, even before he had drunke the blood of sacrificed beasts: If then (quoth hee) Lamprias you substract these two, and count the rest, you shall finde that the soule of Ajax was just the twentieth of those which presented themselves to Ulysses; and heereunto alluded Plato, as it should seeme by way of mirth, joining his fable together with that evocation of spirits, otherwife called Nereys in Homers Odyssey.

THE SIXTH QUESTION.

What is covertly meant by the fable, wherein Neptune is feigned to have bene vanquished: as also, why the Athenians take out the second day of the moneth, August?

NOW when the whole company were grown to a certeine uprore, Menephyllus a Peripateticke philosopher calling unto Hylas by name: You see (quoth he) now, that this question was not propounded by way of mockerie and contumelious flouting: but you my good friend (leaving this froward and mal-contented Ajax, whose name as Sophocles saith, is ominous, and of ill presage) betake your selfe unto Neptune, and side with him a while; who is wont to recount unto us himselfe, how he hath bene oftentimes overcome; to wit, in this city, by Minerva; at Delphi, by Apollo; in Argos, by Juno; in Aegina, by Jupiter; and in Naxos, by Bacchus; and yet in all his repulses, disfavours, and infortunities, he bare himselfe alwaies mild, and gentle, caring no ranckor or malice in his heart: for prooffe heereof, there is even in this city a temple common to him and Minerva, in which there standeth also an altar dedicated to Oblivion: Then Hylas who seemed by this time more pleasantly disposed: But you have forgotten (quoth he) Menephyllus, that we have abolished the second day of the moneth, August, not in regard of the moone, but because it was thought to be the day upon which Ægeus, Lamprias and Minerva pleaded for the feignorie of this territorie of Attica. Now I assure you (quoth Lamprias) Ægeus was every way much more civill and reasonable than Thrasibulus, in case being not a winner as the other, but a loser, he could forget all grudge and malice.

A great breach and defect there is in the Greeke originall, wherein wanteth the farther handling of this question, as also 5. questions entier following, and a part of the 6. to wit.

- 7 Why the accords in musike are divided into three? 30
- 8 Wherein differ the intervals or spaces melodious, from those that be accordant?
- 9 What cause is it that maketh accord? and what is the reason that when one toucheth two strings accordant together, the melody is ascribed to the base?
- 10 What is the cause that the ellipticke revolutions of sunne and moone being in number equall, yet we see the moone ofner eclipsed than the sunne?
- 11 That we continue not alwaies one and the same, in regard of the daily deflux of our substance.
- 12 Whether of the twaine is more probable, that the number of starres is even or odde?

Of this twelfth question thus much remaineth as followeth.

Isander was wont to say: That children are to be deceived with cockall bones, but men with lothes: Then Glaucias, I have heard (quoth he) that this speech was used against Polyrates the tyrant; but it may be, that it was spoken also to others: But whereby do you demand this of me? Because verily (quoth Sophus) I see, that children snatch at such bones, & the Academiques catch at words: for it seemeth unto me, that these stomachs differ in nothing from them, who holding out their clutched filts, play at handy dandy, & aske whether they hold in their close hand even or odde: Then Protagoras, arose, and calling unto me by name: What aile we (quoth he) and what is come unto us that we suffer these Rhetoricians and oratours thus to brave it out, and to mocke others, being demanded nothing in the meane time, nor put to it for to contrabute their skot and part unto this conference and these discouries? unless peradventure they 50 will come in with this plea, that they have no part of this table talke, in drinking wine, as being those who admire and follow Demoisthenes, who in all his life time never dranke wine: This is not the cause (quoth I) but the reason is, because we have spurred them no questions: but if you have no better thing to aske, I will propose unto them a case of repugnancie in contrarie lawes or condicions, and the same drawn out of Homer.

THE THIRTEENTH QUESTION.

A question as touching repugnant lawes, taken out of the third Rhapsodie or booke of Homers Ilias.

AND what is that case, demanded he againe? I will tell you (quoth I) and withall propose it unto these here: and therefore let them give attentive eare: Alexander Paris, in the third booke of Homers Ilias, giveth defiance to Menelaus, and chalengeth him to a single fight, 10 with certaine conditions protesting in this maner:

*Let us betwene both armies meet without,
My selfe I meane and Menelaus fount:
To try in single fight upon this plaine
To which of us by right shall appertaine Dame Helene, with her goods: For looke who shall Make good his ground, and quit himselfe withall
So bravely, that the victorie he gaine,
Have he her selfe, and jewels in domaine.*

Hector againe publishing unto all, and declaring as well to Greeks as Trojanes the same chalenge and defiance of his brother Paris, useth in maner the verie same words, saying: 20

*His meaning is, that Greeks and Trojanes all Besides should for the time surcease and quite Lay downe all armes upon the ground withall, Whiles he and Menelaus harry knight,
For Helen faire, and all her jewels fight:
And he that shall the better hand overeine,
With him both lady shall and goods remaine.*

Now when Menelaus had accepted of these conditions, and both sides were sworne to the articles accorded, Agamemnon to ratifie the same by his roiall assent, spake in this wise:

30 *If Alexander in plaine fight,
Shall Menelaus kill:
Dame Helene he may leade away,
and her goods at his will:
But say that Menelaus brave,
doe Alexander slay
The woman then and what she hath, let him streight have away.*

Now for that Menelaus vanquished Paris indeed, but yet bereft him not of his life; either side had good plea to defend their cause opposite unto their enemies: for the Greeks pretended a 40 right claime unto Helena, for that Paris was overcome: and the Trojanes impleaded and denied to redeliver her, because he was not left dead in the place: how shall this case then be decided and judged atight in so great a difference and contrarietie? Certes it belongeth not to Philosophers nor Grammarians alone; but it is for Rhetoricians also to determine heereof, who are both learned in Grammar and good letters; and withall, well scene in Philosophie, as you be. Then Sophus gave his opinion and said: That the cause and plea of the defendant challenged, was farre better and stronger, as having the law directly on his side: for the assailant and challenger himselfe, denounced under what conditions the combat should be performed; which seeing the defendant accepted of, and yielded unto, it lieth not in their power any more to adde ought thereto: for the condition comprised in the chalenge, caried no words imply- 50 ing slaughter or death of any sides; but the victory of the one, and the discomfiture of the other; and that with very great reason: for by right the lady belonged to the better man, and more valiant; and the more valorous man is he who vanquisheth: for otherwise it falleth out many times, that valiant and hardie men are slaine by very cowards; as afterwards Achilles himselfe chaunced to be killed by Paris with the shot of an arrow: neither will any man (I trow) say, that Achilles thus slaine, was the lesse valiant, or call this the victorie; but rather the good fortune of Paris unjustly dealt, whose happie it was to shoot so right; whereas on the other side, Hector was vanquished by Achilles, before he was slaine, for that he would not abide his comming, but 60

for

for feare abandoned his ground and fled: for he that refuseth combat and runneth away, is in plaine termes vanquished, & hath no excuse to palliate or cloake his defeatures; but flatly confesseth his enimie to be his better. And therefore trus, comming at first to Helena for to give her intelligence of this combat, saith unto her:

*They will in combat fight it out with long speares now for thee:
And looke who winnes the victory, his wife thou nam'st shalt be.*

And afterwards Jupiter himselfe adjudged the prize of victorie unto Menelaus in these words: 10
*Now plaine it is, the champion bold, for Menelaus hight, Hath quitted himselfe a man, and wonne
the prize in single fight.*

For it were a ridiculous mockerie to say: That Paris had conquered Achilles, because he stood behind a farre off, & with the shot of an arrow wounded him in the foote, who never was ware of him, nor so much as looked for any such thing; & that now when he refused combat, distrustful of himselfe, & ran out of the field like a coward, to shroud & hide himselfe within the bosome, & betweene the armes of a woman, being as a man would say disarmed and despoiled of his weapons, even whiles he was alive, his concurrent should not deserve to carie away the victorie, 20 showing himselfe the conquerour in open field; even according to the conditions offered by Paris the challenger. Then Glauco taking the matter in hand, impleaded and argued against him thus: First (quoth he) in all edicts, decrees, lawes, covenants and contracts, the last are reputed alwaies of greater validitie, and doe stand more firme than the former: but the second covenants and the last, were they which were declared and published by Agamemnon; in which was comprised, expressly death for the end of the combat, and not the discomfiture or yielding of the partie conquered: moreover the former capitulation of covenants, passed onely by parole & bare words; but the other which followed after, was sealed & confirmed with an oath, yea & a curse and execration was set therupon, for whosoever should transgresse the same: neither was it approved & ratified by one man alone, but by the whole army together in such sort 30 as this latter paction and covenant, ought properly and by right, to be so called; whereas the former was nothing else but the intimation of a challenge and defiance given; in testimonie whereof, Priamus also after the articles of combat were sworne unto, departed out of the field saying:

*Great Jupiter and other gods immorall now doe know, Whose destiny it is to die
upon his overthrow.*

For he wist well enough that the covenants of combat were capitulated and accorded upon this condition: and therefore it was, that a little while after, Heitor saith: 40

*God Jupiter aloft in heaven who sits upon his throne,
The covenants sworne hath not perform'd which were agreed and sworne.*

For as yet the combat remained unatched and unperfected, neither had it a certaine and doubtlesse conclusion, considering neither the one nor the other of the champions was slaine: so that in mine opinion, there is no contrarietie here at all, because the former articles and conditions were comprised in the second: for no doubt, he that killeth hath overcome; but it followeth not, that he who vanquisheth hath killed his enimie: but to say a truth, wee may well plead thus: That Agamemnon did not reverse or annul the challenge or defiance pronounced by Heitor, but explained and declared it; neither altered he it, but added rather the principall point thereof, setting downe expressly, him for victour who killed his enimie; for this indeed is a complet and absolute victory; whereas all others have evasions, pretended excuses and oppositions, such as this of Menelaus, who wounded not his enimie, nor so much as pursued and followed after him: like as therefore in such cases wherein there is an evident contradiction of lawes indeed, the judges are wont to pronounce award and sentence, according to that which is most expressly and cleerely set downe, leaving that which is doubtfull and obscure, even so in this present case now in question; that covenant which hath an evident conclusion, 50
and

and admitteth no tergiversation at all, we ought to esteeme more firme and effectual: furthermore, that which is the chiefe and most principall point of all, even he himselfe who is supposed to be the victour, in that he retired not backe, nor gave over seeking for him that fled, but went up and downe, to and fro among the troupes searching all about,

*If haply of this gallant knight
Sir Paris he might have a fight.*

restituted plainly, that his victory was imperfect and of no validitie; considering that his concurrent was escaped out of his hands, which put him in minde of the words which himselfe a little before had said:

10 *The houre of death, to whether of us twaine
Is come, let him lie dead upon the plaine:
As for the rest, see every one apart,
And that with speed, you home in peace depart.*

And therefore it stood him upon necessarily, to seek out Alexander, to the end, that having slaine him, he might accomplish the entire execution of the combat, and gaine the end thereof; whereas, neither killing him out of the way, nor taking him prisoner, without all right he demanded the prize of victorie: for in very truth, he did not so much as vanquish him, if we may gather presumptions and conjecturall arguments, even out of his owne words, complaining as he doth of Jupiter, and lamenting to himselfe, that he missed of his purpose, in these words:

20 *O Jupiter, in heaven above,
no God there is againe,
More sightfull than thy selfe to me,
now cruel; to be plaine,
I made account, and so gave out,
of Paris in this place,
Revenge'd to be for all his wrongs;
and working my disgrace:
But now my sword in hand is but st,
my javelin launc'd in vaine.
30 *With force of armes, hath done no hurt, nor wrought him any paine.

For himselfe confesseth, that it was to no purpose, that he pierced thorow his enemies shield, and tooke away his armer that fell from his head, unless he had wounded him therewith, and slaine him outright.

THE FOURETEENTH QUESTSION.

As touching the Muses and their number, cerceine point: not after a vulgar and common manner handled.

40 This discourse being thus finished, we performed our oblations and libaments to the Muses; and after we had sung an hymne to Apollo, the leader and conductour of the Muses, we chanted also to the found of the harpe, as Brutus plaied thereupon, those verses which Hesiodus wrote concerning the generation and birth of the Muses: when our song was ended, Herodes the rhetorician began his speech in this wise: Listen lordings (quoth he) you that would distract and plucke from us, Calliope: they say (forsooth) that she converse with kings, and not with those who can skill of unfolding syllogismes; or who propose difficult questions to such as speake big, and are of magnificent speech; but those rather who do and effect great matters, the works I meane which concerne orators, politicians & Statesmen: and as for Clio, of all the Muses 50 say, she admitteth and avoweth the encomiasticall orations, wherein are contained the praises of other artizans; for that in old time, our ancestors called praises, Clea: and Polymnia entertaineth histories; which is nothing els, but the memorial or remembrance of many antiquities: and it is reported, that in some places, and namely, in Chios, they name all the Muses parvia; that is to say, memories: as for me, I challenge also to my selfe some part of Euterpe, if it be as Sibylla saith, that she it is, who hath allotted unto her the gift to entertaine meetings and conferences, with pleasure, delectation and grace: for an orator is no lesse affable in familiar conversation, than eloquent in pleading causes at the barre, or in opining and delivering his 60

our evils: but the necessitie which is among the gods is nothing intollerable, nor violent, nor hard to be obeyed or perswaded, but to the wicked, no more than the law of a citie, that unto good men is the best thing that is, & which they cannot pervert or transgresse; not because it is impossible for them so to do, but for that they are not willing to change the same. Moreover as touching those Syrenes * of Homer, there is no reason that the fable of them should affright us for (after an enigmaticall and covert sort) even he signifieth very well unto us, that the power of their song and musick, is neither inhumane, nor pernicious or mortall; but such as imprineth in the soules which depart from hence thither, as also to such as wander in that other world after death, a vehement affection to divine and celestiall things, together with a certeine forgetfulness of those that be mortall and earthly, detaining and enchanting them as it were with a pleasure that they give unto them; in such sort as by reason of the joy which they receive from them, they follow after and tume about with them: now of this harmonie, there is a little echo or obscure resonance commeth hither unto us, by the meanes of certeine discourses, which call and leeth unto our soule, and putteth into her minde, such things as then and there are, whereof the greatest part is enclosed and stopped up with the abstractions of the flesh, and passions that are howbeit, our soule, by reason of the generositie wherewith it is endued, doth without stand, yea, and remember the same, being ravished with so vehement an affection thereof, that her passion may be compared properly unto most ardent and furious fits of love, whiles she still affecteth and desireth to enjoy, but is not able for all that, to loosen and free her selfe from the bodie; howbeit, I do not accord and hold with him altogether in these matters: but it seemeth unto me, that Plato as he hath somewhat strangely in this place, called the axes and poles of the world and heavens, by the names of spindels, rocks, and distaves, yea & teamed the Syrenes, wherwes: so, to the Muses also he hath given an extraordinarie denomination of Syrenes, as if they related, and expounded unto the soules and ghosts beneath, divine and celestiall things: like as Ulysses in Sophocles saith, that the Syrenes were come:

*The daughters who of Phorcis were,
That doth of hell the lawes declare.*

As for the Muses they be assigned unto the eight heavenly spheres: and one hath for her portion the place and region next to the earth: those then which have the presidences & charge of the revolution of those eight spheres, do keepe, preserve and mainteine the harmony and consonance, as well betwene the wandering planers and fixed starres, as also of themselves one to another; and that one which hath the superintendence of that space betwene the moone and the earth, and converseth with mortall and temporall things, bringeth in and insuleth among them, by the meanes of her speech and song (so faire forth as they be capable by nature and apt to receive the same) the perswasive facultie of the Graces, of musickall measures and harmonie: which facultie is very cooperative with civile policie and humane societie, in dulcing and appeasing that which is turbulent, extravagant and wandering in us, reducing it gently into the right way, from blind by-pathes and errors and there sedeth it: but according to Pyndarus:

*Whom Jupiter from heaven above
Vouchsafeth not his gracious love,
Amaz'd at they be and sue for fence
When they the voice of Muses heare.*

Whereto when Ammonius had given acclamation, alluding (as his maner was) unto the verse of Xenophanes in this wife:

*These things doe carry good credence
And to the truth have reference,* and withall moved us every one to opine and deliver his advice: I my selfe after some little pause and silence, began thus to say: That as Plato himselfe by the etymologie of names (as it were by traces) thought to finde out the properties and powers of the gods; even so let us likewise place in heaven & over celestiall things, one of the Muses, which seemeth of the heaven to be called urania. Certes, it standeth to great reason, that these heavenly bodies require not much variety of government; for that they have but one simple cause, which is, nature: but where-as there be many errors, many enormities & trespasses, thither we must transfer those eight: one for to correct one sort of faults and disorders, and another for to amende & reforme another: and for that of our life, one part is bestowed in serious & grave affaires, and another in sport & game; & throughout the whole course thereof, it hath need of a moderate temperature & musickall consent: that which in us is grave & serious shall be ruled and conducted, by Calliope, Chio and and Thalia, being our guides in the skill and speculation as touching gods and goddesses: as for the other Muses, their office and charge is to support and hold up that which is inclined and prone to pleasure, plaice and disport, not to suffer it through weaknesse and imbecillity to runne headlong into loosenesse and bestiality; but to keepe in, repress and hold it in good and decent order: with dauncing, singing and playing such as hath their measures, and is tempered with harmonie, reason, and proportion: For mine owne part, considering that Plato admitteth and setteth downe in every one two principles and causes of all our actions; the one inbred and naturall; to wit, a desire and inclination to pleasures: the other comming from without forth; to wit, an opinion which covereth the best; in somuch, as the one he calleth some time, Reason; and the other, Passion; and seeing that either of these againe admitteth distinct differences; I see certainly, that both of them require a great government; and in verie truth, an heavenly and divine conduct: and first as touching Reason, one part thereof is civill and roiall; namely, that which medleth in policie government, and matters of State: over which is placed as Hesiodus saith, Calliope; Chio is allotted for her part principally, to advance, colland, and encourage, ambition or desire of honour; Polymnia ruleth and preserveth the vertue memorative, and the desire of knowledge and learning, which is in the soule: and hereupon it is, that the Sicyonians of those three Muses which they honour, call one, Polymathia; and unto Euterpe, who attribureth not the skill and speculation of truth in nature, as acknowledging no delights and recreations more pure, beautiful, and honest than it. To come now unto appetites and affections, that which concerneth eating and drinking, Thalia maketh civill, sociable, and honest: whereas, otherwise it would be inhumane, beauly, and disorderd; which is the reason that we say; those men doe banquet, when they meet together friendly and merrily to make good cheere: but in no wise such as become drunke, and grow to excesse and riotous misdemeanors. As for the accords of love and Venus, Erato is she that performeth them with her presence; perswading that the action thereof should respect reason and the opportunity of time, cutting off wantonneesse, and quenching the furious heat of luit and pleasure, making it for to determine and rest in faithfull love and amitie, and not to end in dissolute and lascivious intemperance. There remaineth yet the pleasure of hearing and seeing, whether the same belong to reason or to passion; or rather appertene in common to both: the other two Muses, to wit, Melpomene and Terpsichore, are regents over them, which they compose and order in such sort, that as the one becommeth an honest delight, and not an enchantment of the eares; so the other contenteth the eyes as much, though it doe not bewitch and corrupt the same.

The whole chapter following is so defective and faultie in the original, that we know not by any conjecturall meanes to supply or reforme it.

THE FIFTEENTH QUESTION.

That in dauncing there be three parts, Motions, Gesture, and Shew: what every of them is? also, what communie there is betwene the art of Poetry and the feat of dauncing.

After this, there was proposed a tart or cake called Pyramus, as the prize of victory for children, who daunce best: and for umpiers & judges were chosen Menissus the schoole-master, and Lampyrus my brother: for before time he had daunced the warlike moriske verie prettily, and was held in the dauncing schooles and places of exercise, to have the best grace in gesticulation with his hands when he daunced, above all other boies whatsoever: now when as many had daunced and shewed therein more affection than elegancie, and more heart than art, some there were of the companie, who having chosen two more expert than the rest, and who affected greatly to observe the rules of art, praised them to daunce οὐρανία χορεία, as one would say, motion after motion, or one bout after another. Hereupon Thrasibulus the sonne of Ammonius, demanded what this tearme οὐρανία, that is to say, motion, signified in this place, which ministred matter, and gave occasion unto Ammonius to discourse more at large concerning the parts of dauncing; for he said: That there were three parts thereof, namely, οὐρανία χορεία, and δύσις: For that (quoth he) a daunce is compounded of motions, gestures, or countenances, like as songs standeth upon founds, and times, or rests betwene; for pauses and staves are the ends of motions herein; and verily those motions, professors call παιδίσ: but the dispositions and habitudes, habitudes, ποιων, unto which the motions doe tend, and wherein they rest and end; namely, when in the forme and gesture of their body, they represent Απollo or Ραν, or some of these ranging Βασche, so as a man at the first sight may acknowledge their part expressly resembled; as for the third part called δωρεα, it is not a feigned imitation, but a lovely and true demonstration of the subject matters in the daunce; for like as the poets when they would plainly and bately name Αχιλλης, υλυσσης, the Earth or Heaven, use their proper termes to expresse them, and even such as the vulgar know them by; but for the greater emphasie and representation as it were to the life of that which they meane to deliver, they use otherwhiles words of their owne making, and borrowed Metaphors; as namely, when they would signifie the noise of running mates, they are wont to say, they doe καταβησκειν, and προσβαλλειν; and for to expresse the flight of arrowes, they tell us that they καταβησκειν αυτων, that is to say:

*What hot desire and haste they make,
Of flesh and blood their fill to take.*

Also to shew a doubtfull battell, wherein it is hard to say whether part shall have the better hand; they come with these termes:

*Ταυτα ορισιν καταβησκειν
The fight two heads aloft in view, Fronting equally did shew.*

Likewise to expresse that which they would say, they devise and coine many compositions of names in their verses, as for example: Ευριπιδης speaking of Perseus:

*Then Gorgon-slayer mounting hie,
In aire of Jupiter did flie.*

Semblably Pindarus writing of the horse:

*What time as he with courage fount, * Spur-leffe, his bodie gave so strong,
To runne a race from bout to bout,
Upon Alpheus banks along.*

Yea and Homer describing a course at horse-running:

*The chariots with brasse and iron,
bedight upon the plaine,
And drawne by sure swift-footed steeds, were seene to runne amaine.*

Even so it is in dauncing, for that which they call ποιων, that is to say, gesture, representeth the forme & the visage: κινησις, that is to say, the motion, expresth emphatically some affection, action, or power of the minde; but by the shewes, which they call δωρεα, properly and promptly, the very things themselves; as for example: the earth, the heaven, the assistants or standers by; which being done in order, number, and measure, resemble those proper names which otherwhiles in poetrie are used, running roundly with the ornaments of their attributes and epithits in this manner:

*Themis modest, venerable:
Venus black-eid, amiable:
Queene Juno with her gold-crowne honoured, Fiire Dion and wel-favoured.*

Also:

*From Helen came renowned kings, of * loves protectors grave,
Sir Dorus, Xanthus, Aeolus, * who joied in horses brave.*

for otherwise if poets should not thus doe, their stile would be very base, and their verses starker naught, and without all grace, as if one should pen them in this sort simply without all epithits:

*From one descended Hercules,
And from another Iphitus,
This ladies sire, her husbande eke,
And sonne were kings all in their course:
Her brechen also were the like,
And so were her progenitors.*

Who first to know what dame she was Greece cleaped her Olympias.

For the like faults and errours are committed at dauncing in the foresaid shewes, if they carry not a probable likelihood and a grace with them, and the same accompanied with decencie and an unaffected simplicitie: in one word, we may fitly transerre the Apophthegme of Simonides, from painting unto dauncing, and say thus: That a daunce is a mute poeie, and poeie a speaking daunce; in somuch (quoth hee) as neither painting dependeth upon poeie, nor poeie of painting, as having no need at all, one of the other: whereas betwene dauncing and poetrie, all things are common, are participating one with another in every thing, and representing, both of them, one and the same thing, especially in those songs to daunce, which they call Hyporchemata, wherein is performed the most effectuall and lively resemblance, of the one, by gesture, and of the other, by words and names: so that poemes seeme aptly to be compared unto the lines and pouring in a picture, by which the formes of visages are drawn; in somuch, as hee who hath proceeded well in those Hyporchemata, and is become excellent in that feat, sheweth plainly, that these two arts, necessarily have need the one of the other: for he who chaunteth out this song, αυτις δαδον τινος, η νιντα αμυντα δαδοντι, &c.

That is to say:

*I play the horse of Theffaly,
Or els the bound of Amycly.*

following and pursuing with his foot, the measures, and expresseing the winding and turning found of the voice; or this other song,

\ διος δαδοντος, αμυντα δαδοντι δαδοντος καποιν εφελθοντα ποσειδωνος ται δ' εν αυτην σφιγαντα κτερον ιγος μιντα μεταυται, &c.*

declareth thereby, that poemes doe in maner provoke the disposition and gesture of dauncing, drawing with the found of verses, as it were with certeine cords, both hands & feet, or the whole bodie rather, stretching out every member thereof in such sort, as when they be pronounced and chanted forth, there is not one of them that can rest in quiet: by occasion whereof, the partie who singeth such songs, is not abashed to praise himselfe no lesse for his sufficiencie in the art of dauncing, than his accomplished skill in poeie; and as if he were rapt with some divine instinct, breaketh out into this note:

*How wilde forever that I be,
I can get foot is merrily.*

And this maner of dauncing to the measures; they call the Candiot daunce; howbeit, now a daies there is nothing so ill taught, so badly practised, and so much depraved and corrupted, as is this feat of dauncing: and therefore that is befallen unto it, which Thyrcu the poet fearing, wrote of himselfe in these verses:

*For honour lost among the gods, I dreid,
With men alone I shall be honoured.*

For having associated her selfe to (I wot not what) trivial and vulgar poeie, & being fallen from that which was ancient, divine and heavenly, she ruleth and beareth sway onely in foolish and amazed theaters, where like a tyrannesse she hath in subjection a small deale of musicke (God wot) good enough to please and content the vulgar sort; but among wise men and divine indeed, it hath (to say a trueth) lost all honour and reputation.

These were in maner the last philosophical discourses (δ' Σοφιστου Σενεκιου) which were held at that time, in good Communion his house, during the festivall solemnitie of the Muses.

THE OPINIONS OF PHILOSOPHERS.

The Summarie.

Inasmuch as in the Preface to the second tome, concerning the Miscellane or mixt works of Plutarch, he spake of these gatherings out of naturall philosophie, and of the fruit that may be reaped thereout, by discerning true opinions from false; we will not rebarge againe here, that which was delivered in that place; but propose onely to the eyes of the reader, the bare titles of every chapter throught these five books, which the author hath joined together, for to shew the opinions of the ancient philosophers, as touching the exposition of the principall points of naturall philosophie.

THE FIRST BOOKE OF Philosophers opinions.

The Proæme.

Being minded to write of naturall philosophie, we thinke it necessary in the first place, and before all things els, to set downe the whole disputation of Philosophie, by way of division; to the end that we may know which is naturall, and what part it is of the whole. Now the Stoicks say, that sapience or wisdom is the science of all things, aswell divine as humane; and that Philosophie is the profession and exercise of the art expedient thereto, which is the onely supreme and soveraigne vertue; and the same divided into three most generall vertues; to wit, Naturall, Morall, and Verball: by reason whereof, Philosophie also admitteth a three-folde distribution; to wit, into Naturall, Morall, Rationall or Verball: the Naturall part is that, when as we enquire and dispute of the world and the things contained therein: Morall, is occupied in intreating of the good and ill that concerneth mans life: Rationall or Verball, handleth that which pertaineth unto the discourse of reason and to speech, which also is named Logique or Dialectique, that is to say, Disputative. But Aristotle and Theophrastus, with the Peripateticks, in manner all, divide Philosophie in this manner; namely, into Contemplative and Active: For necessarie it is (say they) that a man (to attaine unto perfection) should be a spectator of all things that are, and an actor of such things as be seemely and decent, and may the better be understood by these examples: The question is demanded, whether the Sunne be a living creature, according as it seemeth to the sight to be; or no? Hether searcheth and enquireth into the truth of this question, is altogether therein speculative, for he seeketh no farther than the contemplation of that which is; semblably, if the demand be made, whether the world is infinite? or if there be any thing without the purpoise of the world? for all these questions be meere contemplative. But on the other side mooved it may be, How a man ought to live? how he should governe his children? how he is to beare rule and office of State? and lastly, in what manner, lawes are to be ordeined and made? for all these are sought into, in regard of action, and a man conversant therein, is altogether active and practique.

CHAP.

CHAP. I.

What is Nature?

Since then, our intent and purpose is to consider and treat of Naturall philosophie, I thinke it needfull, to shew first, what is Nature: for absurd it were, to enterprise a discourse of Naturall things, and meane-while to be ignorant of Nature and the power thereof. Nature then (according to the opinion of Aristotle) is the beginning of motion and rest, in that thing wherein it is properly and principally, not by accident: for all things to be scene (which are done neither by fortune nor by necessitie, and are not divine, nor have any such efficient cause) be called Naturall, as having a proper and peculiar nature of their owne; as the earth, fire, water, aire, plants, and living creatures. Moreover, those other things which we do see ordinarily engendered, as raine, hawe, lightning, presteres, winds, and such like; for all these have a certaine beginning; and every one of them was not so for ever, and from all eternitie, but did proceed from some originall: likewise, living creatures and plants, have a beginning of their motion; and this first principle, is Nature: the beginning not of motion onely, but also of rest and quiet; for whatsover hath had a beginning of motion, the same also may have an end: and for this cause, Nature is the beginning aswell of rest as of moving.

CHAP. II.

What difference there is betweene a principle and an element.

Aristotle and Plato are of opinion, that there is a difference betweene a Principle and an Element; but Thales Milesius thinketh they be both one: howbeit, there is a great difference betweene the one and the other; for elements be compounded; whereas we holde, that the first Principles neither be compounded, nor are any completer substance: and verily, earth, water, aire, and fire, we terme Elements; but Principles we call other Natures in this respect, that there is nothing precedent or before them, whereof they are ingendered; for otherwise, if they were not the first, they should in no wise be Principles, but that rather were to be so called, whereof they be ingendered. Now certaine things there are precedent, whereof, earth and water, &c. be composed; to wit, the first matter, without all forme and shape; as also the first forme it selfe, which we call Entelechia; and thirdly, Privation. Thales therefore is in an error, when he saith, that water was both the Element and Principle or first beginning of all things.

CHAP. III.

Of principles or first beginnings, what they be.

THALES the Milesian affirmed, that Water was the first principle of the whole world: and this man seemeth to have beene the first author of philosophie: and of him tooke the Ionique sect of Philosophers their name (for many families there were successively of Philosophers) who having studied Philosophie in Aegypt, went to Miletum, when hee was firste stepped in yeeres, where he maintained this position: That all things were made of Water; so all things were to be resolved againe into Water. The reasons of this conjecture of his, were these: first, because naturall seed is the principle and beginning of all living creatures, and that is of a moist substance; therefore probable it is, that all other things likewise have humiditie for their principle: secondly, for that all sorts of plants be nourished by moisture, which if they want, they wither and fade away: thirdly, considering that the fire or the sunne it selfe, and the starres is nourished and maintained by vapours proceeding from the waters, the whole world also by consequence consisteth of the same: which is the reason, that Homer (supposing all things to be engendered of water) saith thus:

The ocean sea, from whence ebbeth Engendred is, and hath beginning.

But ANAXIMANDER the Milesian holdeth: that Infinite is the principle of all: for every thing proceedeth from it, & resolvethe into it againe; & therefore there be engendered infinite worlds; and those vanish againe into that whereof they be engendered: and why is there this Infinite? Because (quoth he) there should never faile any generation, but still have subsistence, howbeit,

Yyy

even he also erreth heerein; for that he declareth not what is this Infinitie whereof he speaketh, whether it be aire, water, or any other body? he faileth likewise in this, that he putteth downe a subject matter, but overthroweth the efficient cause: for this Infinitie whereof he talketh, is nothing else but matter; and matter cannot attaine to perfection, nor come into act; unless there be some moving and efficient cause. ANAXIMENES the Milesian, maineineth that aire is the principle of the world; for that all things come of it, and returne unto it: Like as (quoth he) our soule which is aire, keepeth us alive; even so spirit and aire mainteine the Being of the whole world: for spirit and aire be two words, signifying both one thing. But this Philosopher is out of the way as well as the rest, in that hee thinketh that living creatures be composed of a simple spirit, or uniforme aire: and impossible it is that there should be but one principle of all things, to wit, matter; but there ought withall to be supposed an efficient cause: for it is not enough to be provided of silver or gold, for to make a vessell or piece of plate, if there come not unto it, the efficient cause, to wit, the gold-smith: semblably we are to say, of brasse, wood, and all other sorts of matter.

ANAXAGORAS the Clazomenian, is perswaded, and so teacheth: That the principles of the world, and all that therein is, are small like parcels; which hee termeth Homaomeries; for hee thought it altogether absurd and impossible, that any thing should bee made of that which is not; or bee dissolved into that which hath no being; for howsoever we take our nourishment simple and uniforme; as for example; eat bread of corne, and drinke water, yet with this nutriment, are nourished, haire, veines, arteries, sinewes, bones, and other parts of the bodie, which being so: Confeffe we must (quoth hee) likewise, that in this food which wee receive are all things which have their Being; and that all things doe grow and encrease of that which hath Being: so that in this nourishment be those parcels which breed bloud, sinewes, bones, and other parts of our body, which may bee comprehended by discourse of reason; for we are not to reduce all unto the outward sense, to shew and prove that bread and water effect these things: but it may suffice, that in them these parts are conceived by reason: Inasmuch therefore as in nourishment there be parcels semblable unto that which they breed, in that regard hee called them Homaomeries, affirming them to be the principles of all things; and even so he would have these semblable parcels, to be the matter of all things; and for efficient cause, he setteth downe a Minde or understanding, that ordereth and disposeth al. And thus begetteth he to goe to worke, and reasoneth in this wise. All things at first were consumed and huddled together pell mell; but that Minde or understanding doth sever, dispose, and set them in order: in this one thing yet he hath done wel, and is to be commended, that unto the matter he hath adjoined a workman.

ARCHELAUS an Athenian, the sonne of Apollodorus, affirmeth, that the principle of all things was the infinit aire, together with the condensation, and rarefaction thereof; of which the one is fire, and the other water: and these Philosophers, following by continuall succession one upon another after Thales, made that sect which is called Ionique. But from another head, PYTHAGORAS the sonne of Mnearchus, & a Samian borne, the first author of the name of Philosophie: held that the principle of all things were Numbers, and their symmetries, that 40 is to say, the proportions that they have in their correspondency one unto another; which hee calleth otherwise Harmonies: & those elements that be composed of them both, are teamed by him Geometricall: furthermore, hee reckoneth among Principles, unitie, and Twaine infinit; of which, the one tendeth and hasteneth to an efficient and specificall cause, to wit, a Minde, and the same is God; the other unto a passive and materiall cause, namely, the visible world: Moreover, he thought that the Denarie or Ten, was the absolute nature and perfection of numbers; for that all men, as well Greeks as Barbarians, count untill ten, and when they be thither come, they returne backe againe unto unitie: over and besides hee said: That all the power of ten, consisted within fower, and in a quaternarie; the reason is this: that if a man begin at one, and reckon on still, numbering upright unto foure, hee shall make up ten; surpass 50 he once the quaternarie, he is gone beyond the denarie; as for example; one and two make three, three thereto arise to sixe, put thereto foure, and you have ten: inasmuch as number collected by unities, resteth in ten; but the force and puissance thereof lieth in foure. The Pythagoreans therefore were wont to sweare by the quaternarie or number of foure, which they held to be the greatest oath that they could take, as appeareth by this Distichon:

*I sweare by this quaternary,
That needs our soules fountaine,*

Which

*Which of natures eternity,
Doth seed and root containe.*

And our soule (as he saith) doth consist of the quaternary number; for there is in it, understanding, science, opinion, and fence; from whence proceedeth all manner of art and knowledge, and whereupon we our selves are called reasonable: as for understanding, it is that unity; for that it conceiveth and knoweth not but by unitie; as for example: There being many men, they are not every one in particular subject to our senses, but incomprehensible and infinit; many in our understanding we conceive and apprehend this one man alone, unto whom none is like: and so in our cogitation we consider one man onely; but if they bee considered particularly 10 apart, they are infinit: for all these genders and kindes are in unitie; and therefore when the question is asked of a particular man what he is? we yeeld a generall definition and say: He is a reasonable creature, apt to discourse by reason; and so likewise of this or that horse, wee must answer: That hee is a living creature, having a proprietie to neigh. Thus you see how understanding is unity, whereby we understand these things: but the binary or number of two, is by good right an indefinit science: for all demonstration and proove of any science, yea and moreover, all manner of syllogisme or argumentation, doth collect a conclusion which was doubtfull, of certeine premised propositions, confessed as true: whereby it sheweth easily another thing, whereof the comprehension is science; and so it appeareth, that science by a likelihood is the binarie number: but opinion by good reason may be said, the ternary number by comprehension; for that opinion is of many, and the ternary number implieth a pluralitie or 20 multitude, as we may see by the poet when he saith:

*Thrice happy men,
Those Greeks were then.*

And for this cause Pythagoras made no reckoning of three, whose sect bare the name of Italiqes, for that he (not able to endure the tyrannicall dominion of Polyrates) departed from Samos, his native country, and went to keepe his schoole in Italy.

HERACLITUS, and HIPPIASUS the Metapontine, were of opinion, that Fire was the principle and beginning of all: for of fire say they, all things are made, and in fire they shal have an end; and when it is extinct and quenched, the universall world is in this manner engendered and framed: for first and formost the grossest part thereof being condensate and thrust together into it selfe, becommeth earth, and afterwards, when the same earth is resolved by fire, it turneth to be water; which when it doth evaporate, is converted into aire: againe, the whole world, and all the bodies therein contained, shall be one day consumed by fire in that generall conflagration and burning of all: whereby hee concludeth, that fire is the beginning of all things, as that whereof all was made, and the end likewise, for that all things are resolved into it.

EPICURUS the Athenian, sonne of Necoles, following the philosophie of Democritus, saith: That the principles of all things be certeine Atomes, that is to say, little bodies indivisible, and by reason onely perceptible, the same solide, and admitting no vacuities, not engendered, immortal, eternall, incorruptible, such as neither can be broken, nor receive any forme of the parts, ne yet be otherwise altered: These (quoth he) being perceptible & comprehended by reason, moove notwithstanding in emptinesse, and by emptinesse; & as the same voidnesse is infinite, so the said bodies also be in number infinit: howbeit these three qualities are incident unto them, figure, bignesse, and weight: for Democritus allowed them but twaine, to wit, bignesse, and figure; but Epicurus added unto them a third, namely poise or ponderositie: For these bodies (quoth he) must of necessitie moove: by the permission of the weight; otherwise they could not possibly stirre: the figures also of their bodies, (hee said) were comprehensible and not infinit; and these were neither hooked nor three-forked, ne yet round in manner of a ring, for such formes are apt to breake: as for the Atomes themselves, they be impassible and 50 infrangible, having certeine figures, no otherwise perceptible, but by reason; and such a body is called Atomus, not in this regard, that it is the least of all, but for that it cannot be divided, as being impassible, and admitting no vacuities: and therefore hee that nameth an Atome, saith as much, as infrangible, impassible, and without vacuities: now that there is such an indivisible body called Atomus, it is apparent, for that there be elements eternall, bodies void, and an unitie.

EMPEDOCLES an Agrigentine, the sonne of Meton, saith: There be foure elements, fire, aire, water, and earth; also two principall faculties or powers, namely, accord, and discord, or amitie amitie and enmitie, of which, the one hath puissance to unite, the other to dissolve: and these be his words:

*Four seeds and roots of all things that you see,
Now listen first, and hearken what they be:
Lord Jupiter with his benign potence,
And lady Junoes vital influence,
Rich Pluto, and dame Nectis weeping ay,
Who with her teares, our seed-fourse weets away.*

By Jupiter hee meaneth fierie heat, and ardent skie; by Pluto, the earth; by Nectis and this humane fountaine of naturall seed, water.

SOCRATES the sonne of Sophroniscus, and PLATO the sonne of Ariston, both Athenians, (for the opinions of them both, concerning the world and all things therein, be the same) have set downe three principles, God, Matter, and Idea, that is to say, Forme: God is an universall spirit or Minde: Matter is the first and principall subject of generation and corruption: Idea, an incorporeall substance, resting in the thoughts and cogitations of God, which God; is the generall soule and intelligence of the world.

ARISTOTELIS of Stagira the sonne of Nichomachus, hath put downe for Principles these three, to wit, a certaine forme called Entelechia, Matter, and Privation: for elements, foure, and for a fifth Quintessence, the heavenly bodie which is im mutable.

ZENO the sonne of Anaxagoras, a Citiean borne, holdeth for two principles, God and Matter: whereof the one is an active and efficient cause, and the other passive; and besides, foure elements.

CHAP. III.

How the world was framed?

THIS world then, became composed & formed in a round figure, bending and coping after this manner: those Atomes or indivisible bodies, having an accidentarie and inconsiderate motion, stirring continually, and most strictly, happen many of them to encounter one another and meet together; in which regard they differ in figures and magnitudes: now when they are thus gathered and heaped up together in one, the greater sort of them, and such as were most ponderous, settled altogether downward; as many of them as were small, round, even, smooth, and slipperie, those being beaten upon by the encounter of these weightie bodies, were repulsed, driven backe, and forced upward; but when that force which drave them aloft began to faile, and gave over once to send them up higher, not being able to fall downward againe; for that they were impeached, they were of necessitie enforced to retire into those places which were able to receive them: to wit, such as were round about them; unto which, a mightie number of bodies being wound together in an heape, and by meanes of the repercussion, enterlaced one within another, they engendered and brought forth the heaven; and afterwards others of the same nature; yet of divers formes (as hath been said before) being likewise driven up aloft, accomplished the nature of Stars. Moreover, the multitude of those bodies yeelding a vapour and exhalation, did beat forward and drive the aire; which by stirring and motion, being converted into wind, and comprising therewith the Starres, turned them about with it; and so maintained unto this day, that revolution which they have aloft. Of those bodies then, which settled below, was made the earth; and of such as mounted on high, the heaven, the fire, and the aire: part thereof which was more subtile, and of a thinner forme and consistence, gathered round together, and engendered the element of water, which being of a liquid, and flowing nature ran downward to hollow places lying low, which were able to receive and hold them: or else the water of it selfe where it staid and rested, made concavities and hollow places underneath. Thus you see after what manner the principall parts of the world were first engendered and made.

CHAP. V.

Whether All be one?

THE STOICKS Philosophers held opinion that the world was one, which they called monos. That is to say, All, and the same of corporall substance.

EMPEDOCLES

EMPEDOCLES affirmed, that the world indeed was one; but All and the world, were not both one: for the world quoth he, is but a small portion of All: and as for the rest beside, it is but an idle and dull matter.

PLATO proveth his opinion, that the world is but one, by conjecture; and guesseth All to be one, by three presumptions or probable arguments. First, for that otherwise the world were not perfect and accomplished, if it comprised not All within it selfe. Secondly, it should not be like unto the pattern, if it were not one and uniforme. Thirdly, it would not be incorruptible, in case there were any thing without it. But wee are to answer PLATO and say against him, that the world is perfect, although it comprehend not all things: for man is perfect enough, and yet all things be not comprised in him. Moreover, there be many examples drawn from one pattern, as we may see in statues, houses, and pictures: and how is it perfect, if any thing may turne without it? Finally, incorruptible neither is it, nor can it be, considering it had a beginning and a kind of Nativitie.

METRODORUS saith: That as it were an absurd and impertinent speech to say, that in a great field there grew but one ear of corne; so it were as strange a matter, that in this infinitie there should be but one world: and that there be in number infinite, it appeareth by this, that there be causes infinite: for if the world were finite, and all the causes infinite whereof it is made, it cannot chuse but of necessitie there should be likewise infinite: for where all the causes be, there must needs the effects follow: now the causes of the world, be either these Atomes or the Elements.

CHAP. VI.

From whence it came that Men had the notion of God?

THE STOICKE Philosophers define the Essence of God in this wise; namely, To be a spirit full of intelligence, and of a fiery nature, having no forme, but transforming himselfe into whatsoever he will, and resembling all things. The notion and apprehension men had of him, first, by conceiving the beautie of those things which are object to their eyes: for no beautil thing hath beene made by chance, and at adventure, but composed & framed by some ingenious and operative Art: now that the heaven is beautilfull, it appeareth by the forme, colour, and bignesse thereof, by the varietie also of the starres disposed therein: moreover, the world is round in manner of a Ball, which figure of all other is principall and most perfect, for it alone resembleth all the parts; for being round it selfe, it hath the parts likewise round. For this cause PLATO said, That our mind and reason (the most divine part of man) is lodged and seated in the head, which cometh neere unto a round figure: as for the colour, it is faire and lovely; for it standeth upon the azure or blew, which being more darke than purple, hath notwithstanding a bright and resplendent qualitie, in such sort, as by the exceeding strength of that light some hew, it cutteth and pierceth thorow so great an intervall and spacioulnesse of the aire, as it may be evidently scene in so mightie a distance: in regard also of the greatnesse thereof, it is right beautilfull; for, of all things that be of one and the same kinde, that which invitroneth and containeth the rest, is ever fairest; as we may see in a living creature, and a tree: besides, to consummate and accomplish the beautie of the world, there be the celestiall signes which appeare unto our eyes: for the oblique circle of the Zodiacke, is embellished with twelve divers and sundry images,

*Wherein the CRAB is to be scene,
the LION after it,
The VIRGIN, and two forked * CLEES,
the SCORPION with his bir,
The ARCHER and the CAPRICORNE,
upon which horned GOAT,
There follow with the WATER-MAN,
two FISHES all afloat;
And after these, en sue in course,
the RAM and sturdy Bull,
But last of all, the double TWINNES, make up the dozen full.*

* That is to say, Libra.

Yyy 3

Besides

was by an adulterer and adulteresse surpris'd and murdered treacherously: and Hercules one of his race and kinred, after he had ridde and purged the life of man from so many monsters that troubled his repofewas poisoned by Deianira, and so by indirect meanes lost his life.

THALES saith, that God is the soule of the world.

ANAXIMANDER is of opinion, that the starres be celestiaall gods.

DEMOCRITUS is perswaded, that God is a minde of a sferic nature, and the soule of the world.

PYTHAGORAS affirmeth, that of the two first principles, Unitie was God, and the fove-raigne good; which is the very nature of one, and is understanding it selfe: but the indefinite binarie, is the divell and evil, about which is the multitude materiall, and the visible world.

SOCRATES and PLATO doe hold, that he is one and of a simple nature, begotten and borne of himselfe alone, truly good: All which tearmes and attributes, tend unto a Minde: so that, this minde is God, a forme separate apart, that is to say, neither mingled with any matter, nor entangled and joined with any thing possible whatsoever.

ARISTOTLE supposeth, that this supreme God is an abstract forme, seated upon the round sphere of the universall world, which is an heavenly and celestiaall body, and therefore tearmed by him, the fifth body or quinta essentia: which celestiaall body being divided into many spheres coherent by nature, but separate and distinct by reason and understanding, hee thinketh each of these spheres to be a kinde of animall, composed of body and soule, of which twaine, the bodie is celestiaall, moving circularly; and the soule, reason, unmooveable in it selfe, but the cause 20 in effect of motion.

The Stoicks teach after a more generall manner, and define God, to be a working and artificall fire, proceeding methodically and in order to the generation of the world, which comprehendeth in it selfe all the spermatieall proportions and reasons of seed; according to which every thing by fatal destinie, is produced and commeth forth: also to be a spirit piercing and spreading through the whole world; howbeit, changing his denomination throughout the whole matter, as it passeth by transition from the one to the other: Semblably that the world is God, the starres likewise and the earth, yea, and the supreme minde above in heaven.

Finally, EPICURUS conceiveth thus of the gods, that they all have the forme of man, and yet be perceptible onely, by reason and cogitation, in regard of the subtile parts, and fine nature 30 of their imaginative figures: he also affirmeth, that those other foure natures in generall be incorruptible, to wit, the atomes, vacuities, infinitie, and resemblances, which also be called semblable parcels and elements.

CHAP. VIII.

Of Demons and demy-gods, otherwise named, Heroes.

TO this treatise of the gods, meet it is to adjoine a discourse as touching the nature of Demones and Heroes.

THALES, PYTHAGORAS, PLATO, and the STOICKS, hold that these Demones be spirituaall substances: and the Heroes soule separate from their bodies; of which sort, there be good and bad: the good Heroes are the good soules, and the bad Heroes the bad soules; but EPICURUS admitteth none of all this.

CHAP. IX.

Of Matter.

Matter is the first and principall subject exposed to generation, corruption, and other mutations.

The Sectaries of THALES and PYTHAGORAS, together with the Stoicks, doe say, that this Matter, is variable, mutable, alterable and fluxible, all wholly thorow the universall world.

The disciples and followers of DEMOCRITUS are of opinion, that the first principles be impassible; to wit, the small indivisible bodie, Atomes, Voidnesse, and Incorporall.

ARISTOTLE and PLATO doe holde, that Matter is corporall, without forme, shape, figure and qualitie, in the owne nature and propertie; but when it hath received formes once, it becommeth becommeth (as it were) a nurse, a molde, pattern, and a mother. They who set downe for this Matter, water, earth, fire or aire, do not say, that now it is without forme; but that it is a very bodie: but such as affirme, that these Atomes and indivisible bodies be the said Matter, make it altogether formelesse.

CHAP. X.

Of Idea.

IIdea* is a bodilesse substance, which of it selfe hath no subsistence, but giveth figure and forme unto shapelesse matters, and becommeth the very cause that bringeth them into shew and evidence.

SOCRATES and PLATO suppose, that these Idea bee substances separate and distinct from Matter, howbeit, subsisting in the thoughts and imaginations of God, that is to say, of Minde and understanding.

ARISTOTLE admitteth verily these formes and Idea, howbeit, not separate from matter, as being the patterns of all that which God hath made.

The STOICKS, such as were the scholars of Zeno, have delivered, that our thoughts and conceits were the Idea.

CHAP. XI.

Of Causes.

A Cause is that whereupon dependeth or followeth an effect, or by which any thing happeneth.

PLATO hath set downe three kinds of Causes, and those are distinguished by these tearmes; By which, Of which, and For which; but he taketh the most principall to be that, By which; that is to say, the efficient cause, which is the minde or understanding.

PYTHAGORAS and ARISTOTLE do hold, that the principall Causes be incorporall; and as for other Causes, either by participation or by accident, they are of a corporall substance: and so the world is a bodie.

But the STOICKS are of opinion, that all Causes are corporall, inasmuch as they be spirits.

CHAP. XII.

Of Bodies.

A Bodie is measurable, and hath three dimensions, length, bredth and depth or thicknesse. Or thus: A Bodie is a masse that resisteth, touching naturally of it selfe; or that which occupieth a place.

PLATO saith, that a Body is neither heavie nor light of it selfe naturally, so long as it abideth in the owne proper place; but being once in a strange place, it hath first an inclination, and upon it a motion and impulsion, either to weight or lightnesse.

ARISTOTLE is of opinion, that earth simply is most ponderous, and fire lightest: that aire and water be of a middle or doubtfull nature betweene both, sometime heavie and otherwhiles light.

The STOICKS hold, that of the foure elements, two be light; namely, Fire and Aire; other two be heavie; to wit, Water and Earth: for, light is that, which of the owne nature, and not by any compulsion or instigation removeth from the proper middle where it is: heavie also is that, which naturally tendeth to the said middle; but the middle it selfe, is in no wise heavie.

EPICURUS saith, that Bodies are not comprehensible; that the first Bodies be simple; but all the compositions of them have their weight and ponderositie: also, that the ATOMES doe move, some plumb right downe; others, at one side; and some againe, mount aloft, and that by impulsion and concussion.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the smallest Bodies.

EMPEDOCLES* is of opinion, that before the foure elements, there were certeine small parcels or fragments, as one would say, elements before elements; and those were of semblable parts, and the same all round.

HERACLITUS

HERACLITUS cometh in with (I know not what) petie scrapings or shavings, exceeding small, and the same not divisible into parts.

CHAP. XIII.

Of Figures.

A Figure is the superficies, circumscription, and accomplished lineament of a bodie. The PYTHAGOREANS affirme, that the bodies of the foure elements be of a sphericke or round figure; onely the highest of them (to wit, fire) is pyramidall, or sharpe pointed above.

CHAP. XV.

Of Colours.

A Colour is the visible qualitie of a bodie. The PYTHAGOREANS called Colour, the outward superficies of the bodie. EMPEDOCLES defined it to be that which is fit and agreeable to the waies and passages of the sight. PLATO saith, it is a flame sent from bodies, having certeine parcels proportionable to the sight. ZENO the Stoice holdeth, that Colours be the first figurations of any matter. The followers of PYTHAGORAS affirme these to be the kinds of Colours, White, Blacke, Red, and Yellow; and that the diversity of Colours ariseth from a certeine mixture of elements: but in living creatures, the same proceedeth from the varietie of their * places and sundry aires.

CHAP. XVI.

THE sectaries of THALES and PYTHAGORAS, are of opinion, that bodies bee passible and divisible infinitely. DEMOCRITUS and EPICURUS hold, that this section staith either at the Atomes indivisible, or at those small bodies which have no parts, neither doth this division (say they) passe infinitely. ARISTOTLE saith, that divided they be in infinitum, potentially, but actually not.

CHAP. XVII.

Of Mixture and Temperature.

THE ancient philosophers affirme, that this mixture of Elements is by way of alteration: but ANAXAGORAS and DEMOCRITUS, say, it is done by apposition. EMPEDOCLES composeth the Elements of smaller masses, which he supposeth to be the least bodies, and as a man would say, the Elements of Elements. PLATO would have the three bodies (for hee deigneth not them, either to bee called or to be, Elements) to be convertible one into the other, to wit, water, aire, and fire: but as for the earth, it cannot be turned into any one of them.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of Voidnesse or Vacuities.

THE naturall philosophers of THALES his schoole, all untill you come to PLATO, have generally disavowed and reprooved this Vacuities: As for EMPEDOCLES thus he writeth:
In all the world so spacious,
Nought is void or superfluous.

LEUCIPPUS

LEUCIPPUS, DEMOCRITUS, DEMETRIUS, METRODORUS, and EPICURUS, hold, that the Atomes be infinit in multitude, and Voidnesse infinit in magnitude. The STOICKS affirme, that within the world there is no Voidnesse, but without there is infinitie.

ARISTOTLE is of opinion, that without the world there is no such Voidnesse, as that the heaven by the meanes thereof, may draw breath, for that it is of the nature of fire.

CHAP. XIX.

Of Place.

PLATO saith, that Place is that which is susceptible of formes, one after another, which is by way of Metaphor or translation, to expresse the first matter, as a nurse receiving and embracing all. ARISTOTLE taketh Place to be the extreame superficies of the continent, conjunct and contiguous to the content.

CHAP. XX.

Of Roome or Space.

THE STOICKS, and EPICURUS doe holde, that there is a difference betweene Voidnesse, Place, and Roome: for Voidnesse (say they) is the solitude or vacuities of a body: Place, that which is fully occupied and taken up with a body: but Roome or Space, that which is occupied but in part; as we may see in a rundlet or barrell of wine.

CHAP. XXI.

Of Time.

PYTHAGORAS saith, that Time is the sphere of that utmost heaven that compriseth all. PLATO thinketh it to be the moveable image of the eternitie, or the intervall of the worlds motion: but ERATOSTHENES affirmeth it to be the course of the sunne.

CHAP. XXII.

Of the Essence of Time.

PLATO saith, that the Essence of Time is the moving of heaven: but many of the STOICKS hold it, to be the moving of it selfe; and most of them affirme, that Time had no beginning of generation. PLATO is of opinion, that engendered it is according to our conceit and capacite.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of Motion.

PYTHAGORAS and PLATO affirme, that Motion is a certeine difference and alteration in matter. ARISTOTLE giveth out, that it is the actual operation of that which is moveable. DEMOCRITUS saith, that there is but one kinde of Motion, to wit, that which tendeth obliquely. EPICURUS maintaineth twaine, the one direct and plumbe, the other side-long. EROPHILUS is of opinion, that there is one Motion perceptible in reason, and another object to sense naturall. HERACLITUS excluded all station, rest and repose out of the world: For this (quoth hee) belongeth unto the dead, but perperuall Motion agreeth to eternall substances; and perishable Motion to substances corruptible.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of Generation and Corruption.

PARMENIDES, MELISSUS, and ZENO, rejected wholly all Generation and Corruption; for they thought the universall world to be unmooveable: but EMPEDOCLES and EPICURUS, and all those who held the world to be made of a masse and heape of small bodies huddled together, bring in and admit certaine concretions and dissipations; but in no wise Generations and Corruptions to speake properly, saying, that these come not according to qualitative way of alteration, but according to quantity by collection and heaping together.

PYTHAGORAS, and as many as suppose matter to be passible, hold, that there is properly indeed Generation and Corruption: for they say that this is done by the alteration, mutation and resolution of the elements.

CHAP. XXV.

Of Necessitie.

THALES saith, that Necessitie is most potent and forcible, for it is that which ruleth the whole world.

PYTHAGORAS held, that the world was possessed and compassed with Necessitie.

PARMENIDES, and DEMOCRITUS were of opinion, that all things were made by Necessitie, and that destinie, justice, providence, and the Creatour of the world, were all one.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the Essence of Necessitie.

PLATO referreth some events to providence, and others he attributeth to Necessitie. EMPEDOCLES saith, that the Essence of Necessitie is a cause apt to make use of the principles and elements.

* copied, some side Empedocles,
that is to say,
corruption.

DEMOCRITUS affirmeth it to be the resistance, the * lation, motion, and permission of the matter.

P L A T O holdeth it to be one while matter it selfe, and another while the habitude of that which is agent to the matter.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of Destinie.

HERACLITUS affirmeth, that all things were done by fatall Destinie, and that it and Necessitie be both one.

P L A T O admitteth willingly this Destinie in the soules, lives, and actions of men; but he inferreth withall a cause proceeding from our selves.

The STOICKES likewise according to the opinion of PLATO, do hold, that Necessitie is a cause invincible, most violent and inforcing all things: also that Destinie is a connexion of causes interlaced & linked orderly: in which concatenation or chaine is therein comprised also that cause which proceedeth from us, in such sort as some events are destined, and others not.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of the substance of Destinie.

HERACLITUS saith, that the substance of Destinie is the reason that pierceeth throughout the substance of the universall world.

P L A T O affirmeth it to be an eternall reason, and a perpetuall law of the nature of the whole world.

CHRYSIPIUS

CHRYSIPIUS holdeth it to be a certaine puissance spiritual, which by order governeth and administred all things. And againe in his booke of definitions hee writeth thus: Destinie is the reason of the world, or rather the law of all things in the world, administred and governed by providence: or else the reason whereby things pass, have beene; things present, are; and future things, shall be.

The STOICKES are of opinion that it is the chaine of causes, that is to say, an order and connexion, which cannot be surmounted and transgressed.

POSIDONIUS supposeth it to be the third after Jupiter: for that Jupiter is in the first degree; Nature in the second; and fatall Destinie in the third.

CHAP. XXIX.

Of Fortune.

PLATO defineth Fortune to be (in things proceeding from mans counsell and election) a cause by accident, and a verie casual consequence.

ARISTOTLES holdeth it to be an accidentall cause in those things which from some deliberate purpose and impulsion tend to a certaine end, which cause is not apparent, but hidden and uncertaine. And he putteth a difference between Fortune and rash adventure: for that all Fortune in the affaires and actions of this world is adventurous: but everie adventure is not by and by Fortune; for that it consisteth in things without action: againe, Fortune is properly in actions of reasonable creatures; but adventure, indifferently in creatures, as well unreasonabable as reasonable, yea, and in those bodies which have neither life nor soule.

EPICURUS saith, that Fortune is a cause, which will not stand and accord with persons, times, and manners.

ANAXAGORAS and the STOICKES affirme it to be a cause unknowne, and hidden to humane reason: for that some things come by necessitie, others by fatall destinie; some by deliberate counsell, others by Fortune, and some againe by casualitie or adventure.

CHAP. XXX.

Of Nature.

EMPEDOCLES holdeth that Nature is nothing; only that there is a mixture and divulsion, or separation of Elements: for in this manner writeth he in the first booke of his Physicks:

*This one thing more I will yet say, of things that be humane
And Mortall, that we none there is,
and deaths end is but vaine.
A mixture and divulsion,
of Elements and of all,
Only there is, and thus is that,
which men do Nature call.*

Seemably ANAXAGORAS saith, that Nature is nothing else but a concretion and dissipation: that is to say, generation and corruption.

THE SECOND BOOKE OF
Philosophers opinions.

The Proöme.

Having now finished the Treatise of PRINCIPLES, ELEMENTS, and such other matters linked and concurring with them; I will turne my pen unto the discourse as touching their effects and works composed of them, beginning first at that which is most spacious and capable of all things.

CHAP. I.

PYTHAGORAS was the first who called the Roundle that containeth and comprehendeth all, to wit, the World. Kosmos: for the orderly digestion observed therein.

THALES and his disciples held, that there is but one World.

DEMOCRITUS, EPICURUS, and their scholler METRODORUS affirme, that there be innumerable Worlds in an infinite space according to all dimensions and circumstances.

EMPEDOCLES saith, that the course and race of the Sunne, is the verie circumscription of the bounds and limits of the World; and that it is the verie confinement thereof.

SELEUCUS held the World to be infinite.

DIOGENES affirmed, the universallitie to be infinite: but the world finite and determinate.

The STOICKS put a difference betweene universall and whole: for they say, that the universall together with voidnesse is infinite: and that the whole without voidnes is the World: so as these termes, the Whole and the World, be not both one.

CHAP. II.

THE STOICKS affirme the World to be round: some say it is pointed or pyramidal: others that it is fashioned in manner of an egge; but EPICURUS holdeth, that his Worlds may be round, and it may be that they are apt besides to receive other formes.

CHAP. III.

Whether the World be animate, or endued with a soule.

ALLOther Philosophers agree, that the World is animate, &c. governed by providence: but DEMOCRITUS, EPICURUS, and as many as maintaine ATOMES, and with all bring in VACUITY, that it is neither animate, nor governed by providence, but by a certaine nature void of reason.

ARISTOTLE holdeth, that it is not animate wholly and throughout all parts; nor sensitive, nor reasonable, nor yet intellectuall or directed by providence: True it is (quoth he) that celestiall bodies be capable of all these qualities, as being compassed about with spheres both animate and virall; whereas bodies terrestriall and approaching neere unto the earth, are endued with none of them: and as for the order and decent composition therein, it came by accident, and not by prepened reason and counsell.

CHAP. IIII.

Whether the World be incorruptible and eternall.

PYTHAGORAS and PLATO affirme, that the world was ingendred and made by God; and of the owne nature (being corruptible) shall perish: for sensible it is, and therefore corporall; howbeit, in regard of the divine providence, which preserveth and maintaineth it, perish it shall never.

EPICURUS saith, that it is corruptible, for that it is engendred, like as a living creature or a plant.

XENOPHANES holdeth the world to be eternall, ingenerable, uncreated and incorruptible.

ARISTOTLE is of opinion, that the part of the world under the moone, is passible; whereas in the bodies also adjacent to the earth, be subject to corruption.

CHAP. V.

Whereof the World is nourished.

ARISTOTLE saith, that if the World be nourished, it is likewise corruptible, and wil perish; but so it is, that it hath no need of nouriture, and so by consequence it is eternall.

PLATO

PLATO is of opinion, that the world yeeldeth unto it selfe nouriture of that which perisheth, by way of mutation.

PHILOLAUS affirmeth, that there is a two-folde corruption; one while by fire falling from heaven, and another while by water of the moone, powred forth by the circugyratation and turning about of the aire; the exhalations whereof become the food of the world.

CHAP. VI.

At which element began God the fabricke of the world?

THE Naturalists doe holde, that the creation of the world began at earth, as the very center thereof; for that the beginning of a sphere or ball, is the center.

PYTHAGORAS saith, that it began at fire, and the fifth element.

EMPEDOCLES saith, that the first thing separate apart, was the skie or fifth essence, called Aether; the second, Fire; after which, the Earth; of which being thrust close and pressed together by the violence of revolution, sprang Water, from which Aire did evaporate: also, that heaven was made of that Skie or Quintessence; the sunne, of Fire; and of the other elements, were conspitate and felted (as it were) terrestriall bodies, and such as be neere the earth.

PLATO is of opinion, that this visible world was formed to the molde and pattern of the intellectuall: that of the visible world, the soule was first made; and after it, that which is corpulent: that of the fire and earth, first; that which standeth of water and aire, second.

PYTHAGORAS affirmed, that of the five solid bodies, which are also called Mathematically; the Cube (that is to say, a square bodie, with six faces) went to the making of the earth; of the pointed Pyramis, was made fire; of Octoedra or solide bodie with eight bases, the earth; of Icosiedra with twentie sides, the water; of Dodecaedra with twelve faces, the supreamie sphere of the universall world: and himselfe herein also doth Pythagorize.

CHAP. VII.

Of the order of the worlds fabricke.

PARMENIDES imagineth certeine coronets (as it were) enterlaced one within another, some of a rare substance, others of a thicke, and the same mixed of light and darknesse betweene; also that the bodie which contained them all together, was as firme and solid as a wall.

LEUCIPPUS and DEMOCRITUS entwapped the world round about with a tunicle or mbrane.

EPICURUS held, that the extremitie of some worlds were rare; of others thicke; and that of them, some were moveable, others immoveable.

PLATO setteth downe Fire first; secondly, the Skie; then Aire; afterwards, Water; and last of all, Earth; but otherwhiles, he conjoineth the Skie unto Fire.

ARISTOTLE rangeth in the first place, the impassible Aire, which is a certeine fifth bodie; and after it, the Elements passible, to wit, Fire, Aire, Water, and Earth the last: of all which, unto the celestiall bodies he attributeth a circular motion; and (of the others situate beneath them) unto the lighter kinde, the ascent or rising upward; unto the weightier, descent or falling downward.

EMPEDOCLES is of opinion, that the places of the elements are not alwaies steadie and certeine, but that they all interchange mutually one with another.

CHAP. VIII.

What is the cause that the world bendeth or creepeth forward.

DIOGENES and ANAXAGORAS affirme, that after the world was made, and that living creatures were produced out of the earth, the world bowed (I wot not how) of it selfe, and of the owne accord, to the Southerne or Meridionall part thereof; haply by the divine providence fo ordering all, that some parts of the world should be habitable, others inhabitable, according to excessive colde, extreme heat, and a meane temperature of both.

Zzz 2

EMPEDOCLES

EMPEDOCLES faith, that by reason that the aire gave place to the violence of the Sunne, the two Beares or Poles * bended, and inclined: as for those parts which were northerly, they were elevated and mounted aloft; but the southerne coasts were depressed and debased as much; and so accordingly the whole world.

CHAP. IX.

Whether without the world, there be any vacuities?

THE schoole of Pythagoras holdeth that there is a voidnesse without the world, to which, 10 and out of which the world doth draw breath: but the STOICKS affirme that into it, the infinite world by way of conflagration is resolved.

POSIDONIUS admitteth no other infinite, than as much as is sufficient for the dissolution thereof.

In the first booke of vacuities, ARISTOTLE faith, there is voidnesse.

PLATO affirmeth, that there is no empiness at all, either without or within the world.

CHAP. X.

PYTHAGORAS, PLATO, and ARISTOTLE do take the East for the right part, and the 20 West for the left.

EMPEDOCLES faith, that the right side bendeth toward the summers Tropic; and the left toward the Tropic of winter.

CHAP. XI.

Of Heaven, and what is the substance thereof.

ANAXIMENES affirmeth the exterior circumference of Heaven to be earthy. 30
EMPEDOCLES faith, that Heaven is solid, being made of aire condensate by fire, after the manner of chrystall; and that it containeth the fierie and airie nature in the one and the other hemisphere.

ARISTOTLE holdeth, that Heaven is composed of the fifth body above fire, or else of the mixture of heat and cold.

CHAP. XII.

Of the division of Heaven: and namely into how many Circles it is divided.

THALES, and PYTHAGORAS with his followers doe say, that the sphere of the whole 40 Heaven is parted into five circles, which they call certaine Zones cinctures or girdles; of which circles, one is called the Arctick, and is alwaies to be seene of us; a second the summer Tropic; a third Aequinoctiall; the fourth, winter Tropic; and the fifth the Antartick circle: which is evermore unseene: as touching the oblique or crooked circle, called the Zodiacke, which lieth under the other three middle circles above named, it toucheth them all three as it passeth, and every of them are cut in right angles by the Meridian, which goeth from pole to pole.

PYTHAGORAS was the first (men say) that observed the obliquity of the Zodiack: which invention nevertheless Oenopides the Chian, ascribeth to himselfe, as if he were the author 50 of it.

CHAP. XIII.

What is the substance of the Starres, and how they were made and composed.

THALES affirmeth them to be terrestriall, and nathlesse fierie and ardent.
EMPEDOCLES holdeth them to be enflamed by that fire, which the skie containing within within it selfe, did violently strike and send forth at the first excretion. ANAXAGORAS faith, that the sky which environeth, is indeed of the owne essence of a fiery nature; but by the violent revolution of it selfe, snatcheth up stones from the earth, and setting them on fire, they become Starres.

DIODEGENES thinketh, that Starres be of the substance of a pumish stone, as be being the breathing holes of the world: and againe, the same philosopher faith, that they be certaine blind-stones not apparent; howbeit, falling often to the earth, are there quenched, as it happeneth in a place called aiops norquids; that is to say, Goats rivers, where there fell sometime a stone-starre in forme of fire.

10 EMPEDOCLES holdeth, that the fixed Starres which wander not, be fastned to the christall skie; but the planets are loofe and at liberty.

PLATO giveth out, that for the most part they be of fire, and yet nevertheless they participate with other elements in maner of glue or foder.

XENOPHANES is of opinion, that they consist of clouds inflamed, which notwithstanding are quenched every day, & afterwards againe be fiered in the night in maner of coles: as for the rising and setting of Starres, they be nothing else but their catching fire and quenching.

HERACLYDES and the PYTHAGOREANS hold, that every Star is a world by it selfe, containing an earth, an aire, and a skie, in an infinit celestiall nature; and these opinions goe current in the verses of Orpheus, for they make of every Starre a world. EPICURUS reprooveth 20 none of all this, but holdeth still that old note of his: It may be so.

CHAP. XIII.

THE STOICKS say, that the Starres be sphericke or round like as the world, the sunne and moone. CLEANTHES holdeth them to be pointed and pyramiddall. ANAXIMENES faith, they sticke fast in the christalline skie, like a number of nailes. Others imagine that they be fierie plates, like unto flar pictures.

CHAP. XV.

Of the order and situation of Starres.

XENOCRATES supposeth that the Starres moove upon one and the same superficies: but 30 other Stoicks affirme that there be some afore others in heigh and depth.

DEMOCRITUS raungeth the fixed Starres first; next the planets; and after them, the sunne, the moone, and the day-starre Lucifer.

PLATO after the situation of the fixed Starres, setteth in the first place that which is called 40 Phaenon, to wit, the Starre of Saturne; in the second, Phaethon, which is the Starre of Jupiter; in the third, Pyrois, that is to say, fierie or ardent, and it is that of Mars; in the fourth Phosphorus, and that is Venus; in the fifth Stilbon, which is Mercurie; in the sixth, the Sunne; and last, in the seventh, the Moone. Of the Mathematicians some accord with Plato, others place the Sunne in the middes of them all.

ANAXIMANDER, METRODORUS the Chian, and CRATYS affirme, that the Sunne is placed highest of all, next to him the Moone, and under him the fixed Starres and the Planets;

CHAP. XVI.

Of the latitudes and motions of the Starres.

ANAXAGORAS, DEMOCRITUS, and CLEANTHES, doe hold, that all Starres doe 50 moove from east to west.

ALCMAON and the Mathematicians say, that the planets hold an opposite course to the fixed Starres, and namely from the west to the east.

ANAXIMANDER faith, they be caried by their spheres and circles, upon which they are fastned.

ANAXIMENES is of opinion, that they roll as well toward the earth, as turne about the earth.

PLATO and the Mathematicians hold, that the course of the Sunne, of Venus, and of Mercurie, is the same and equall.

CHAP. XVII.

From whence the Starres have their illumination.

METRODORUS thinketh, that all the fixed Starres have their light from the sunne. HERACLITUS, and the Stoicks say, that the Starres bee nourished by exhalations arising from the earth.

ARISTOTLE opineth, that the celestiall bodies need no nouriture, for that they are not corruptible but eternall.

PLATO and the Stoicks hold, that all the world and the Starres likewise be nourished of themselves.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of the two Starres named Dioscouri, to wit, Castor and Pollux.

XENOPHANES doth mainteine that the lights like Starres which appeere otherwhiles upon ships, are thinne and subtile clouds, which after a kinde of motion doe shine.

METRODORUS saith, they be certeine glittering sparkels glauncing and leaping out of their eies who behold them with feare and astonishment.

CHAP. XIX.

Of the signification of Starres, and how commeth winter and summer.

PLATO saith, that the tokens & significations both of Winter and Summer, proceed from the rising and setting of Sunne, Moone, and other Starres, as well fixed as wandering.

ANAXIMENES saith, that none of all this is occasioned by the Moone, but by the Sunne onely. EUDOXUS and ARATUS affirme them to bee in common, by meanes of all the Starres: and ARATUS sheweth as much in these verses:

*These radiant starres, and lights, so evident,
As signes, God hath set in the firmament,
Distinct, in great foresight, throughout the yeere,
To shew how all the seasons ordered were.*

CHAP. XX.

Of the Sunnes substance.

ANAXIMANDER affirmeth, that the circle of the Sunne is eight and twentie times bigger than the earth, having an hollow apsis about it, like (for all the world) unto a chariot wheele, and the same full of fire: in one certeine place whereof, there is a mouth, at which the fire is scene, as out of the hole of a flute, or such like pipe, and the same is the Sunne.

XENOPHANES holdeth, that there is a certeine gathering of small fires, which by occasion of moist exhalations, meet together; and they all (being collected) make the bodie of the Sun, or els (quoth he) is a cloud set on fire.

The STOICKS say, that the Sun is an inflamed body * intellectuall, or humour inflamed, proceeding out of the sea.

PLATO imagineth it to consist of much fire:

ANAXAGORAS, DEMOCRITUS, and METRODORUS suppose it to be a masse of yron, or a stone inflamed.

ARISTOTLE is of opinion, that it is a sphere out of the fifth body.

PHILOLAUS the Pythagorean, is perswaded that it is in maner of a glasse, receiving the reverberation of all the fire in the world, and transmitting the light thereof unto us (as it were) thorow

* whether or no, it is after some.

thorow a tannise or streiner, in such sort, as that fierie light in heaven resembleth the Sun: then that which proceedeth from it, is in forme of a mirrour: and thirdly, there is a splendour, which by way of reflexion from that mirrour, is spread upon us: and this call we the Sun, as it were the image of an image.

EMPEDOCLES is of this minde, that there be two Sunnes, the one an originall and primitive fire, which is in the other hemisphere of the world; and the same filling this hemisphere of ours, as being alwaies situate full opposit to the reflexion of the resplendent light thereof: as for this that we see, it is the light in that other hemisphere, replenished with aire mixed with hear, & the same is occasioned by refraction from the earth, that is more round, entering into the Sun, which is of a CrySTALLINE nature, and yet is trained and caried away together with the motion of that fire. But to speake more plainly and succinctly in fewer words, this is as much to say, as the Sunne is nothing els, but the reflexion of that light of the fire which is about the earth.

EPICURUS imagineth the Sun to be a retretriall spissitude or thicknesse, yet spungeous (as it were) and hollow in maner of a pumish stone, and in those holes lightened by fire.

CHAP. XXI.

Of the Sunnes magnitude.

ANAXIMANDER is of opinion, that the Sunne is equall in bignesse to the earth; but the circle from which he hath his respiration, and upon which he is caried, is eight and twentie times bigger than the whole earth.

ANAXAGORAS said, it was by many degrees greater than all Peloponnesus.

HERACLITUS held, that it was a mans foot broad.

EPICURUS againe affirmed, that all above said might be; or that it was as bigge as it appeared to be, at leastwise a little under or over.

CHAP. XXII.

Of the Sunnes forme.

ANAXIMENES imagined that the Sunne was flat and broad, like unto a thinne plate of metall.

HERACLITUS supposed it to be made like unto a boat, somewhat curbed downward, and turning up.

The STOICKS suppose it to be round, like unto the whole world and other starres.

EPICURUS saith, that all this may be well enough.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of the Solstices or Tropiques of the Sunne.

ANAXIMENES thinketh that the Starres are beaten backe by the thicke aire, and the same making resistance.

ANAXAGORAS saith, that they are occasioned by the repulse of the aire, about the Beares or Poles, which the Sunne himselfe (by thrusting and making thicke) causeth to be more powerful.

EMPEDOCLES ascribeth the reason thereof to the sphere, that containeth and impeacheth him from passing farther; as also to the two Tropique circles.

DIOPHES imagineth, that the Sun is extinct by the cold, falling opposit upon the heat. The STOICKS affirme, that the Sunne passeth thorow the tract and space of his food and pasture lying under him, which is the Ocean sea or the earth, upon the vapours and exhalation whereof he feedeth.

PLATO, PYTHAGORAS and ARISTOTLE holde, that this is occasioned by the obliquitie of the Zodiacke circle, thorow which the Sunne passeth bialse; as also, by reason of the Tropique circles, which environ and guard him about: and all this, the very sphere it selfe doth evidently shew.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of the Sunnes eclipse.

THALES was the first who observed the Sunnes eclipse, and said, that it was occasioned by the Moone, which is of a terrestriall nature, when as in her race, she commeth to be just and plumb under him; which may be plainly seene as in a mirrour, by setting a balon of water underneath.

ANAXIMANDER said, that the Sun became eclipsed, when the mouth or tunnill (at which the heat of his fire commeth forth) is closed up.

HERACLITUS is of opinion, that this hapneth, when the bodie of the Sun which is made like a boat, is turned upside downe, so as the hollow part thereof is upward, and the keele downward to our sight.

XENOPHANES affirmeth, that this commeth by extinction of one Sun, & the rising of another againe in the East: he addeth moreover, and reporteth, that there is an eclipse of the Sun, during one whole moneth; as also one entire and universall eclipse, in such maner, as the day seemeth to be night.

Others ascribe the cause thereof, to the thickenesse of clouds, which suddenly and after an hidden maner, overcast the rundle and plate of the Sunne.

ARISTARCHUS reckoneth the Sunne among the fixed Starres, saying, that it is the earth which rolleth and turneth round about the Sunnes circle, and according to the inclinations thereof, the Sunnes lightsome bodie commeth to be darkened by her shade.

XENOPHANES holdeth, that there be many Sunnes and Moones, according to the divers Climats, Tracts, Sections, and Zones of the earth: and at a certaine revolution of time, the rundle of the Sunne falleth upon some Climate or Section of the earth, which is not of us inhabited; and so marching (as it were) in some void place, he suffereth eclipse: he also affirmeth, that the Sun goeth indeed infinitely forward still, but by reason of his huge distance and retract from us, seemeth to turne round about.

CHAP. XXV.

Of the Moones substance.

ANAXIMANDER saith, that the Moone is a circle, xix. times bigger than the earth, and like as that of the Sunne, full of fire; that she suffereth eclipse when her wheele turneth: for that he saith, that circle resembleth the wheele of a chariot, the movature or felly whereof, is hollow and full of fire; howbeit, there is an hole or tunnell, out of which the fire doth exhale.

XENOPHANES saith, that the Moone is a thicke, compact, and felted cloud.

The STOICKS hold, that she is mixed of fire and aire.

PLATO affirmeth, that she standeth more of a fierie substance.

ANAXAGORAS and DEMOCRITUS do hold, that the Moone is a solid and firme bodie all fiery, containing in it, champian grounds, mountaines and vallies.

HERACLITUS is of opinion that it is earth overspred with mists.

PYTHAGORAS also thinketh that the bodie of the Moone is of the nature of fire.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the Moones magnitude.

THE STOICKS pronounce flatly that the Moone is bigger than the Earth, like as the Sunne also.

PARMENIDES affirmeth it to be equal in brightnesse to the Sunne, and that of him she hath her light.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of the Moones forme.

THE STOICKS say, the Moone is round as a globe, like as the Sunne.

EMPEDOCLES would have it to resemble a balon or platter.

HERA-

HERACLITUS compareth it to a boat; and others to a round cylinder; * [that she is shaped seven manner of waies: at her first birth as it were she appeereth horned or tipped; then divided or quartered; afterwards growing somewhat together; and soone after full: from which time by little and little she waneeth by degrees; first bending somewhat close, then quartered, and after that tipped and horned, untill at the change she appeereth not at all: and they say this variety of her configurations, is occasioned by the earth shadowing her light more or lesse, according as the convexitie of the earth commeth betwene.]

* That which is inserted between these two marks [ ] I finde neither in the original Greeke, nor in the French, but in the Latine only.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of the Moones illuminations.

ANAXIMANDER saith, that she hath a light of her owne, but the same very rare and thinn.

ANTIPHON affirmeth, that she shineth with her owne light: and whereas she is otherwise hidden, it proceedeth from the opposition of the sunne; namely, when a greater fire commeth to darken a lesse, a thing incident to other starres.

THALES and his followers hold, that the Moone is lighted by the sunne.

HERACLITUS supposeth, that the case of the sunne and Moone is all one, for that both of them being formed like a boat, and receiving moist exhalations, they seeme in our sight illuminate; the sunne brighter of the twaine, for that he goeth in a more cleere and pure aire, and the Moone in that which is more troubled, which is the reason that she seemeth more darke and muddy.

CHAP. XXIX.

Of the Moones Eclipse.

* ANAXIMENES saith, that the Moone is Eclipsed, when the mouth or venting hole * whereout issueth her fire, is stopped.

BEROSUS is of opinion, that it is when that face and side of hers which is not lighted, turneth toward us.

HERACLITUS would have it to be, when the convexitie or swelling part of the boat which she doth represent, regardeth us directly.

Some of the PYTHAGOREANS doe holde the eclipse of the Moone to be partly a reversion of light, and in part an obstruction; the one in regard of the earth, the other of the Antipodes, who tread opposite unto us. But the moderne writers are of opinion, that it is by occasion of the augmentation of the Moones flame, which regularly and by order is lighted by little and little, untill it represent unto us the full face of the Moone, and againe doth diminish and wane in proportion, untill the conjunction, at what time it is altogether extinct.

PLATO, ARISTOTLE, the STOICKS, and MATHEMATICIANS, do all with one accord say, that the occultations of the Moone every moneth, are occasioned by reason that she falleth in conjunction with the sunne; by whose brightnesse she becommeth dimme and darkened: but the Eclipses of the Moone be caused when the commeth within the shadow of the earth, situate directly betwene both Starres, rather for that the Moone is altogether obstructed therewith.

CHAP. XXX.

Of the Moones apparition, and why she seemeth to be earthy.

THE PYTHAGOREANS affirme, that the Moone appeereth terrestriall, for that she is inhabited round about, like as the earth wherein we are, and peopled as it were with the greatest living creatures, and the fairest plants; and those creatures within her, be fiftene times stronger and more puissant than those with us, and the same yeld forth no excrements, and the * day there, is in that proportion so much longer.

ANAXAGORAS saith, that the inequality which is seene in the face of the Moone, proceedeth from the coagmentation of cold and terrestriety mixed together, for that there is a certene * Hipparchus, some readen ΝΥΧΤΙ, that is to say, night.

certaine tenebrositie medled with the fierie nature thereof : whereupon this starre is said to be Pseudophores, that it to say, to have a false light.

The STOICKS are of opinion, that by reason of the diversitie of her substance, the composition of her bodie is not subject to corruption.

CHAP. XXXI.

The distance betweene Sunne and Moone.

EMPEDOCLES thinketh, that the Moone is twice as far off from the Sunne as she is from 10 the earth.

The MATHEMATICIANS say, that the distance is eightene times as much.

ERATOSTHENES giveth out, the Sunne is from the earth 408. thousand stadia, ten times told : and the Moone from the earth 78. thousand stadia, ten times multiplied.

CHAP. XXXII.

Of the yeeres : And how much the yeere of every Planet containeth the great yeere.

THe revolution or yeere of Saturne comprehendeth thirtie common yeeres : Of Jupiter 12 twelve : of Mars two : of the Sunne, twelve moneths : those of Mercurie and Venus be all one, for their course is equall : of the Moone thirtie daies : for this we count a perfect month, to wit, from the apparition to the conjunction. As for the great yeere ; some say, it compriseth eight yeeres : others nineteen, and others againe sixtie wanting one. HERACLITUS saith it consisteth of 80000. solare yeeres. DIODEGENES of 365. yeeres, such as Heraclitus speaketh of : and others of 7777.

THE THIRD BOOKE OF
Philosophers opinions.

The Proöme.

HAVING summarily, and after a cursorie manner treated in the former bookes, of celestiall bodies, and resting in the confines thereof, which is the Moone, I will addresse my selfe in this third booke, to discourse of Meteores, that is to say, of such impressions as be engendred in the aire above, to wit, betweene the circle of the Moone and the situation of the earth : the which men hold generally to be in stead of the prick or center in that compasse of the universall Globe. And heereat will 40 I beginne.

CHAP. I.

Of the Milke way or white circle Galaxia.

THis Galaxia is a cloudie or mistie circle, appearing alwaies in the skie ; and called it is the Milke way, of the white colour which it doth represent.

Of the Pythagoreans some say, it is the inflammation or burning out of some starre removed, and falling out of his proper place, which hath burnt round about all the way as it passed, from the verie time of Phaethon his conflagration.

Others hold, that in old time the race and course of the Sun was that way. Some are of opinion, that it is a specularie apparition, only occasioned by the reflexion of the Sun-beames against the cope of heaven, even as we observe it to fall out betweene the rainbow and thicke clouds.

METRODORUS affirmeth it to be caused by the passage of the Sunne : for that this is the solare circle.

PARMENIDES is of opinion that the mixture of that which is thicke, with the rare or thin, engendred this milkie colour.

ANAXAGORAS

ANAXAGORAS saith, that the shadow of the earth resteth upon this part of heaven, at what time as the Sunne being underneath the earth, doth not illuminate all throughout.

DEMOCRITUS is perswaded, that it is the resplendent light of many small starres, and those close together, shining one upon another, and so occasioned by their spissitude and striction.

ARISTOTLE would have it to be an inflammation of a drie exhalation ; the same being great in quantitie and continued : and so there is an hairy kind of fire under the skie, and beneath the planets.

POSSIDONIUS supposeth it to be a consistence of fire, more cleere and subtile than a starre, and yet thicker than a splendeur or shining light.

CHAP. II.

Of Comets, or Blazing starres : of Starres seeming to shoot and fall : as also of fierie beames appearing in the aire.

SOME of Pythagoras scholars affirme, that a Comet is a starre of the number of those which appeare not alwaies, but at certaine prefixed seasons after some periodicall revolutions do arise.

Others affirme it to be the reflexion of our sight against the Sunne, after the manner of those 20 resemblances which shew in mirrours or looking glasses.

ANAXAGORAS and DEMOCRITUS say, that it is a concurse of two starres or more meeting with their lights together.

ARISTOTLE is of opinion, that it is a consistence of a drie exhalation enflamed.

STRATO saith, that it is the light of a starre enwrapped within a thicke cloud, as we see it ordinarily in our lamps and burning lights.

HERACLIDES of PONTUS holdeth it to be a cloud heaved and elevated on high, and the same illuminated by some high light also : and the like reason giveth he of the bearded blazing star called Pagionias. Others (like as all the Perepateticks) affirme, that the beame, the colunne, and such other meteors or impressions are made after the same manner by divers configurations 30 of clouds in the aire.

EPIGENES supposeth a Comet to be an elevation of spirit or wind mixed with an earthly substance, and set on fire.

BOETHUS imagineth it to be an apparition of the aire, let loose as it were, and spread at large.

DIODEGENES is perswaded that Comets be starres.

ANAXAGORAS saith, that the starres which are said to shoot, be as it were sparkles falling from the elementarie fire : which is the cause that they are quenched and gone out so quickly.

METRODORUS supposeth, that when the Sunne striketh violently upon a cloud, the beames or raies thereof do sparkle, and so cause this shooting of starres as they teame it.

XENOPHANES would beare us in hand, that all such Meteors and Impressions as these, be 40 constitutions or motions of clouds enflamed.

CHAP. III.

Of shouders, lightnings, flashes, presters or fierie blastes, and tempestuous whirlwinds.

ANAXIMANDER supposeth, that all these come by wind : for when it hapneth that it is conceived & inclosed within a thicke cloud, then by reason of the subtiltie and lightnesse thereof, it breaketh forth with violence : and the rupture of the cloud maketh a cracke ; and the divulsion or cleaving, by reason of the blacknesse of the cloud, causeth a shining light.

METRODORUS saith, when a wind chanceth to be enclosed within a cloud gathered thicke and close together, the said wind by bursting of the cloud maketh a noise ; and by the stroke and breach it shineth ; but by the quicke motion catching heat of the Sunne, it shooteth forth lightning ; but if the said lightning be weake, it turneth into a Prester or burning blase.

ANAXAGORAS is of opinion, that when ardent heat falleth upon cold, that is to say, when a portion of celestiall fire lighteth upon the aire substance ; by the cracking noise thereof is caused thunder ; by the colour against the blacknesse of the cloud, a flashing beame ; by the plentie and greatnesse of the light, that which we call lightning : and in case the fire be more grosse and 10 corpulent, corpulent, there ariseth of it a whitewind; but if the same be of a cloudie nature, it engendreth a burning blast called Prester.

The STOICKS hold thunder to be a combat, and smiting together of clouds: that a flashing beame, is a fire or inflammation proceeding from their attrition: that lightning is a more violent flashing, and Prester, lesse forcible.

ARISTOTLE supposeth, that all these meteores come likewise of a dry exhalation, which being gotten enclosed within a moist cloud, seeketh means, and striveth forcibly to get forth: now by attrition and breaking together, it causeth the clap of thunder; by inflammation of the drie substance, a flashing beame; but Presters, Typhons, that is to say, burning blasts and whirlwindes, according as the store of matter is, more or lesse, which the one and the other draweth to it; but if the same be hotter, you shall see Prester, if thicker, looke for Typhon.

CHAP. III.

Of Clouds, Raine, Snowe, and Haile.

ANAXIMENEs saith, that clouds are engendered when the aire is most thicke, which if they coagulate still more and more, there is expressed from them a shewer of raine: but in case this matter as it falleth, doe congeale, it turneth to be snow; but say it meet with a colde moist wind and be surprized therewith, it prooveth haile.

METRODORUS supposeth, that clouds be composed of a waterish evaporation elevated, by the long way of their descent.

CHAP. V.

Of the Rainbow.

Among those meteors or impressions engendered in the aire, some there be which have a true substance indeed, as raine and haile: others againe, have no more but a bare appearance, without any reall substance, much like as when we are within a ship, we imagine that the continent and firme land doth move: and among those which are in appearance onely, we must range the Rainbow. PLATO saith, that men derive the genealogie of it from 7 haumas, as one would say, from wonder, because they marvelled much to see it: according as Homer sheweth in this verse:

*Like as when mightie Jupiter the purple rainbow bends, Thereby to mortall men from heaven, a wondrous token sends,
Which either tempests terrible, or we shall warre pretends.*

And hereupon it is, that some have made thereof a fabulous device, and given out, that she having a bulles head, drinketh up the rivers. But how is this Rainbow ingendered, and how cometh it so to appeare? Certes, we see by lines, either direct and streight, or crooked, or els rebated and broken; which though they be obscure, and appeare not evidently, yet are perceived by cogitation and discourse of reason, as being bodilesse. Now by right lines we beholde things, some in the aire, and others thorow transparent stones and hornes; for that all these consist of very subtil parts: by crooked and curbed lines, we looke within the water; for our eie sight doth bend and turne againe perforce, by reason that the matter of the water is more thicke; which is the cause, that we see the mariners oare in the sea a farre off, as it were crooked. The third manner of seeing, is by refraction, and so we beholde objects in mirrours; and of this sort is the Rainbow: for we must consider and understand, that a moist vapour being lifted up aloft, is converted into a cloud; and then within a while by little and little, into small dew-drops: when as therefore, the Sun descendeth Westward, it can not chuse, but every Rainbow must needs appeere opposit unto it in the contrary part of the sky: and when our sight falleth upon those drops, it is rebated and beaten backe; and by that means there is presented unto it a Rainbow: now those drops are not of the forme and figure of a bow, but represent a colour onely: and verily, the first and principall hew that this bow hath, is a light and bright red; the second, a deepe vermilion or purple; the third, blue and Greene: let us consider then, whether the said red colour appeare not, because the brightnesse of the Sunne beating upon the cloud, and the sincere light thereof thereof reflected & driven back, maketh a ruddy or light red hew; but the second part more obscure, and rebating the said splendor through those dew drops, causeth a purple tincture, which is (as it were) an abatement of red; and then as it becometh more muddie still, & darkning that which distinguisheth the sight, it turneth into a Greene: and this is a thing which may be proved by experience; for if a man take water directly against the Sunne beames in his mouth, and spit the same forward, in such sort, as the drops receive a repercussion against the said raies of the Sunne, he shall finde that it will make (as it were) a Rainbow. The like befalleth unto them that are beleere-cied, when they looke upon a lampe or burning light.

ANAXIMENEs supposeth, that the Rainbow is occasioned by the Sun shining full against a grosse, thicke and blacke cloud, in such sort, as his beames be not able to pierce and strike thorow, by reason that they turne againe upon it, and become condensate.

ANAXAGORAS holdeth the Rainbow to be the refraction or repercussion of the Sunnes round light against a thicke cloud, which ought alwaies to be opposit full against him, in manner of a mirrour: by which reason, in nature it is said, that there appeare two Sunnes in the countrey of Pontus.

METRODORUS saith, when the Sunne shineth thorow clouds, the cloud seemeth blue, but the light looketh red.

CHAP. VI.

Of Water-galles or streaks like rods, somewhat resembling Rainbowes.

These rods and opposit apparitions of Sunnes, which are seene otherwhiles in the skie, happen through the temperature of a subject matter and illumination; namely, when clouds are seene, not in their naturall and proper colour, but by another, caused by a divers irradiation: and in all these, the like passions fall out both naturally, and also are purchased by accident.

CHAP. VII.

Of Winds.

ANAXIMANDER is of opinion, that the WInde is a fluxion of the aire; when as the most subtile and liquid parts thereof be either stirred, or melted and resolved by the Sunne.

The STOICKS affirme, that every blast is a fluxion of the aire, and that according to the mutation of regions, they change their names; as for example, that which bloweth from the darknesse of the night and Sunne setting, is named Zephyrus; from the East and Sunne rising, Apeliotes; from the North, Boreas; and from the South, Libis.

METRODORUS supposeth, that a watrish vapour being inhaled by the heat of the Sun, produceth and raiseth these winds: and as for those that be anniversary, named Etesia, they blow, when the aire about the North pole is thickened and congealed with cold, and so accompanie the Sunne, and flow (as it were) with him, as he retireth from the Summer Tropicke; after the Aestivall Solstice.

CHAP. VIII.

Of Winter and Summer.

EMPEDOCLES and the STOICKS do hold, that Winter cometh, when the aire is predominant in thickenesse, and is forced upward; but Summer, when the fire is in that wife predominant, and is driven downward.

Thus having discoursed of the impressions aloft in the aire, we will treat also (by the way) of those which are seene upon and about the earth.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Earth: the substance and magnitude thereof.

THALES with his followers affirme, there is but one Earth.

ORCETES the Pythagorean, maintaineth twaine; one heere, and another opposit against

Aaaa

gainst it, which the Antipodes inhabit.

The STOICKS say, there is one Earth, and the same finite.

XENOPHANES holdeth, that beneath it is founded upon an infinite depth; and that compact it is of aire and fire.

METRODORUS is of opinion, that Earth is the very sediment and ground of the waters, like as th Sunne is the residence of the aire.

CHAP. X.

The forme of the Earth.

THALES, the STOICKS and their school: affirme the Earth to be round, in manner of a globe or ball.

ANAXIMANDER resembleth the Earth unto a column or pillar of stone, such as are scene upon the superficies thereof.

ANAXIMENES compareth it to a stable; LAUCIPPUS, unto a drum or tabour: DEMOCRITUS saith, that it is in forme, broad in manner of a platter, hollow in the mids.

CHAP. XI.

The situation of the Earth.

THE disciples of THALES maintaine, that the Earth is seated in midst of the world.

XENOPHANES affirmeth, that it was first founded and rooted as it were to an infinite depth.

PHILOLAUS the Pythagorean saith, that fire is the middle, as being the hearth of the world, in the second place he raungeth the Earth of the Antipodes: and in the third, this wherein wee inhabit, which lieth opposite unto that counter earth, and turneth about it: which is the reason (quoth he) that those who dwell there, are not seene by the inhabitants heere.

PARMENIDES was the first Philosopher, who set out and limited the habitable parts of the Earth, to wit, those which are under the two Zones, unto the Tropicks or Solstitiall circles.

CHAP. XII.

Of the bending of the earth.

PYTHAGORAS is of opinion, that the earth enclineth toward the Meridionall parts, by reason of the raritie which is in those South coasts: for that the Septentrionall tracts are congealed, and frozen with cold, whereas the opposite regions be inflamed and burnt.

DEMOCRITUS yeeldeth this reason; because of the ambient aire is weaker toward the South 40 (quoth hee) the Earth as it groweth and encreaseth, doth bend to that side: for the North parts be intemperate; whereas contrariwise the Southeren parts are temperate: in which regard it weigheth more that way, whereas indeed it is more plentifull in bearing fruits, and those growing to greater augmentation.

CHAP. XIII.

The motion of the Earth.

SOME hold the Earth to be unmoveable and quiet: but PHILOLAUS the Pythagorean 50 saith, that it moveth round about the fire, in the oblique circle, according as the Sunne and Moone do.

HERACLIDES of Pontus, and Ephantus the Pythagorean, would indeed have the Earth to move, howbeit not from place to place, but rather after a turning manner like unto a wheele upon the axell tree, from West to East, round about her owne center.

DEMOCRITUS saith, that the Earth at first wandered to and fro, by reason as well of of smalnesse as lightnesse: but waxing in time thicke and heavie, it came to rest unmoveable.

CHAP. XIII.

The division of the Earth, and how many Zones it hath.

PYTHAGORAS saith, that the earth is divided into five Zones proportionably to the sphere 10 of the universall heaven; to wit, the Artick circle, the Tropick of Summer, the Tropick of Winter, the Aequinoctiall and the Antartick. Of which the middlemost doth determine and set out the verie mids and heart of the earth: and for that cause it is named Torrida Zona, that is to say, the burnt climat: but that region is habitable, as being temperate, which lieth in the mids between the summer and the winter Tropick.

CHAP. XV.

Of Earthquakes.

THALES and DEMOCRITUS attribute the cause of Earthquakes unto water.

THE STOICKS thus define and lay, Earthquake is the moisture within the earth subliated and resolved into the aire, and so breaking out perforce.

ANAXIMENES is of opinion, that raritie and driness of the earth together, be the causes of Earthquake: wherof the one is engendred by excessive drought, the other by gluts of raine.

ANAXAGORAS holdeth, that when the aire is gotten within the earth, and meeteth with the superficies thereof, which it findeth tough and thicke, so as it cannot get forth, it shaketh it in manner of trembling.

ARISTOTLE alledgeth, the Antiperiastis of the circumstant cold which environeth it 30 about on everie side, both above and beneath: for heat endeavoreth and maketh hast to mount aloft, as being by nature light. A drie exhalation, therefore finding it selfe enclosed within and staid, striveth to make way through the cliffs and thicks of the Earth, in which busines it cannot chuse but by turning to and fro, up and downe disquiet and shake the earth.

METRODORUS is of mind, that no bodie being in the owne proper and naturall place can stirre or moove, unlesse some one do actually thrust or pull it. The earth therefore (quoth he) being situate in the owne place, naturally mooveth not: howsoever some places thereof may remove into others.

PARMENIDES and DEMOCRITUS reason in this wise: for that the earth on everie side is of equal distance, and confineth still in one counterpoise, as having no cause wherfore it 40 should incline more to the one side than to the other: therefore well it may shake onely, but not stirre or remove for all that.

ANAXIMENES saith, that the Earth is caried up and downe in the aire, for that it is broad and flat.

Others say, that it floateth upon the water, like as planks or boards, and that for this cause it mooveth.

PLATO affirmeth, that of all motions there be fix sorts of circumstances, above, beneath, on the right hand, on the left, before and behind. Also that the earth cannot possibly moove according to any of these differences: for that on everie side it lieth lowest of all things in the world, and by occasion thereof resteth unmoveable, having no cause why it should encline 50 more to one part than to another, but yet some places of her because of their raritie do joggle and shake.

EPICURUS keepeth his old tune, saying, it may well be, that the earth being shogged, and as it were rocked and beaten by the aire underneath, which is grosse and of the nature of water, therefore mooveth and quaketh. As also, it may be (quoth he) that being holow and full of holes in the parts below, it is forced to tremble and shake by the aire that is gotten within the caves and concavities, and there enclosed.

CHAP. XVI.

Of the Sea, how it was made and cometh to be bitter.

ANAXIMANDER affirmeth, that the Sea is a residue remaining of the primitive humidity; whereof the Sunne having burnt up and consumed a great part, therest behind he altered and turned from the naturall kind by his excessive ardent heat.

ANAXAGORAS is of opinion, that the said first humiditie being diffused and spread abroad in manner of a poole or great meere, was burnt by the motion of the sunne about it: and when the oileous substance thereof was exhaled and consumed, the rest settled below, and turned into a brackish and bitter-saltneffe, which is the Sea.

EMPEDOCLÉS saith, that the Sea is the sweat of the earth, enchaſed by the sunne, being bathed and washed all over aloft.

ANTISTON thinketh it to be the sweat of heat, the moisture whereof which was within, being by much seething and boiling sent out, becometh salt; a thing ordinary in all sweats.

METRODORUS suppoſeth the Sea to be that moisture, which running thorough the earth, retained some part of the densitie thereof, like as that which passeth through ashes.

The disciples of PLATO imagine, that so much of the elementarie water which is congealed of the aire by refrigeration, is sweet and fresh; but whatsoever did evaporate by burning and inflammation, became salt.

CHAP. XVII.

Of the Tides, to wit, the ebbing and flowing of the sea, what is the cause thereof?

ARISTOTLE and HERACLITUS affirme, that it is the sunne which doth it, as who stirreth, raiseth, and carrieth about with him the most part of the windes, which coming to blow upon the Ocean, cause the Atlantike sea to swell, and so make the flux or high waters; but when the same are allayed and cleane downe, the sea falleth low, and so causeth a reflux and ebbe or low water.

PYTHEAS of Marſeils, referreth the cause of Flowing to the full moone, and of Ebbing to the moone in the wane.

PLATO attributeth all to a certaine rising of the waters, saying, There is such an elevation, that through the mouth of a cave carrieth the Ebbe and Flow to and fro, by the meanes whereof, the seas doe rise and flow contrarily.

TIMAEUS alledgeth the cause hereof to be the rivers, which falling from the mountaines in Gaule, enter into the Atlantique sea, which by their violent corruptions, driving before them the water of the sea, cause the Flow, and by their ceasing and returne backe by times, the Ebbe.

SELVUCUS the Mathematician, who affirmed also, that the earth mooved, saith, that the motion thereof is opposit and contrary to that of the moone: also that the winde being driven to and fro, by these two contrary revolutions, bloweth and beateth upon the Atlantike ocean, troubleth the sea also (and no marvell) according as it is disquieted it selfe.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of the round circle called Halo.

THIS Halo is made after this manner: betweene the body of the moone, or any other starre, and our eye-sight, there gathereth a grosse and mistie aire, by which aire, anon our sight cometh to be reflected and diffused; and afterwards the same incurreth upon the said starre, according to the exterior circumference thereof, and thereupon appeereth a circle round about the starre, which being there seene is called Halo, for that it seemeth that the apparent impression is close unto that, upon which our sight so enlarged as is before said, doth fall.

Philosophers opinions.

The Proæme.

Having runne through the generall parts of the world, I will now passe unto the particulars.

CHAP. I.

Of the rising and inundation of Nilus.

THALES thinketh that the anniverſarie windes called Etesiae blowing directly against Aegypt, cause the water of Nilus to swell, for that the sea being driven by these windes, entrench within the mouth of the said river, and hindereth it, that it cannot discharge it selfe freely into the sea, but is repulſed backward.

EUTHYMENES of Marſeils, suppoſeth that this river is filled with the water of the ocean, and the great sea lying without the continent, which he imagineth to be fresh and sweet.

ANAXAGORAS saith, that this hapneth by the snowe in Aethiopia, which melteth in summer, and is congealed and frozen in winter.

DEMOCRITUS is of opinion, that it is long of the snowe in the north parts, which about the æſtival ſolſtice and returne of the sunne, being dissolved and dilated, breedeth vapors, and of them be engendred clouds, which being driven by the Etesian windes into Aethiopia and Aegypt toward the south, cause great and violent raines, wherewith both lakes, and the river also Nilus, be filled.

HERODOTUS the Historian writeth, that this river hath as much water from his sources and springs, in winter as in summer; but to us it seemeth lesse in winter, because the sunne being then neerer unto Aegypt, causeth the said water to evaporate.

EPHORUS the Historiographer reporteth, that all Aegypt doth resolve and runne at it were wholly into sweet in summer time: whereunto Arabia and Libya doe conferre, and contribute also their waters, for that the earth there is light and sandy.

EUDOXUS saith, that the priests of Aegypt assigne the cause hereof to the great raines and the Antiperſtaſis or contrarie occurre of seasons; for that when it is Summer with us, who inhabit within the Zone toward the Summer Tropicke, it is Winter with those who dwell in the opposit Zone under the Winter Tropicke, whereupon (saith he) proceedeth this great inundation of waters, breaking downe unto the river Nilus.

CHAP. II.

Of the Soule.

THALES was the first that defined the Soule to be a nature moving alwaies, or having motion of it selfe.

PYTHAGORAS saith, it is a certaine number moving it selfe; and this number he taketh for intelligence or understanding.

PLATO suppoſeth it to be an intellectuall substance mooving it selfe, and that according to harmonical number.

ARISTOTLE is of opinion, that it is the first Entelechia or primitive act of a naturall and organicall bodie, having life potentially.

DICEARCHUS thinketh it to be the harmonie and concordance of the foure elements.

ASCLEPIADES the Phyſician, defineth it to be an exercise in common of all the senses together.

CHAP. III.

Whether the Soule be a body, and what is the substance of it.

ALl these Philosophers before rehearsed, suppose that the Soule is incorporall, that of the owne nature it mooveth and is a spirittuall substance, and the action of a naturall bodie.

die, composed of many organs or instruments, and withall having life.

But the Sectaries of ANAXAGORAS, have given out, that it is of an aircie substance, and a very body.

The STOICKS would have the Soule to be an hot spirit or breath.

DEMOCRITUS holdeth it to be a certeine fierie composition of things perceptible by reason, and the same having their formes sphericall and round, and the puillance of fire, and withall to be a body.

EPICURUS saith, it is a mixtion or temperature of foure things, to wit, of a certeine fire, of (I wot not what) aire, of an odde windie substance, and of another fourth matter, I cannot tel what to name it, and which to him was sensible. 10

HERACLITUS affirmeth, the Soule of the world to be an evaporation of humors within it: as for the Soule of living creatures, it proceedeth (quoth he) as well from an evaporation of humors without, as an exhalation within it selfe, and of the same kinde.

CHAP. III.

The parts of the Soule.

PYTHAGORAS and PLATO, according to a more generall and remote division, hold, that the Soule hath two parts, that is to say, the Reasonable & the unreasonable; but to goe 20 more neere and exactly to worke, they say, it hath three; for they subdivided the unreasonable part into Concupisibile and Irascible.

The STOICKS be of opinion, that composed it is of eight parts, whereof five be the senses naturall, to wit, sight, hearing, smelling, tasting, and feeling; the sixth is the voice; the seventh generative or spermaticall, and the eight, understanding, which guideth and commaundeth all the rest by certeine proper organs and instruments, like as the Polype fish by her cleies and hairy branches.

DEMOCRITUS and EPICURUS set downe two parts of the Soule; the Reasonable seated in the brest, and the unreasonable spread and dispersed over all the structure of the body besides.

As for DEMOCRITUS, he affirmeth, that all things whatsoever, have a certeine kinde of 30 Soule, even the very dead bodies, for that alwaies they doe manifestly participate a kinde of heat and sensitive facultie, notwithstanding the most part thereof be breathed forth, and yeelded up.

CHAP. V.

Which is the Mistresse and commanding part of the Soule, and wherein it is.

PLATO and DEMOCRITUS place it in the head throughout: STRATO betweene the 40 twocie browes: ERASISTRATUS in the membrane or kell that enfoldeth the braine, and it he calleth Epiëranis: HEROPHILUS within the ventricle or concavities of the braine, which also is the basis or foundation of it: PARMENIDES over all the brest, and with him accordeth EPICURUS: the STOICKS all with one voice hold it in the whole heart, or else in the spirit about the heart: DIOGENES in the cavities of the great arterie of the heart, which is full of vitall spirit: EMPEDOCLES in the consistence or masse of bloud: others in the verie necke of the heart: some in the tunicle that lappeth the heart: and others againe in the midriff: some of our moderne philosophers hold, that it taketh up & occupieth all the space from the head downward to the Diaphragma or midriffe above said: PYTHAGORAS supposeth that the vitall part of the Soule is about the heart, but the reason and the intellectuall or spirituall part, about the head. 50

CHAP. VI.

The motion of the Soule.

PLATO is of opinion, that the Soule mooveth continually; but the intelligence or understanding is immoveable, in regard of local motion from place to place.

ARISTOTLE saith, that the soule it selfe moveth not, although it be the author that rules & directeth directeth all motion; howbeit, that by an accident, it is not devoid of motion, according as divers sorts of bodies do move.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Soules immortallitie.

PYTHAGORAS and PLATO affirme the Soule to be immortall; for in departing out of the bodie, it retireth to the Soule of the universall world, even to the nature which is of the same kinde.

20 The STOICKS hold, that the Soule going from the bodie, if it be feeble and weake, as that is of ignorant persons, seileth downward with the grosse consistence of the bodie; but if it be more firme and puissant, as that is of wise and learned men, it continueth * even unto the conflagration of all.

DEMOCRITUS and EPICURUS say, that it is corruptible, and perisheth together with the bodie.

PYTHAGORAS and PLATO are of opinion, that the reasonable part of the Soule is im- up to the re-mortal and incorruptible; for that the Soule, if it be not God, yet the worke it is of eternal gon offire.
God: as for the unreasonable part, it is mortal and subject to corruption.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Senses and sensible objects.

THE STOICKS thus define Sense: Sense (say they) is the apprehension of the sensitive organ. But Sense is taken many waies; for we understand by it, either an habitude or facultie naturall, or a sensible action, or els an imagination apprehensive; which all are performed by the meanes of an instrument sensitive: yea, and the very eighth part of the Soule abovenamed, even that which is principall, to wit, the discourse of reason, by which all the rest doe consist: Again, the spirits intellectuall, are called sensitive instruments, which from the said principall understanding reach unto all the organs.

30 The Sense (quoth EPICURUS) is that parcell of the soule which is the sensitive power it selfe, and the effect which proceedeth from it, so that he taketh Sense in two sort, for the power, and effect.

PLATO defineth Sense to bee the societie of the body and soule, as touching externall objects; for the facultie and power of Sense is proper to the soule, the instrument belongeth to the body; but both the one and the other apprehendeth externall things, by the meanes of the imaginative facultie, or the phantasie.

LEDCIPPUS and DEMOCRITUS doe say, that both Sense and intelligence are actuated by the meanes of certeine images represented from without, unto us, for that neither the one nor the other, can be performed without the occurrence of some such image.

CHAP. IX.

Whether Senses and Fancies be true or no?

THE STOICKS hold, that the Senses be true; but of Imaginations, as some be true, so others are false.

EPICURUS supposeth that all Senses and Imaginations be true; many of opinions, some be true, others false: and as for the Sense it is deceived one way only, to wit, in things intelligible: but Imagination after two sorts: for that there is an Imagination as well of sensible things, as of intelligible.

50 EMPEDOCLES and HERACLIDES say, that particular Senses are effected according to the proportion of their pores and passages; namely as the proper object of each Sense is well disposed and fitted.

CHAP. X.

How many Senses there be?

THE STOICKS hold, that there be five proper Senses, Sight, Hearing, Smelling, Taft, and Feeling.

ARISTOTLE

ARISTOTLE faith not, that there is a fixt, howbeit he putteth downe one common Sense, which judgeth as touching the compound kinds: whereunto all the other particular and single Senses bring and present their proper imaginations: wherein the transition of the one to the other, as of a figure or motion doth shew.

DEMOCRITUS affirmeth, that there bee more Senses in brute beasts, in the gods, and in wife men.

CHAP. XI.

After what manner is effected Sense, Notion and Reason, according to disposition or affection.

THE STORCKS are of opinion and say, that when a man is engendered, hee hath the principall part of his soule, which is the understanding, like for all the world unto a parchment or paper ready to be written in; and therein he doth register and record every severall Notion and cogitation of his: for those who have perceived any thing by sense, (as for example like, have seene a white thing) when the same is gone out of their eie, retaine it still in memorie: now after they have collected together many semblable memories of the same kinde, then they say, they have experience; for experience is nothing else but an heape or multitude of like sorts: but of notions and thoughts, some be naturall, which are caused in manner aforesaid, without any artificiall meanes; others come by our studie, and by teaching, and such alone properly and indeed are called Notions; the other be named rather conceptions or anticipations; and Reason for which we beare the name of Reasonable, is accomplished by those anticipations in the first seven yeeres: and intelligence is the conception in the understanding of a reasonable creature: for phantasie when it lighteth upon the reasonable soule is then called Intelligence, taking the denomination of understanding, which is the cause that these imaginations are not incident unto other creatures; but such as are presented unto gods and us both, those are onely and properly imaginations; whereas those which offer themselves unto us, are imaginations in generall, and cogitations in speciall: like as Deniers, Teltens, or Crownes being considered apart in themselves, are Deniers, Teltens, & Crownes; but if you give them for the hire of a ship, then besides that they are Deniers, &c. they be also the fare, for ferry or passage.

CHAP. XII.

What difference there is betweene Imagination, Imaginable, Imaginative, and Imagined.

CHRYSIPIUS faith, there is a difference betweene all these fower: and first, as for * Imagination, it is a passion or impression in the soule, shewing the selfe same thing that made and imprinted it: as for example; when with our eies we behold a white, it is a passion or affection engendered by the sight in our soule, and we may well say, that the said white is the subject or object that mooveth & affecteth us: semblably in smelling and touching, and this is called Phantasie, a word derived of phantasia or phantasia, which signifieth light or cleerenesse; for like as the light sheweth it selfe, and all that is comprised in it, so the Phantasie or imagination representeth it selfe, and that which made it.

* Imaginable is that which maketh imagination, as white, cold, and whatsoever is able to moove or affect the soule, is called Imaginable.

* Phantastick or Imaginative, is a vaine attraction; even an affection or passion in the soule, which commeth not from any object imaginable; like as we may observe in him that fighteth with his owne shadow, or in vaine singeth forth his hands: for in true phantasie or imagination, there is a subject matter named Imaginable: but in this Phantastick or Imaginative there is no such object or subject at all.

* Phantasmie or * Imagined, is that unto which we are drawne by that vaine attraction; a thing usual with those who are either furious, or surprized with the maladic of melancholy: for so Orestes in the tragedie of Euripides when he uttereth these speeches,

*O mother mine, against me raise not thus,
I thee beseech these * wench's furious:
Whom now I see alas, with bloody eyes,
And dragon like, how they against me rise:
These me beset, and charge on every part,
These strike on still, these wound me to the hart.*

* phantasia, or women.

doth

doth speake them as enraged and in a phranticke fit; for he seeth nothing, but onely imagineth and thinketh that he seeth them: and therefore his sister Electra replieth thus upon:

Lie still poore wretch ye sit in thy bed, for why?

Thou seest not that which comes so verily,

The same is the case of Theoclymenus in * Homer.

* Odysseus, toward the end.

CHAP. XIII.

Of Sight, and how we doe see.

DEMOCRITUS, and EPICURUS supposed, that Sight was caused by the intromission of certaine images: others by an insinuation of beames, returning to our eie-sight, after the occurrence of an object. EMPEDOCLES hath mingled the said images and beames together, calling that which is made thereof, the raies of a compound image. HIPPARCHUS holdeth, that the beames sent out and launced from the one eie, and the other comming to be extended in their ends meet together, and as it were by the touching and clasping of hands, taking hold of externall bodies, carie backe the apprehension of them unto the vivive power.

PLATO attributeth it to the corradiation or conjunction of light, for that the light of the eies reacheth a good way within the aire of like nature, & the light likewise issuing from the visible bodies, cutteth the aire betweene, which of it selfe is liquid and mutable, and so extendeth it together with the fierie power of the eie; and this is it which is called the conjunct light or corradiation of the Platonickes.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Resemblances represented in mirrors.

EMPEDOCLES faith, that these apparitions come by the meanes of certaine defluxions, gathered together upon the superficies of the mirror, and accomplished by the fire that ariseth from the said Mirror, and withall transmuteth the aire that is object before it, into which those fluxions are caried.

DEMOCRITUS and EPICURUS are of opinion, that these apparences in Mirrors, are caused by the subsistence and stay of certaine images, which passing from us, gather together upon the Mirror by way of rebounding and refulation.

The PYTHAGOREANS attribute all this to the reflexion of the sight: for that the sight is extended and caried as farre as to the Mirror of brasse or whatsoever, where resting and staying upon the thicke foldine thereof, and beaten backe by the polished smoothnesse of the Mirror object against it, the same returneth againe upon it selfe; much like as when our hand is stretched out and brought backe againe unto the shoulder.

All these points and opinions may serve very well, and be accomodate to that chapter and question, carying this title: How we doe see.

CHAP. XV.

Whether Darknesse be visible.

THE STORCKS hold, that Darknesse is visible; for that from the sight there is a splendure going forth that compasseth the said Darknesse; neither doth the eie-sight lie and deceive us, for it seeth certainly and in truth that there is Darknesse.

CHRYSIPIUS faith, that we doe see by the tension of the aire betweene, which is pricked by the visuell spirit, that passeth from the principall part of the soule into the apple of the eie: and after that it falleth upon the aire about it, it extendeth the same in a pyramidall forme: namely, when as it meeteth with an aire of the same nature with it; for there flow from out of the eies certaine raies resembling fire, and nothing blacke or mistie, and therefore it is that Darknesse may be seene.

it dimly; contrariwise, light doeth disgregate and convey it as farre as to the visible objects, thorough the aire between, and therefore it seeth nor in the darks, but is able to see Darknesse.

* In one copie I reade thus: much more. Furthermore Darknesse doth aggregate and gather in the sight, and thereby make

CHAP. XVI.

Of Hearing.

EMPEDOCLES is of opinion, that Hearing is performed by the meanes of a spirit or winde gotten within the concavities of the eare, writhed or turned in manner of a vice or screw, which they say is fitted and framed of purpose within the eare, hanging up aloft, and beaten upon in manner of a clocke.

ALCMAEON affirmeth, that we doe Heare by the void place within the eare; for he saith, 10 that this is it that resoundeth, when the said spirit entrench into it; because all empty things do make a sound.

DIOPHANTUS supposeth, that Hearing is caused by the aire within the head, when it cometh to be touched, stirred, and beaten by the voice.

PLATO and his scholars hold, that the aire within the head is smitten, and that it reboundeth and is caried to the principall part of the soule, wherein is reason, and so is formed the sense of Hearing.

CHAP. XVII.

Of Smelling.

20

ALCMAEON affirmeth, that reason, the principall part of the soule, is within the braine, and that by it we Smell, drawing in scents and smells by respirations.

EMPEDOCLES is of this advice, that together with the respiration of the lights, odours also are intronitted and let in; when as then the said respiration is not performed at libertie and ease, but with much adoe, by reason of some asperity in the passage, we Smell not at all, like as we observe in them who are troubled with the poise, murre, and such like rheumes.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of Taste.

30

ALCMAEON saith, that by the moisture and warmth in the tongue, together with the softnesse thereof, all smacks and objects of taste are distinguished.

DIOPHANTUS attributeth the same to the spongyous rarinie and softnesse of the tongue; and for that the veins of the body reach up to it, and are inserted and grafted therein, the favors are spread abroad and drawn into the sense and principal part of the soule, as it were with a sponge.

CHAP. XIX.

Of the Voice.

40

PLATO defineth the Voice to be a spirit, which by the mouth is brought and directed from the understanding; also a knocking performed by the aire, passing through the eares, the braine, and the blood, as farre as to the soule; after an unproper maner & abusively we attribute Voice to unreasonable creatures, yea & to such as have no soule or life at all, namely, to the neighing of horses, and to other sounds; but to speake properly, there is no voice but that which is articulate, and called it is φωνή in Greeke, for that it declareth that which is in the thought.

EPICURUS holdeth the Voice to be a fluxion sent forth by such as speake and make a noise, or otherwise doe sound; which fluxion breaketh and crumbleth into many fragments of the same forme and figure, as are the things from whence they come; as for example, round to round, and triangles whether they have three equall sides or unequal, to the like triangles: and these broken parcels entering into the eares, make the sense of the Voice, which is hearing; a thing that may be evidently scene in bottles that leake and runne out, as also in fullers that blow upon their clothes.

DEMOCRITUS saith, that the very aire breaketh into small fragments of the same figure, that that is to say, round to round; and roll together with the fragments of the Voice: for according to the old proverbe:

*One chough neere to another chough, loves alwaies for to perch,
And God hath so appointed aie, that all their like should search.*

For even upon the shores and sea-sides, stones are evermore found together semblable, to wit, in one place round, in another long; in like manner when as folke doe winnow or purge come with the vane, those graines alwaies are ranged and sorted together, which be of one and the same forme; in so much as beanes goe to one side by themselves, & rich pease to another part by their selves: but against all this it may be alledged and objected: How is it possible that a few fragments of spirit and winde should fill a theater, that receiveth ten thousand men?

The STOICKS say, that the aire doth not consist of small fragments, but is continuall throughout, and admitteth no voidnesse at all: howbeit, when it is smitten with spirit or winde, it waveth directly in circles infinitely, untill it fill up all the aire about, much after the manner as we may perceive in a pond or poole, when there is a stone casten into it; for like as the water in it moveth in flat circles; so doth the aire in roundles like to bals.

ANAXAGORAS saith, that the Voice is formed by the incursion and beating of the Voice against the solide aire, which maketh resistance, and returneth the stroke backe againe to the eares, which is the manner also of that reduplication of the Voice or resonance called Echo.

CHAP. XX.

Whether the Voice be incorporall? and how cometh the Echo to be formed.

PYTHAGORAS, PLATO, and ARISTOTLE do hold the Voice to be bodiless: for that it is not the aire but a forme in the aire, & a superficies thereof, & that by a certaine beating which becometh a Voice. Now this is certaine that no superficies hath a bodie. True it is indeed that it moveth and removeth with the bodie, but of it selfe without all doubt it hath no bodie at all: like as in a wand or rod that is bent, the superficies thereof suffereth no alteration, in respect of it selfe, but it is the verie matter and substance that is bowed. Howbeit the Stoicks are of another opinion and say, that the Voice is a bodie: for whatsoever is operative and worketh ought, is a bodie: but certaine it is that the Voice is active and doth somewhat: for we do heare and perceive when it beareth upon our eare, and it giveth a print, no lesse than a seale upon wax. Moreover, all that moveth or troubleth us, is a bodie: but who knoweth not that in Musick, as good harmony affecteth us; so dissonance and discord doth disquiet us; and that which more is; all that stirreth or moveth is a bodie: but the Voice stirreth and hitteth against smooth and polished solid places, by which it is broken and sent backe againe, in manner as we do see a tennis ball when it is smitten upon a wal: in so much as in the Pyramides of AEGYPT, one Voice delivered within them, rendereth foure or five resonances or Echoes for it.

CHAP. XXI.

How the Soule cometh to be sensitive; and what is the principall and predominant part thereof.

THE STOICKS are of opinion, that the supreme and highest part of the Soule is the principall and the guide of the other: to wit, that which maketh imaginations, causeth assents, performeth senses, and moveth appetite: and this is it which they call the discourse of reason. Now of this principall and soveraigne part, there be eleven others springing from it, and which are spread through the rest of the bodie, like unto the armes or haire branches of a poulpe fish: of which seven the naturall senses make five; namely, Sight, Smelling, Hearing, Tasting, and Feeling. Of these, the Sight is a spirit passing from the chieftest part unto the eies: Hearing, a spirit reaching from the understand, to the eares: Smelling, a spirit issuing from reason to the nosethirils: Tasting, a spirit going from the forehead principall part unto the tongue: and last of all Feeling, a spirit stretching and extended from the same predominant part, as farre as to the sensible superficies of those objects which are easie to be felt and handled. Of the twaine behind, the one is called generall seed, and that is like wife a spirit transmitted from the principall part unto the generetories or members of generation: the other which is the seventh and last of all, Zeno calleth Vocall, and wee, Voice; a spirit also, which from the principall part passeth to the windpipe, to the tongue and other instruments appropriate for the voice. And to conclude, that mistresse her selfe and ladie of the rest is seated (as it were in the midst of her owne world) within our round head, and there dwelleth.

CHAP. XXII.

Of Respiration.

EMPEDOCLES is of opinion, that the first Respiration of the first living creature was occasioned, when the humiditie in young ones within the mothers wombe, retired, and the outward aire came to succede in place thereof, and to enter into the void vessels now open to receive the same; but afterwards the naturall heat driving without forth, this aerie substance for to evaporate and breath away, caused expiration: and likewise when the same returned in again, there ensued inspiration, which gave new entrance to that acerious substance. But as touching the Respiration that now is, he thinketh it to be when the blood is carried to the exterior superficies of the bodie; and by this fluxion doth drive and chase the aerie substance through the nosethirts, and cause expiration; and inspiration when the blood returneth inward, and when the aire reenteth withall through the rarities which the blood hath left void and emptie. And for to make this better to be understood, he bringeth in the example of a Clepsidre or water 20 houre-glasse.

ASCLEPIADES maketh the lungs in manner of a tunnel, supposing that the cause of Respiration, is the aire, smooth, and of subtil parts which is within the breast, unto which the aire without, being thicke and grosse floweth and runneth; but is repelled backe againe, for that the breast is not able to receive any more, nor yet to be cleane without. Now when as there remaineth still behind, some little of the subtil aire within the breast, (for it cannot all be cleane driven out) that aire without rechargeth againe with equall force upon that within, being able to support and abide the waight thereof: and this compareth he to Physicians ventoses, or cupping-glasses. Moreover as touching voluntarie Respiration, he maketh this reason, that the smallest holes within the substance of the lungs are drawn together, and their pipes closed up. For these 30 things obey our will.

HEROPHILUS leaveth the motive faculties of the bodie, unto the nerves, arteries and muscles: for thus he thinketh and saith, that the lungs only have a naturall appetite to dilation, and contraction, that is to say, to draw in and deliver the breath, and so by consequence other parts. For this is the proper action of the lungs, to draw wind from without; wherewith when it is filled, there is made another attraction by a second appetition; and the breast deriveth the said wind into it: which being likewise replat therewith, not able to draw any more, it transmitteth backe againe the superfluitie thereof into the lungs, whereby it is sent forth by way of expiration: and thus the parts of the bodie reciprocally suffer one of another, by way of interchange. For when the lungs are occupied in dilation, the breast is busied in contraction; and thus they 40 make repletion and evacuation by a mutuall participation one with the other; in such sort as we may observe about the lungs foure manner of motions. The first, whereby it receiveth the aire from without; the second, by which it transfuseth into the breast that aire which it drew and received from without; the third, whereby it admitteth againe unto it selfe that which was sent out of the breast; and the fourth, by which it sendeth quite forth that which so returned into it. And of these motions, two be dilatations, the one occasioned from without, the other from the breast: and other two, contractions; the one when the breast draweth wind into it: and the other when it doth expell the aire insinuated into it. But in the breast parts there be but two onely, the one dilatation when it draweth wind from the lungs, the other contraction, when 50 it rendreth it againe.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of the Passion of the body; and whether the soule have a fellow-feeling with it, of paine and dolour.

THE STOICKS say, that affections are in the passible parts, but senses in the principall part of the soule.

EPICURUS

EPICURUS is of opinion, that both the affections and also the senses, are in the passible places: for that reason which is the principall part of the soule, he holdeth to be unpassible.

STRATO contrariwise affirmeth, that as well the Passions of the soule, as the senses, are in the said principall part, and not in the affected and grieved places; for that in it consisteth patience, which we may observe in terrible and dolorous things, as also in fearefull, and magnanimous persons.

Philosophers opinions.

CHAP. I.

Of Divination.

PLATO and the STOICKS bring in a fore-deeming and fore-knowledge of things by inspiration or divine instinct, according to the divinity of the soule; namely, when as it is ravished with a fanaticall spirit or revelation by dreames: and these admit and allow many kinds of divination.

XENOPHANES and EPICURUS on the contrary side abolish and annull all Divination whatsoever.

PYTHAGORAS condemneth that onely which is wrought by sacrifices.

ARISTOTLE & DICARCHUS receive none but that which cometh by Divine inspiration, or by dreames; not supposing the soule to be immortal, but to have some participation of Divinitie.

CHAP. II.

How Dreames are caused.

DEMOCRITUS is of opinion, that Dreames come by the representation of images. STRATO saith, that our understanding is I wot not how, naturally, and yet by no reason, more sensible in sleepe than otherwise, and therefore solicited the rather by the appetit and desire of knowledge.

HEROPHILUS affirmeth, that Dreames divinely inspired, come by necessitie; but natural Dreames by this means, that the soule formeth an image and representation of that which is good and commodious unto it, and of that which must ensue thereupon: as for such as be of a mixt nature of both, they fall out casually by an accidentall access of images; namely, when we imagine that we see that which wee desire; as it falleth out with those who in their sleepe thinke they have their paramours in their armes.

CHAP. III.

What is the substance of all seed.

ARTISTOTLE defineth Seed to be that which hath power to moove in it selfe for the effecting of some such thing, as it was from whence it came.

PYTHAGORAS taketh it to be the foame of the best and purest bloud; the superfluitie and excrement of nouriture; like as bloud and marrow.

ALCMAEON saith, it is a portion of the braine.

PLATO supposeth it to be a decision or defuse of the marrow in the backe bone.

EPICURUS imagineth it to be an abstract of soule and body.

DEMOCRITUS holdeth, that it is the generesse of the fleshy nerves proceeding from the whole body, and the principall parts thereof.

CHAP. IIII.

Whether generall Seed be a body.

LENCIPPUS and ZENO take it to be a body; for that it is an abstract parcell of the soule. PYTHAGORAS, PLATO, and ARISTOTLE, acknowledge indeed and confesse, that the power and force of Seed is bodiless; like as the understanding, which is the author of motion; but the matter thereof say they, which is shed and sent forth, is corporall.

Bbbb

STRATO and DEMOCRITUS affirme the very puissance thereof to be a body, howbeit, spirituall.

CHAP. V.

Whether females send forth Seed as well as males.

PYTHAGORAS, EPICURUS, and DEMOCRITUS hold, that the Female likewise discharge Seed; for that it hath seminarie vessels turned backward; which is the reason that 10 she hath lust unto the act of generation.

ARISTOTLE and ZENO be of opinion, that the Female delivereth from it a moist matter, resembling the sweat which commeth from their bodies, who wrestle or exercise together: but they will not have it to be Seed.

HIPPON avoucheth that Females doe ejaculate Seed no lesse than males, howbeit the same is not effectual for generation, for that it falleth without the matrix: whereupon it commeth to passe that some women, though very few, and widdowes especially, doe cast from them Seed without the company of men: and he affirmeth that of the male Seed, are made the bones, & of the female the flesh.

CHAP. VI.

The manner of Conception.

ARISTOTLE thinketh, that Conceptions come in this manner: when as the matrix drawn before from the naturall purgation, and therewithall the monthly tearmes fetch some part of pure blood from the whole masse of the body, so that the males genetall may come to it, and so concur to engender: Contrariwise, that which hindereth conception is this, namely, when the matrix is impure or full of ventosities; as it may be by occasion of feare, of sorrow, or weaknesse of women; yea and by the impuissance and defect in men.

30

CHAP. VII.

How it commeth that Males are engendered, and how Females.

EMPEDOCLES supposeth, that Males and Females are begotten by the meanes of heat and cold accordingly: and hereupon recorded it is in Histories, that the first Males in the world, were procreated and borne out of the earth, rather in the East and Southern parts; but Females toward the North.

PARMENIDES mainteineth the contrary, and saith; that Males were bred toward the Northern quarters, for that the aire there is more grosse and thicker than else where: on the other 40 side, Females toward the South, by reason of the raritie and subtiltie of the aire.

HIPPONAX attributeth the cause hereof unto the seed, as it is either more thick or powerful, or thinner and weaker.

ANAXAGORAS and ARMENIDES hold, that the seed which commeth from the right side of a man, ordinarily is cast into the right side of the matrix; and from the left side likewise into the same side of the matrix: but if this ejection of seed fall out otherwise cleane crosse, then Females be engendered.

LEOPHANES of whom ARISTOTLE maketh mention, affirmeth that the Males be engendered by the right generatory, and females by the left.

LEUCIPPUS ascribeth it to the permutation of the naturall parts of generation, for that according to it, the man hath his yerd of one sort, and the woman her matrix of another: more than this he saith nothing.

DEMOCRITUS saith, that the common parts are engendered indifferently by the one and the other, as it falleth out; but the peculiar parts that make distinction of sex, of the party which is more prevalent.

HIPPONAX resolveth thus, that if the seed be predominant, it will be a Male; but if the food and nourishment, a Female.

CHAP.

CHAP. VIII.

How Monsters are engendered.

EMPEDOCLES affirmeth, that Monsters be engendered either through the abundance of seed, or default thereof; either through the turbulent * perturbation of the moving, or the distraction and division of the seed into sundry parts; or else through the declination thereof out of the right way: and thus he seemeth to have preoccupied in manner all the answers to this question.

10 STRATO alledgeth for this part, addition, or subtraction, transposition or inflation and ventosities. And some physicians there be, who say, that at such a time as monsters be engendered, the matrix suffereth distortion, for that it is distended with winde.

CHAP. IX.

What is the reason that a woman though oftentimes she companieth with a man doeth not conceive.

DIOCLES the Physician rendreth this reason, for that some doe send forth no seed at all; 20 or lesse in quantity than is sufficient, or such in quality, which hath no vivificant or quickning power; or else it is for defect of heat, of cold, of moisture, or driness; or last of all, by occasion of the paralytic or resolution of the privy parts and members of generation.

The STOICKS lay the cause hereof upon the obliquitie or crookednesse of the mans members, by occasion whereof, he cannot shoot forth his seed directly; or else it is by reason of the disproportion of the parts, as namely when the matrix lieth to farr within, that the yerd cannot reach unto it.

ERASISTRATUS findeth fault in this case with the matrix, when it hath either hard callosities, or too much of moisture; or when it is more rare and spongy, or else smaller than it ought to be.

30

CHAP. X.

How it commeth that two Twinnes and three Twinnes are borne.

EMPEDOCLES saith, that two Twinnes or three, are engendered by occasion either of the abundance, or the divulsion of the seed.

ASCLEPIADES assigneth it unto the difference of bodies, or the excellence of seed: after which manner we see how some barly from one root beareth two or three stalkes with their eares upon them, according as the seed was most fruitful and generative.

ERASISTRATUS attributeth it unto divers conceptions and superfatations, like as in brute 40 beasts; for when as the matrix is clenfed, then it commeth soone to conception and superfatation.

The STOICKS alledge to this purpose the cels or conceptacles within the matrix; for as the seed falleth into the first and second, there follow conceptions and superfatations, [and after the same sort may three Twinnes be engendered.]

CHAP. XI.

How commeth it to passe that children resemble their parents or progenitors before them.

EMPEDOCLES affirmeth, that as similitudes are caused by the exceeding force of the genetall seed; so the dissimilitudes arise from the evaporation of naturall heat contained within the same seed.

PARMENIDES is of opinion, that when the seed descendeth out of the right side of the matrix, the children be like unto the fathers, but when it passeth from the left side, unto the mothers.

The STOICKS opine thus; from the whole body and the soule passeth the seed, and so the similitudes doe forme of the same kinds, the figures and characters, like as a painter of the like colours draweth the image of that which he seeth before him: also the woman for her part doth conferre generall seed, which if it be prevalent, then the infant is like unto the mother; but if the mans seed be more predominant, it will resemble the father.

CHAP. XII.

How it falleth out that children resemble others, and not their fathers and mothers.

THe most part of the Physicians affirme this to happen by chance and adventure, but upon this occasion, that the seed, as well of the man as the woman waxeth cold, for then the infants resemble neither the one nor the other.

EMPEDOCLES attributeth the forme and resemblance of yoong babes in the wombe, unto the strong imagination of the woman in time of conception; for many times it hath bene knowne, that women have bene enamoured of painted images and statues, and so delivered of children like unto them.

The STOICKS say, that by a sympathie of the minde and understanding, through the infusion of beames, and not of images, these resemblances are caused.

CHAP. XIII.

How it cometh that some women be barren, and men likewise unable to get children.

PHYSIANS hold, that women be barren by reason that the matrix is either too streight, over rare, or too hard; or else by occasion of certaine callosities or carnosities: or for that the women themselves be weaklings and heartlesse, or doe not thrive but milke; or else because they are fallen into some Cachexia and evill habit of body; or by reason that they are distorted, or otherwise in a convulsion.

DIOCLES saith, that men in this action of generation are impotent; for that some send forth no seed at all, or at leastwise in quantitie lesse than is meet, or such as hath no generative power; or because their generalls be paralyticall or relaxed; or by reason that the yerd is crooked, that it cannot cast the seed forward; or for that the generall members be disproportioned and not of a competent length, considering the distance of the matrix.

The STOICKS lay the fault upon certaine faculties and qualities, discordant in the parties themselves that come together about this businesse; who being parted one from another, and conjoined with others, uniting well with their complexion, there followeth a temperature according to nature, and a childe is gotten betweene them.

CHAP. XIII.

Why Mules be barrain.

ALCMAEON is of opinion, that Mules, that is to say, male Mules be not able to engender therof. The Females also, because their shaps do not open wide enough, that is to say, the mouth therof doth not gape sufficiently; for these be the verie rearmes that he useth.

EMPEDOCLES blameth exilitie or smalnesse, the low posture and the over streight conformation of the matrix, being fo turned backward and tied unto the belly, that neither seed can be directly cast into the capacite of it, nor if it were caried thither would it receive the same, unto whom DIOCLES also beareth witnesse saying, Many times (quoth he) in the dissection of Anatomies we have seene such matrices of Mules; and it may be therefore, that in regard of such causes some women also be barrain.

CHAP. XV.

Whether the Infant lying yet in the mothers wombe, isto be accounted a living creature or no?

PLATO directly pronounceth that such an Infant is a living creature: for that it moveth, and is fed within the bellie of the mother.

The

The STOICKS say, it is a part of the wombe; and not an animall by it selfe. For like as fruits be parts of the trees, which when they be ripe do fall; even so it is with an Infant in the mothers wombe.

EMPEDOCLES denieth it to be a creature animall, howbeit that it hath life and breath within the bellie; many the first time that it hath respiration, is at the birth; namely when the superfluous humiditie which is in such unborne infants is retired and gone, so that the aire from without entreats into the void vessels lying open.

DIOCLES saith, that such Infants are bred within the matrix inanimate, howbeit in heat: whereupon it cometh that naturall heat, so soone as ever the Infant is turned out of the mothers wombe, is drawn into the lungs.

DIOCLES saith, that such Infants are bred within the matrix inanimate, howbeit in heat: whereupon it cometh that naturall heat, so soone as ever the Infant is turned out of the mothers wombe, is drawn into the lungs.

CHAP. XVI.

How unborne babes are fed in the wombe.

DEMOCRITUS and EPICURUS hold, that this imperfect fruit of the wombe receiveth nourishment at the mouth; and thereupon it cometh, that so soone as ever it is borne it sucketh and nuzzleth with the mouth for the brest head, or nipple of the papper: for that within the matrix there be certaine teats, yea and mouths too, whereby they are nourished.

The STOICKS say, that it is fed by the secundine and the navell; whereupon it is that Midwives presently knit up and tie the navell string fast, but open the Infants mouth; to the end that it be acquainted with another kind of nourishment.

ALCMAEON affirmeth, that the Infant within the mothers wombe, feedeth by the whole body throughout; for that it sucketh to it and draweth in manner of a sponge, of all the food, that which is good for nourishment.

CHAP. XVII.

What part of the Child is first made perfect within the mothers bellie.

The STOICKS are of opinion that the most parts are formed all at once; but ARISTOTEE saith the backe bone and the loines are first framed, like as the keele in a ship.

ALCMAEON affirmeth, that the head is first made, as being the seat of reason.

PHYSICIANS will have the heart to be the first, wherein the veins and arteries are.

Some thinke the great toe is framed first, and others the navill.

CHAP. XVIII.

What is the cause that Infants borne at seven moneths end, be livelike.

EMPEDOCLES thinketh, that when mankind was first bred of the earth, one day then, by reason of the slow motion of the Sunne was full as long, as (in this age of ours) tenne moneths: and that in proesse of time, and by succession it came to be of the length of seven moneths: And therefore (quoth he) infants borne either at ten or seven moneths end, doe ordinarily live: the nature of the world being so accustomed in one day to bring that fruit to maturitie after that night, wherein it was committed into the wombe thereof.

TIMAEUS saith, that they bee not ten moneths, but are counted nine, after that the monethly purgations stay upon the first conception: and so it is thought that infants be of seven moneth which are not: for that he knew how after conception many women have had their mensstrual flux.

POLYBUS, DIOCLES and the EMPIRICKS know, that the eight moneths childe also is vitall; howbeit in some sort feeble, for that many for feeblenesse have died so borne: in general

nerall and for the most part ordinarily, none are willing to reare and feed the children borne at the seven moneth; and yet many have bene so borne and grown to mans estate.

ARISTOTLE and HIPPOCRATES report, that if in seven moneths the matrix be grown full, then the infant seeketh to get forth; and such commonly live and doe well enough; but if it incline to birth, and be not sufficiently nourished, for that the navill is weake, then in regard of hard travell, both the mother is in danger, and her fruit becometh to mislike and thrive not; but in case it continue nine moneths within the matrix, then it commeth fourth accomplished and perfect.

POLYBUS affirmeth it to be requisite and necessarie, for the vitalitie of infants, that there should be 182, daies and a halfe, which is the time of six moneths compleat; in which space the sunne commeth from one Solstice or Tropick to another: but such children are said to be of seven moneths, when it falleth out that the odde daies left in this moneth, are taken to the seventh moneth. But he is of opinion, that those of eight moneths live not; namely, when as the infant halteth indeed out of the wombe, and beareth downward, but for the most part the navill is thereby put to stresse and reacheth, & so cannot feed, as that should, which is the cause of food to the infant.

The MATHEMATICIANS beare us in hand and say, that eight moneths be dissociable of all generations, but seven are sociable. Now the dissociable signes are such as meet with such starrs and constellations which be lords of the house: for if upon any of them falleth the lot of mans life and course of living, it signifieth that such shall be unfortunate and short lived. These dissociable signes be reckoned eight in number; namely, Aries with Scorpius is infociable; Taurus with Scorpius is fociable; Gemini with Capricorn; Cancer with Aquarius; Leo with Pisces; and Virgo with Aries: And for this cause infants of seven moneths and ten moneths be livelike, but those of eight moneths for the infociable diffidence of the world, perish and come to naught.

CHAP. XIX.

Of the generation of small creatures; after what manner they be engendred; and whether they be corruptible.

They who hold that the world was created, are of opinion, that living creatures also had their creation or beginning, and shall likewise perish and come to an end.

The EPICUREANS according unto whom Animals had no creation, doe suppose that by mutation of one into another, they were first made; for they are the substantiall parts of the world: like as ANAXAGORAS and EURIPIDES affirme in these rearmes: Nothing dieth, but in changing as they doe one for another, they shew sundry formes.

ANAXIMANDER is of opinion, that the first Animals were bred in moisture, and enclosed within prickly and sharpe pointed barks; but as age grew on, they became more drie, and in the end, when the said barks burst and clave in sunder round about them, a small while after they survived.

EMPEDOCLES thinketh, that the first generations as well of living creatures as of plants, were not wholly compleat and perfect in all parts, but disjointed, by reason that their parts did not cohere and unite together: that the second generations when the parts began to combine and close together, seemed like to images: that the third generations were of parts growing and arising mutually one out of another: and the fourth were no more of semblable, as of earth and water, but one of another; and in some the nourishment was in craasse and made thicke, as for others the beautie of women provoked and pricked in them a lust of spermatike motion. Moreover, that the kinds of all living creatures were distinct and divided by certene temperatures; for such as were more familiarly enclined to water, went into water; others into the aire, for to draw and deliver their breath to and fro, according as they held more of the nature of fire; such as were of a more heavey temperature were bestowed upon the earth; but those who were of an equall temperature, uttered voice with their whole breasts.

CHAP. XX.

How many sorts of living creatures there be whether they be all sensitive and endued with reason.
Here is a treatise of ARISTOTLE extant, wherein he putteth downe fower kinds of Animals, to wit, Terrestrial, Aquaticall, Volatile, and Celestiall: for you must thinke, that he calleth heavens, starrs, and the world, Animals; even as well as those that participate of earth: yea and God he defineth to be a reasonable Animal and immortal.

DEMOCRITUS and EPICURUS doe say, that heavenly Animals are reasonable.

ANAXAGORAS holdeth, that all Animals are endued with active reason, but want the passive understanding, which is called the interpreter or truchment of the minde.

PYTHAGORAS and PLATO doe affirme, that the soules even of those very Animals which are called unreasonable & brute beasts, are endued with reason; howbeit they are not operative with that reason, neither can they activate it, by reason of the distempered composition of their bodies, and because they have not speech to declare and expound themselves: as for example, apes and dogs which utter a babling voice, but not an expresse language and distinct speech.

DIODEGENES supposeth that they have an intelligence; but partly for the grosse thicknesse of their temperature, and in part for the abundance of moisture, they have neither discourse of reason nor sense, but fare like unto those who be furious; for the principall part of the soule, to wit, Reason is defectuous and impeached.

CHAP. XXI.

Within what time are living creatures formed in the mothers wombe.

EMPEDOCLES saith, that men begin to take forme after the thirtie sixt day; and are finished and knit in their parts within 50. daies wanting one.

ASCLEPIADES saith, that the members of males, because they be more hot, are jointed, and receive shape in the space of 26. daies, and many of them sooner; but are finished and complet in all limbes within 50. daies: but females require two moneths ere they be fashioned, and fower before they come to their perfection; for that they want naturall heat. As for the parts of unreasonable creatures, they come to their accomplishment sooner or later, according to the temperature of the elements.

CHAP. XXII.

Of how many elements is composed each of the generall parts which are in us.

EMPEDOCLES thinketh, that flesh is engendred of an equall mixture and temperature of the fower elements; the sinewes, of earth and fire, mingled together in a duple proportion; the nailes and cleies in living creatures come of the nerves refrigerat and made colde in those places where the aire toucheth them; the bones, of water and earth within: and of these fower medled and contempered together, sweat and teares proceed.

CHAP. XXIII.

When and how doth man begin to come to his perfection.

HERACLITUS and the STOICKS suppose, that men doe enter into their perfection about the second septimane of their age, at what time as their naturall feed doth move and runne: for even the very trees begin then, to grow unto their perfection; namely, when as they begin to engender their feed; for before then, unperfect they are, namely, so long as they be unripe and fruitlesse: and therefore a man likewise about that time is perfect: and at this septenarie of yeeres he beginneth to conceive and understand what is good and evil, yea, and to learne the same.

* Some thinke that a man is consummate at the end of the third septimane of yeeres, what time as he maketh use of his full strength.

* This I find in the Latin translation.

CHAP. XXIII.

In what manner Sleep is occasioned or death?

ALCIBION is of this mind, that Sleepe is caused by the returne of blood into the confluent veines; and Waking is the diffusion and spreading of the said blood abroad: but

Death

Death the utter departure thereof.

EMPEDOCLES holdeth that Sleepe is occasioned by a moderate cooling of the naturall heat of blood within us: and Death by an extreme coldnesse of the said blood.

DIOTGENES is of opinion, that if blood being diffused and spread throughout, fill the veines, and withall drive backe the aire sealed shrouabout into the breast, and the interior belly under it, then ensueth Sleepe, and the breast with the precordiall parts are hotter thereby: but if that acereous substance in the veines expire altogether, and exhale forth, presently followeth Death.

PLATO and the Stoicks affirme, that the cause of Sleepe is the remission of the spirit sensitive, not by way of relaxation and descent downward as it were to the earth; but rather by elevation aloft, namely when it is carried to the merdite or place between the browes, the very fear of reason: but when there is an entire resolution of the spirit sensitive; then of necessity Death doth ensue.

CHAP. XXV.

Whether of the twaine it is, that Sleepeth or dieth, the Soule or the Bodie?

ARISTOTHE sorely supposeth that Sleepe is common to Bodie and Soule both: and the cause thereof is a certaine humiditie which doth steeme and arise in manner of a vapour out of the stomack and the food therein, up into the region of the head, and the naturall heat about the heart cooled thereby. But death he deemeth to be an entire and totall refrigeration; and the same of the Bodie onely, and in no wise of the Soule, for it is immortal.

ANAXAGORAS saith, that Sleepe belongeth to corporall action; as being a passion of the Bodie and not of the Soule: also that there is likewise a certaine death of the Bodie, to wit, the separation of it and the Bodie asunder.

LEUCIPPUS is of opinion, that Sleepe pertaineth to the Bodie onely, by concretion of that which was of subtile parts; but the excessive excretion of the animall heat is Death: which both (saith he) be passions of the Bodie, and not of the Soule.

EMPEDOCLES saith, that Death is a separation of those elements whereof mans Bodie is compounded: according to which position, Death is common to Soule and Bodie: and Sleep a certaine dissipation of that which is of the nature of fire.

CHAP. XXVI.

How Plants come to grow and whether they be animate.

PLATO and EMPEDOCLES hold, that Plants have life, yea and be animall creatures which appeareth (say they) by this, that they wag to and fro, and stretch forth their boughs like armes; also, that when they be violently strained and bent, they yeld; but if they be let loose they retorne againe, yea in their growth are able to overcome waight laid upon them.

ARISTOTLE granteth that they be living creatures, but not animall: for that animall creatures have motions and appetites, are sensitive and endued with reason.

THE STOICKS and the EPICUREANS hold, that they have no soule or life at all: for of animall creatures some have the appetitive & concupiscible soule, others the reasonable: but Plants grow after a fort casually of their owne accord, and not by the meanes of any soule.

EMPEDOCLES saith, that Trees sprang and grew out of the ground before animall creatures; to wit, ere the Sunne displayed his beames, and before that day and night were distinct. Also that according to the proportion of temperature, one came to be named, Male, another, Female; that they thout up and grow by the power of heat within the earth; in such sort, as they be parts of the earth, like as unborne fruits in the wombe, be parts of the matrice. As for the fruits of trees, they are the superfluous excrements of water and fire: but such as have defect of that humiditie, when it is dried up by the heat of the Summer, lose their leaves: whereas they that have plentie thereof, keepe their leaves on still, as for example, the Laurell, Olive, and Date tree. Now as touching the difference of their juices and sapor, it proceedeth from the diversitie of that which nourisheth them, as appeareth in Vines; for the difference of Vine trees, maketh not the goodnesse of Vines for to be drunke, but the nutriment that the territorie and soile doth afford.

CHAP,

CHAP. XXVII.

Of Nourishment and Growth.

EMPEDOCLES is of opinion, that animall creatures are nourished by the substance of that which is proper and familiar unto them; that they grow by the preence of naturall heat; that they diminish, fade and perissh through the default both of the one and the other. And as for men now a daies living, in comparison of their auncestors, they be but babes new borne.

CHAP. XXVIII.

How Animall creatures came to have appetite and pleasure.

EMPEDOCLES supposeth, that Lust and Appetites are incident to animall creatures, through the defect of those elements which went unto the framing of ech one: that pleasures arise from humiditie: as for the motions of perils and such like, as also troubles and hindrances, &c.

CHAP. XXIX.

After what sort a Fever is engendered, and whether it is an necessary to another malady?

ERASISTRATUS defineth a Fever thus: A Fever (quoth he) is the motion of blood, which is entered into the veines or vessels proper unto the spirits, to wit, the arteries; and that against the will of the patient; for like as the sea when nothing troubleth it, lieth still and quiet; but if a boisterous and violent winde be up and bloweth upon it, contrary unto nature it fureth and riseth up into billowes even from the very bottom; so in the body of man, when the blood is moved, it invadeth the vitall and spirituell vessels, and being set on fire, it enchaseth the whole body. And according to the same physicians opinion, a Fever is an accessory or consequent coming upon another disease.

But DIOTGENES affirmeth, that Symptomes apparent without forth, doe shew that which lieth hidden within: Now we see that an Ague followeth upon those accidents that outwardly appeere; as for example, wounds, inflammations, impostumes, biles and botches in the shere and other emunctories.

CHAP. XXX.

Of Health, Sicknesse, and old age.

ALCMAEON is of opinion, that the equall dispenfing and distribution of the faculties in the body, to wit, of moisture, heat, driness, cold, bitter, sweet, and the rest, is that which holdeth & maintaineth Health: contrariwise, the monarchie, that is to say, the predominant force or veraginity of any of them causeth sicknesse: for the predominance and principality of any one, bringeth the corruption of all the other, and is the very cause of maladies: the efficient in regard of excessive heat or cold; and the material in respect of superabundance, or defect of humors; like as in some there is want of blood or brain; whereas Health is a proportionable temperature of all these qualities.

DIOTGENES supposeth, that most diseases grow by the inequality of the elements, and of the habit and constitution of the body.

ERASISTRATUS saith, that sicknesse proceedeth from the excesse of feeding, from crudities, indigestions, and corruption of meat: whereas good order and suffiance is Health.

THE STOICKS accord hereunto and hold, that Old age cometh for want of naturall heat; for they who are most furnished therewith, live longest, and be old a great time.

ASCLEPIADES reporteth, that the Aethiopsians age quickly, namely, when they be thirtie yeeres old; by reason that their bodies bee over-heat, and even burnt againe with the sunne: whereas in England and all Britaine, folke in their age continue 120. yeeres; for that those parts be cold, and in that people the naturall heat by that meanes is united and kept in their bodies: for the bodies of the Aethiopsians are more open and rare, in that they be relaxed and resolved by the finnes heat. Contrariwise their bodies who live toward the North pole, bee more compact, knit and fast, and therefore, such are long lived.

ROMANE

ROMANE QUESTIONS,

THAT IS TO SAY,

AN ENQUIRIE INTO THE CAUSES OF MANIE FASHIONS AND CUSTOMES OF ROME.

A Treatise fit for them who are conversant in the reading of Romane histories and antiquities, giving a light to many places otherwise obscure and hard to be understood.

What is the reason that new wedded wives are bidden to touch fire and water?

S it becaufe that among the elements and principles, whereof are composed naturall bodies, the one of these twaine, to wit, fire is the male, and water the female, of which, that insueth the beginning of motion, and this affoordeth the propertie of the subject and matter?

2 Or rather, for that, as the fire purgeth, and water washeth; so a wife ought to continue pure, chaste and cleane all her life.

3 Or is it in this regard, that as fire without humidity yeeldeth no nourishment, but is dry; and moisture without heat is idle, fruitlesse and barren; even so the male is feeble, and the female likewise, when they be apart and severed a sunder: but the conjunction of two married folke yeeldeth unto both, their colubation and perfection of living together.

4 Or last of all, becaufe man and wife ought not to forsake and abandon one another, but to take part of all fortunes; though they had no other good in the world common betwene them, but fire and water onely.

How is it that they use to light at weddings five torches, and neither more nor lesse, which they call Wax-lights.

W Hether is it as Varro saith, becaufe the Prætors or generals of armies use three, and the Aediles two: therefore it is not meet that they should have more than the Prætors and Aediles together: considering that new married folke goe unto the Aediles to light their fire?

2 Or, becaufe having use of many numbers, the odde number seemed unto them as in all other respects better, and more perfect than the even: so it was fitter and more agreeable for marriage: for the even number implieth a kinde of discord and division, in respect of the equal parts in it, meet for siding, quarrell, and contention: whereas the odde number cannot be divided so just & equally, but there will remaine somewhat still in common for to be parted. Now among al odd numbers, it seemeth that Cinque is most nuptial, & best becoming marriage; for that Treys is the first odde number, & Deuz the first even, of which twaine, five is compounded, as of the male and the female.

3 Or is it rather, becaufe light is a signe of being and of life: and a woman may beare at the most five children at one burden; and so they used to cary five tapers or waxe candels?

4 Or lastly, for that they thought, that those who were married had need of five gods and goddesses:

goddesses: namely, Jupiter * genial, Juno genial, Venus, Spade, and above all Diana; whom * Or, nuptiall. (last named) women in their labour and travell of childe-birth, are wont to call upon for helpe.

What is the cause that there being many Temples of Diana in Rome, into that onely which standeth in the Patrician street, men enter not.

I S it not becaufe of a tale which is told in this maner: In old time a certeine woman being come thither for to adore and worship this goddess, chaunced there to bee abused and suffer violence in her honor: and he who forced her, was torne in pieces by hounds: upon which accident, ever after, a certeine superstitious teare possessed mens heads, that they would not presume to goe into the said temple.

Wherefore is it, that in other temples of Diana men are wont ordinarily to set up and fasten Harts hornes; onely in that which is upon mount Aventine; the hornes of oxen and other beestes are to be seene.

M Ay it not be, that this is respective to the remembrance of an ancient occurrent that sometime befell? For reported it is that long since in the Sabines country, one Antion Coratium had a cow, which grew to be exceeding faire and woonderfull bigge withall above any other: and a certeine wizard or soothsaier came unto him and said: How predestined it was that the citie which sacrificed that cow unto Diana in the mount Aventine, should become most puissant and rule all Italy: This Coratium therefore came to Rome of a deliberate purpose to sacrifice the said cow accordingly: but a certeine household servant that he had, gave notice secretly unto king Servius Tullius of this prediction delivered by the abovesaid soothsaier: whereupon Servius acquainted the priest of Diana, Cornelius, with the matter: and therefore when Antion Coratium presented himselfe for to performe his sacrifice, Cornelius advertised him, first to goe downe into the river, there to wash; for that the custome and maner of those that sacrificed was so to doe: now whiles Antion was gone to wash himselfe in the river, Servius steps into his place, prevented his returne, sacrificed the cow unto the goddess, and nailed up the hornes when he had so done, within her temple. Juba thus relateth this historie, and Varro likewise, saying that Varro expressly setteth not downe the name of Antion, neither doth he write that it was Cornelius the priest, but the sexton onely of the church that thus beguiled the Sabine.

Why are they who have beene falsely reported dead in a strange country, although they returne home alive, not received nor suffered to enter directly as the doers, but forced to climbe up to the tiles of the house, and so to ges downe from the rouse into the house?

V Arro rendreth a reason heereof, which I take to be altogether fabulous: for hee writeth, that during the Sicilian warre, there was a great battell fought upon the sea, and immediately upon it, there ranne a rumour of many that they were dead in this fight; who notwithstanding, they returned home safe, died all within a little while after: howbeit, one there was among the rest, who when he would have entred into his owne house, found the dore of the owne accord fast shut up against him; and for all the forcible meanes that was made to open the same, yet it would not prevaile: whereupon this man taking up his lodging without, just before his dore, as he slept in the night, had a vision which advertised and taught him how he should from the roofof the house let himselfe downe by a rope, and so get in: now when he had so done, he became fortunate ever after, all the rest of his life; and hee lived to be a very aged man: and heereof arose the foresaid custome, which alwaies afterwards was kept and observed.

But haply this fashion may seeme in some sort to have beene derived from the Greeks: for in Greece they thought not those pure and cleane who had beene caried forth for dead to be enterred; or whose sepulchre and funerals were solemnized or prepared: neither were such allowed to frequent the company of others, nor suffered to come neere unto their sacrifices. And there goeth a report of a certeine man named Aristinus, one of those who had beene possessed with this superstition, how he sent unto the oracle of Apollo at Delphos, for to make supplication and praier unto the god, for to bee delivered out of this perplexed anxietie that troubled him by occasion occasion of the said custome or law then in force: and that the propheteſſe Pythia returned this answer:

*Looke what ſoever women doe in childbed newly laid, unto their babes, which they brought forth,
the verie ſame I ſay
See that be done to thee againe:
and after that be ſure, unto the bleſſed gods with hands to ſacrifice, moſt pure.*

Which oracle thus delivered, Ariſtinus having well pondered and conſidered, committed himſelfe as an infant new borne unto women for to be waſhed, to be wrapped in ſwaddling clothes, and to be ſuckled with the breſt-head: after which, all ſuch others, whom we call Hyſteropomus, that is to ſay, thoſe whole graves were made, as if they had beene dead, did the ſemblable. Howbeit, ſome doe ſay, that before Ariſtinus was borne, theſe ceremonies were obſerved about thoſe Hyſteropomus, and that this was a right auncient custome kept in the ſemblable caſe: and therefore no marvell it is, that the Romans alſo thought, that ſuch as were ſuppoſed to have beene once buried, and ranged with the dead in another world, ought not to enter in at the ſame porch, out of which they got, when they purpoſe to ſacrifice unto the gods, or at which they reenter when they returne from ſacrifice: but would have them from above to deſcend through the tiles of the rouſe into the cloſe houſe, with the aire open over their heads: for all their purifications ordinarily they performed without the houſe abroad in the aire.

Why doe women kiſſe the lips of their kinſfolks?

IS it as moſt men thinke, for that women being forbidden to drinke wine, the manner was brought up: That whenſoever they met their kinſfolke, they ſhould kiſſe their lips, to the end they might not be unknowen, but convicted if they had drunke wine? or rather for another reaſon, which Ariſtoteles the philoſopher hath alledged: for as touching that occaſion, which is ſo famous and commonly voiced in every mans mouth, yea, and reported of divers and ſundry places; it was no doubt the hardy attempt executed by the dames of Troie, and that upon the coaſts of Italy; for when the men upon their arrivall were landed; the women in the meane while ſet fire upon their ſhips, for very deſire that they had to ſee an end once, one way or other of their long voiage, & to be delivered frō their tedious travel at ſea: but fearing the fury of their men, when they ſhould returne, they went forth to meet their kinſfolke and friends upon the way, and welcomed them with amiable embracing & ſweet kiſſes of their lips: by which means having appeaſed their angrie mood, and recovered their favours, they continued ever after, the cuſtome of kindgreeting and loving ſalutation in this manner.

Or was not this a priviledge granted unto women for their greater honour and credit; namely, to be known and ſeen for to have many of their race and kindred, and thoſe of good worth and reputation?

Or becauſe it was not lawfull to eſpouſe women of their blood and kindred, therefore permitted they were to entertaine them kindly and familiarly with a kiſſe, ſo they proceeded no farther; inſomuch as this was the onely mark and token left of their conſanguinitie. For before time, they might not marrie women of their owne blood; no more than in theſe daies their aunts by the mothers ſide, or their ſiſters: and long it was ere men were permitted to contract marriage with their couſin germaines; and that upon ſuch an occaſion as this. There was a certaine man of poore eſtate and ſmall living, howbeit otherwiſe of good and honeſt carriage, and of all others that managed the publicke affairs of State moſt popular and gracious with the commons: who was ſuppoſed to keepe as his eſpouſed wife a kind woman of his and couſin germain, an inheriteſſe; by whom he had great wealth, and became verie rich: for which he was accuſed judicially before the people; but upon a ſpeciall favour that they bare unto him, they would not enquire into the cauſe in queſtion; but not onely ſuppreſſed his bill of enditement, and let her go as quit of all crime, but alſo even then, enacted a ſtatute, by vertue whereof, lawfull it was for all men from that time forward to marrie, as far as to their couſin germaines, but in any higher or neerer degree of conſanguinitie, they were expreſſly forbidden.

Wherefore is it not lawfull either for the husband to receive a gift of his wife, or for the wife of her husband.

MAY it not be, for that, as Solen ordained that the donations and bequeſts, made by thoſe that die ſhall ſtand good, unleſſe they be ſuch as a man hath granted upon neceſſitie, or by the inducement and flatterie of his wife: in which proviſo, he excepted neceſſitie, as forcing and conſtraining the will; and likewiſe pleaſure, as deceiving the judgement; even ſo have men ſuſpected the muſuall gifts paſſing between the husband and the wife, and thought them to be of the ſame nature.

Or was it not thought, that giving of preſents was of all other the leaſt & worſt ſigne of amity and good will (for even ſtrangers and ſuch as beare no love at all life in that ſort to be giving) and in that regard they would baniſh out of marriage ſuch kind of pleaſing and curting favour; to the end that the muſuall love and affection between the parties ſhould be free and without reſpect of ſalutation and gaine, even for it ſelfe and nothing elſe in the world.

Or becauſe women commonly admit and entertaine ſtrangers, as corrupted by receiving of preſents and gifts at their hands, it was thought to ſtand more with honour and reputation, that wives ſhould love their owne husbands, though they gave them nothing by way of gift.

Or rather, for that it was meet and requiſit, that the goods of the husband ſhould be common to the wife, and to the wife likewiſe of the husband: for the partie who receiveth a thing in gift, doth learne to repute that which was not given, to be none of his owne, but belonging to another: ſo that man and wife in giving never ſo little one to another, deſpoile and defraud themſelves of all that is beſide.

What might be the cauſe that they were forbidden to receive any gift either of Sonne in law, or of Father in law?

OF Sonne in law, for feare left the gift might be thought by the meanes of the Father to paſſe about the returne unto the wife: and of the Father in law, becauſe it was ſuppoſed meet and juſt, that he who gave not, ſhould not likewiſe receive ought.

What ſhould be the reaſon that the Romans when they returned from ſome voyage out of a ſarre and foraine country, or onely from their ferme into the citie; if their wives were at home, uſed to ſend a meſſenger unto them before, for to give warning and advertiſement of their comming?

EITHER it was becauſe this is a token of one that beleeveth and is verily perſwaded that his wife intendeth no lewdneſſe, nor is otherwiſe buſied than well: whereas to come upon her at unwares and on a ſodain, is a kind of forlaying and ſurprize. Or for that they make haſte to ſend them good newes of their comming, as being aſſured that they have a longing deſire, and doe expect ſuch tidings.

Or rather becauſe themſelves would be glad to heare from them ſome good newes, to wit, whether they ſhall find them in good health when they come, and attending affectionately and with great devotion, their returne.

Or elſe becauſe women ordinarily, when their husbands be away and from home, have many petite buſineſſes and houſe affairs: and other whiles there fall out ſome little jarres and quarrels miſſing doores with their ſervants, men or maidens: to the end therefore all ſuch troubles and inconveniences might be overblown; and that they might give unto their husbands a loving and amiable welcome home; they have intelligence given unto them before hand of their arrivall and approach.

What is the cauſe that when they adore and worſhip the gods, they cover their heads: but contrariwiſe when they meet with any honourable or worſhipfull perſons, if their heads haplie were then covered with their cover, they diſcover the ſame, and are bare headed.

FOR it ſeemeth that this faſhion maketh the former doubt and branch of the queſtion more difficult to be aſſoiled: and if that which is reported of Aeneas be true; namely, that as

Diamedes

* Daughters husband.
* Wives father.

* This may ſeeme to have ſome reſpecte to the Roman queſtion.

Diomedes passed along by him while he sacrificed, he covered his head, and so performed his sacrifice; there is good reason and consequence, that if men be covered before their enemies, they should be bare when they encounter either their friends, or men of woorth and honour: for this manner of being covered before the gods, is not properly respective unto them, but occasioned by accident, and hath, since that example of Aeneas, beene observed and continued.

But if we must say somewhat else beside, consider whether it be not sufficient to enquire one-ly of this point; namely, why they cover their heads when they worship the gods, seeing the other consequently dependeth hereupon: for they stand bare before men of dignitie and authoritie, not to doe them any more honor thereby, but contrariwise to diminish their envie, for feare they might be thought to require as much reverence and the same honor as is exhibi-<sup>10</sup> to the gods, or suffer themselves, and take pleasure to be observed and revered equally with them: as for the gods they adored them after this sort; either by way of lowlinesse and humbling themselves before their majestie, in covering and hiding their heads; or rather be-<sup>20</sup> cause they feared lest as they made their praies, there should come unto their hearing, from without, any sinister voice or inauspicate and ominous offe: and to prevent such an object they drew their hood over their eares: And how true it is that they had a carefull eie and regard to meet with all such accidents, it may appeare by this, that when they went to any oracle for to be resolved by answer from thence upon a scrupulous doubt, they caused a great noise to be made all about them, with ringing of pannes or brassen bassons.

Or it may well be, (as Cassius saith, comparing in concordance the Romane fashions with the rites of the Pythagoreans) for that the Dæmon or good angel within us, hath need of the gods helpe without, and maketh supplication with covering the head, giving thus much co-<sup>30</sup> verly to understand thereby, that the soule is likewise covered and hidden by the bodie.

I 1

Why sacrifice they unto Saturne bare-headed.

It is because Aeneas first brought up this fashion of covering the head at sacrifice; and the sacrifice to Saturnus is much more auncient than his time?

Or, for that they used to be covered unto the celestiall gods: but as for Saturne he is reputed<sup>30</sup> a Subterranean or terrestriall god?

Or, in this respect, that there is nothing hidden, covered, or shadowed in Truth? For among the Romans, Saturne was held to be the father of Veritie.

I 2

Why doe they repute Saturne the father of Truth.

* Keiser.
* Keiser.

It is for that (as some Philosophers deeme) they are of opinion that * Saturne is * Time; and Time you know well findeth out and revealeth the Truth.

Or, because as the Poets fable, men lived under Saturnes reigne in the golden age: and if<sup>40</sup> the life of man was then most just and righteous, it followeth consequently that there was much truth in the world.

I 3

What is the reason that they sacrificed likewise unto the gods whom they tearmed Honor, with bare head? now a man may interpret Honor to be as much as Glory and Reputation.

It is haply because Honor and glory is a thing evident, notorious, and exposed to the know-<sup>50</sup> ledge of the whole world: and by the same reason that they veile boner before men of wor-ship, dignitie, and honor, they adore also the deitie that beareth the name of Honor, with the head bare.

I 4

What may be the cause, that sonnes carry their Fathers and Mothers sooth to be entered, with their heads hooded and covered: but daughters bare headed, with their haire detressed and hanging downe loose.

It is for that Fathers ought to be honored as gods by their male children, but lamented and bewailed as dead men by their daughters, and therefore the law having given and graunted<sup>unto</sup> unto either sex that which is proper, hath of both together made that which is becoming and convenient.

Or, it is in this regard, that unto sorrow and heaviness, that is best becoming which is extra-ordinary and unusuall: now more ordinarie it is with women to go abroad with their heads veiled and covered: and likewise with men, to be discovered and bare headed. For even among the Greeks when there is befallen unto them any publike calamitie, the manner and custome is, that the women should cut off the hayres of their head, and the men weare them long: for that otherwise it is usuall that men should poll their heads, and women keepe their haire long. And to prove that sonnes were wont to be covered; in such a case, and for the said cause, a man may<sup>10</sup> alledge that which Varro hath written; namely, that in the solemnitie of funerals, and about the tombs of their fathers, they carry themselves with as much reverence and devotion as in the temples of the gods: in such sort, as when they have burnt the corps in the funeral fire, as soone as ever they meet with a bone, they pronounce, that he who is dead, is now become a god. On the contrary side, women were no wife permitted to vaile and cover their heads. And we find upon record, that the first man who put away and divorced his wife was Spurius Carbilus, be-<sup>20</sup> cause she bare him no children; the second, Salpitius Gallus, for that he saw her to cast a robe over her head: and the third Publius Sempronius, for standing to behold the solemnitie of the fu-nerall games.

I 5

How it cometh to passe, that considering the Romans esteemed Terminus a god, and there-fore in honour of him celebrated a feast called thereupon Terminalia, yet they never killed any beast in sacrifice unto him?

It is because Romulus did appoint no bonds and limits of his country, to the end that he might lawfully set out & take in where pleased him, and repute all that land his owne so far as, (according to that saying of the Lacedæmonian) his speare or javelin would reach? But Numa<sup>30</sup> Pompilius a just man and politick withall, one who knew well how to govern, and that by the rule of Philopohie, caused his territorie to be confined betwene him and his neighbour nations, and called those frontier bonds by the name of Terminus as the superintendent, over-seeer and keeper of peace and amitie between neighbours; and therefore he supposed, that this Terminus ought to be preserved pure and cleane from all blood, and impollute with any murder.

I 6

What is the reason that it is not lawfull for any maid servants to enter into the temple of the goddesse * Leucothea? and the Dames of Rome, bringing in thither one alone and no more * Or Matuta, with them, fall to cuffing and boxing her about the eares and cheeks.

As for the wench that is thus buffeted, it is a sufficient signe and argument, that such as she, are not permitted to come thither: now for all others they keepe them out in regard of a certaine poetically fable reported in this wise: that ladie Juno being in times past jealous of her husband, and suspecting him with a maid servant of hers, fell mad, and was enraged against<sup>40</sup> her owne sonne: this servant the Greeks say, was an Aetolian borne, and had to name Antiphera: and therefore it is that heere among us in the citie of Charonea, before the temple or chappell of Matuta, the sexton taking a whip in his hand crieth with a loud voice: No man servant or maid servant be so hardie as to come in heere; no Aetolian hee or shee presume to enter into this place.

What is the cause that to this goddesse, folke pray not for any blessings to their owne children, but for their nephewes only, to wit, their brothers or sisters children?

May it not be that Juno being a ladie that loved her sister wonderous well, in so much as she<sup>50</sup> suckled at her owne breast a sonne of hers: but was unfortunate in her owne children? Or rather, because the said custome is otherwise very good and civill, inducing and moving folks hearts to carie love and affection to their kinred;

I 8

For what cause, were many rich men wont to consecrate and give unto Hercules the Disme or tenth of all their goods?

Why may it not be upon this occasion, that Hercules himselfe being upon a time at<sup>Or</sup> * Rome, sacrifice the tenth cow of all the drove which he had taken from Geryon?

Cecce 2

* By Protesis, meaning the place where afterwards Rome stood.

Or for that he freed and delivered the Romans from the tax and tribute of the Dismes which they were wont to pay out of their goods unto the Tuskans.

Or in case this may not go current for an authentick historie, and worthie of credit; what and if we say that unto Hercules as to some great bellie god, and one who loved good cheere, they offered and sacrificed plentifully and in great liberalitie?

Or rather, for that by this means they would take downe and diminish a little, their excessive riches which ordinarily is an eie-fore and odious unto the citizens of a popular state, as if they meant to abate and bring low (as it were) that plethoricall plight and corpulency of the bodie, which being growen to the height is dangerous: suppling by such cutting off, and abridging of superfluities, to do honour and service most pleasing unto Hercules, as who joied highly in frugalitie: for that in his life time he stood contented with a little, and regarded no delicacie or excessive whatsoever.

For in old time the moneth of March was reckoned first, as a man may collect by many other conjectures, and by this especially, that the first moneth in order after March was called Quintilis, and the sixt moneth Sexilis, and all the rest consequently one after another until you come to the last, which they named December, because it was the tenth in number after March: which giveth occasion unto some for to thinke & say, that the Romans (in those daies) determined and accomplished their compleat yeere, not in twelve moneths but in ten: namely, by adding unto everie one of those ten moneths certain daies over and above thirtie. Others write, that December indeed was the tenth moneth after March; but Januarie was the eleventh, and Februarie the twelfth: in which moneth they used certaine expiatorie and purgatorie sacrifices, yea, and offered oblations unto the dead (as it were) to make an end of the yeere. Howbeit afterwards they transposed this order, and ranged Januarie in the first place, for that upon the first day thereof, which they call the Calends of Januarie; the first Consuls that ever bare rule in Rome were entailed, immediately upon the deposition and expulsion of the kings out of the citie. But there seemeth to be more probability & likelihood of truth in their speech, who say, that Romulus being a martiall prince, and one that loved warre and feats of armes, as being reputed the sonne of Mars, set before all other moneths, that which carried the name of his father: howbeit Numa who succeeded next after him, being a man of peace, and who endeavored to withdraw the hearts and minds of his subjects and citizens from warre to agriculture, gave the prerogative of the first place unto Januarie, and honoured Janus most, as one who had bene more given to politick government, and to the husbandrie of ground, than to the exercise of warre and armes.

Consider moreover, whether Numa chose not this moneth for to begin the yeere withall, as best sorting with nature in regard of us; for otherwise in generall, there is no one thing of all those that by nature turne about circularly, that can be said first or last, but according to the severall institutions and ordinances of men, some begin the time at this point, others at that. And verely they that make the Winter solstice or hibernal Tropick the beginning of their yeere, do the best of all others: for that the Sunne ceasing then to passe farther, beginneth to returne and take his way againe toward us: for it seemeth, that both according to the course of nature, and also in regard of us, this season is most befitting to begin the yeere: for that it increaseth unto us the time of daie light, and diminisheth the darknesse of night, and causeth that noble starre or planet to approach neerer and come toward us, the lord governour and ruler of all substance transitorie and fluxible matter whatsoever.

Why do women when they dresse up and adorne the chappell or shrine of their feminine goddesse, whom they call Bona, never bring home for that purpose any branches of Myrtle tree: and yet otherwise have a delight to employ all sorts of leaves and flowers?

50

*Or Phaulus. May it not be, for that, as some fabulous writers tell the tale, there was one Flavius a sooth-saier had a wife, who used secretly to drinke wine, and when she was surprisid and taken in the manner by her husband, she was well beaten by him which myrtle rods: and for that cause they bring thither no boughs of myrtle: marry they offer libations unto this goddesse of wine, but forsooth they call it Milke.

Or is it not for this cause, that those who are to celebrate the ceremonies of this divine service, vice, ought to be pure and cleane from all pollutions, but especially from that of Venus or lechery? For not onely they put out of the room where the service is performed unto the said goddesse Bona, all men, but also whatsoever is besides of masculine sex; which is the reason that they so detest the myrtle tree, as being consecrated unto Venus, inasmuch as it should seeme they called in old time that Venus, Myrtes, which now goeth under the name of Marcia.

21

What is the reason that the Latines doe so much honour and reverence the Woodpecker, and forbear altogether to doe that bird any harme?

10

It is for that Picus was reported in old time by the enchantments and forceries of his wife, to have changed his owne nature, and to be metamorphozed into a Woodpecker; under which forme he gave out oracles, and delivered answers unto those who propounded unto him any demands?

Or rather, because this seemeth a moere fable, and incredible tale: there is another storie reported, which carrieth more probabilitie with it, and soundeth neerer unto truth. That when Romulus and Remus were cast forth and exposed to death; not onely a female wolfe gave them her teats to sucke, but also a certeine Woodpecker flew unto them, and brought them food in her bill, and so fedde them: and therefore haply it is, that ordinarily in these daies wee may see, as Nigidius hath well observed; what places forever at the foot of an hill covered and shadowed with oakes or other trees a Woodpecker haunteth, thither customably you shall have a wolfe to repaire.

Or peradventure, seeing their maner is to consecrate unto every god one kinde of birde or other, they reputed this Woodpecker sacred unto Mars, because it is a courageous and hardy bird, having a bill so strong, that he is able to overthrow an oke therewith, after he hath jobbed and pecked into it as farre as to the very marrow and heart thereof.

How is it that they imagine Janus to have had two faces, in which maner they use both to paine and also to cast him in mold.

30

It is for that he being a Græcian borne, came from Perhabia, as we finde written in histories; and passing forward into Italy, dwelt in that country among the Barbarous people, who there lived, whose language and maner of life he changed?

Or rather because he taught and perswaded them to live together after a civill and honest fort, in husbandry and tilling the ground; whereas before time their manners were rude, and their fashions savage without law or justice altogether.

What is the cause that they use to sell at Rome all things pertaining to the furniture of Funerals, within the temple of the goddesse Libitina, supposing her to be Venus.

40

This may seeme to be one of the fage and philosophicall inventions of king Numa, to the end that men should learne not to abhorre such things, nor to flie from them, as if they did pollute and defile them?

Or else this reason may be rendred, that it serveth for a good record and memoriall, to put us in minde, that whatsoever had a beginning by generation, shall likewise come to an end by death; as if one and the same goddesse were superintendent and governeesse of nativite and death: for even in the city of Delphos there is a pretie image of Venus, surnamed Epipymbia; that is to say sepulchrell: before which they use to raise and call forth the ghosts of such as are departed, for to receive the libaments and sacred liquors poured forth unto them.

Why have the Romans in every moneth three beginnings as it were, to wit, certeine principall and prefixed or preordained daies, and regard not the same intervall or space of daies betweene?

It is because as Juba writeth in his chronicles, that the chiefe magistrates were wont upon the first day of the moneth to call and summon the people; whereupon it tooke the name of Ca-

Cccc 3

* That is to say, Kalends, Ides & Nones.

lends: and then to denounce unto them that the Nones should be the fifth day after; and as for the Ides they held it to be an holy and sacred day?

Or for that they measuring and determining the time according to the differences of the moone, they observed in her every moneth three principall changes and diversities: the first, when she is altogether hidden, namely during her conjunction with the sunne; the second when she is somewhat removed from the beames of the sunne, & beginneth to shew herselfe croissant in the evening toward the West whereas the sunne setteth; the third, when she is at the full: now that occultation and hiding of hers in the first place, they named Calends, for that in their tongue whatsoever is secret & hidden, they say it is [Clam] and to hide or keepe close, they expresse by this word [Celare]; and the first day of the moones illumination, which wee here in Greece tearme Noumenia, that is to say, the new-moone, they called by a most just name Nona, for that which is new and young, they tearme Novum, in manner as wee doe now. As for the Ides, they tooke their name of this word Ides, that signifieth beautie; for that the moone being then at the full, is in the very perfection of her beautie: or haply they derived this denomination of Dies, as attributing it to Jupiter: but in this we are not to search our exactly the just number of daies, nor upon a small default to slander and condemne this manner of reckoning, seeing that even at this day, when the science of Astrologie is grown to so great an increment, the inequalitye of the motion, and course of the moone surpasseth all experience of Mathematicians, and cannot be reduced to any certaine rule of reason.

What is the cause that they repute the morrowes after Calends, Nones, and Ides, disafterous or dismall daies, either for to set forward upon any journey or voiage, or to march with an army into the field?

It is because as many thinke, and as Titus Livius hath recorded in his storie; the Tribunes militarie, at what time as they had consular and soveraigne authoritie, went into the field with the Romane armie the morrow after the Ides of the moneth Quintilis, which was the same that July now is, and were discomfited in a battell by the Gauls, neere unto the river Allia: and consequently upon that overthrow, lost the very city it selfe of Rome: by which occasion the morrow after the Ides, being held and reputed for a sinister and unluckie day; superstition entring into mens heads, proceeded farther, (as the loveth alwaies so to doe) and brought in the custom to mens heads, proceeded farther, (as the loveth alwaies so to doe) and brought in the custome for to hold the morrow after the Nones yea, and the morrow after the Calends, as unfortunate, and to be as religiously observed in semblable cases.

But against this there may be opposed many objections: for first and formost, they lost that battell upon another day, and calling it Allenis, by the name of the river Allia, where it was stricken, they have it in abomination for that cause. Again, whereas there be many daies reputed dismall and unfortunate, they doe not observe so precisely and with so religious feare, other daies of like denomination in every moneth, but each day apart onely in that moneth wherein such and such a disaster, hapned: and that the infortunie of one day should draw a superstitious feare simply upon all the morrowes after Calends, Nones, and Ides, carieth no congruie at all, nor apparence of reason.

Consider moreover and see, whether, as of moneths they used to consecrate the first to the gods celestiall; the second to the terrestriall, or infernall, wherein they performe certaine expiatorie ceremonies and sacrifices of purification, and presenting offerings and services to the dead: so of the daies in the moneth, those which are chiefe and principall, as hath bene said, they would not have to be kept as sacred and festivall holidays; but such as follow after, as being dedicated unto the spirits, called Demons, and those that are departed; they also have esteemed consequently as unhappy, & altogether unmeet either for to execute or to take in hand any business: for the Greeks adoring and serving the gods upon their new moones and first daies of the moneth, have attributed the second daies unto the demi-gods and Demons: like as at 40 their feasts also they drinke the second cup unto their demi-gods, and demi-goddesses. In summe, Time is a kinde of number, and the beginning of number is (I wot not what,) some divine thing, for it is unitie: and that which commeth next after it is Deux or two, cleane opposite unto the said beginning, and is the first of all even numbers: as for the even number it is defective, imperfect, and indefinite, whereas contrariwise, the uneven or odde number it selfe is finite, complet, and absolute: and for this cause like as the Nones succeed the Calends five daies after; so the Ides follow the Nones nine daies after them; for the uneven and and odde numbers doe determine those beginnings, or principall daies; but those which presently ensue after the said principall daies being even, are neither ranged in any order, nor have power and puissance: and therefore men doe not enterprize any great worke, nor set fourth voiage or journey upon such daies: and hereto we may to good purpose annex that pretie speech of Themistocles: For when the morrow (quoth he) upon a time quarrelled with the festivall day which went next before it, saying, that herselfe was busied and tooke a great deale of pains, preparing & providing with much travel those goods which the feast enjoined at her ease, with all repose, rest, and leisure: the Festivall day made this answer: Thou saidst true indeed; but if I were not, where wouldst thou be? This tale Themistocles devised, and delivered unto the Athenian captaines, who came after him; giving them thereby to understand, that neither they nor any acts of theirs would ever have bene leene, unless hee before them had saved the citie of Athens. Forasmuch then, as every enterprize and voiage of importance hath need of provision, and some preparatives; and for that the Romans in old time upon their festivall daies, dispensed nothing, nor tooke care for any provision; being wholly given and devoted at such times to the service & worship of God, doing that, & nothing else; like as even yet at this day, when the priests begin to sacrifice, they pronounce with a loud voice before all the companie there assembled Hoc Age, that is to say, Minde this, and doe no other thing: verie like it is, and standeth to great reason, that they used not to put themselves upon the way for any long voiage, nor tooke in hand any great affaire or business presently after a festivall day, but kept within house all the morrow after, to thinke upon their occasions, and to provide all things necessarie for journey or exploit: or we may conjecture, that as at this very day the Romans after they have adored the gods, and made their prayers unto them within their temples, are wont to stay there a time, and sit them downe; even so they thought it not reasonable to cast their great affaires so, as that they should immediately follow upon any of their festivall daies; but they allowed some respite and time betwene, as knowing full well, that businesses carie with them alwaies many troubles and hinderances, beyond the opinion, expectation, and will of those who take them in hand.

What is the cause that women at Rome, when they mourne for the dead, put on white robes, and likewise weare white cawles, coifes and kerchiefs upon their heads.

30

May it not be that for to oppose themselves against hell and the darkeness thereof, they conforme their raiment and attire to that colour which is cleere and bright?

Or doe they it not rather for this: that like as they clad and burie the dead corps in white clothes, they suppose, that those who are next of kin, and come neereft about them, ought also to weare their liverie? Now the bodie they doe in this wise decke, because they cannot adorne the foule so; and it they are willing to accompanie as lightome, pure and net, as being now at the last delivered and set free, and which hath performed a great a variable combat.

Or rather, we may guesse thus much thereby: that in such cases, that which is most simple and least costly, is best becoming; whereas clothes of any other colour died, do commonly bewray either superfluitie or curiositie: for we may say even as well of blacke, as of purple: These robes are deceitfull; these colours also are counterfeite. And as touching that which is of it selfe blacke, if it have not that tincture by dyes art, surely it is so coloured by nature, as being mixed and compounded with obscuritie: and therefore there is no colour els but white, which is pure, unmixt, and not stained and sullied with any tincture, and that which is inimitable; in which regard, more meet and agreeable unto those who are interred, considering that the dead is now become simple, pure, exempt from all mixtion, and in very truth, nothing els but delivered from the bodie, as a staine and infection hardly scowred out and rid away. Semblably, in the citie of Argos, whensoever they mourned, the maner was to weare white garments, washed 50 (as Socrates said) in faire and cleere water.

What is the reason that they esteeme all the walles of the citie sacred and inviolable, but not the gates.

It is (as Varro saith) because we ought to thinke the walles holie, to the end that we may fight valiantly, and die generously in the defence of them? for it seemeth that this was the cause, why Remulus killed his owne brother Remus, for that he presumed to leape over an holy and inviolable place: whereas contrariwise, it was not possible to consecrate and hallow the gates, gates, thorow which there must needs be transported many things necessary, and namely, the bodies of the dead. And therefore, they who begin to found a cite, environ and compass first with a plough all that pourprise and precinct wherein they meant to build, drawing the said plough with an ox and a cow coupled together in one yoke: afterwards, when they have traced out all the said place where the walles should stand, they measure out as much ground as will serve for the gates, but take out the plough-share, and so passe over that space with the bare plough, as if they meant thereby, that all the furrow which they cast up and eared, should be fenced and inviolable.

What is the reason, that when their children are to swear by Hercules, they will not let them to do it within doores, but cause them to go forth of the house, and take their oath abroad?

It is because (as some would have it) that they thinke Hercules is not delighted with keeping close within house and sitting idly, but taketh pleasure to live abroad and lie without?

Or rather, for that of all the gods, Hercules is not (as one would say) home-bred, but a stranger, come amongst them from afarie? For even so they would not swear by Bacchus, under the rooffe of the house, but went forth to do it; because he also is but a stranger among the gods.

Or haply, this is no more but a word in game and sport, given unto children: and besides (to say a trueth) it may be a meane to withholde and restrain them from swearing so readily and rashly, as Phavorinus saith: for this device causeth a certeine premeditate preparation, and girathem (whiles they goe out of the house) leasure and time to consider better of the matter. And a man may conjecture also with Phavorinus, and say with him: That this fashion was not common to other gods, but proper to Hercules: for that we finde it written, that he was so religious, so respective and precise in his oath, that in all his life time he never swate but once, and that was only to Phileus the sonne of Angus. And therefore, the prophetesse at Delfos, named Pythia, answered thus upon a time to the Lacedæmonians:

*When all these oaths you once for send,
Your state (be sure) shall daily mend.*

29

What should be the reason, that they would not permit the new wedded bride to passe of herselfe over the doore-sill or threshold, when she is brought home to her husbands house, but that they accompany her, must lift her up betwene them from the ground, and so convey her in.

It is in remembrance of those first wives whom they ravished perforce from the Sabines, who entred not into their houses of themselves with their good will, but were carried in by them in this maner?

Or is it perhaps, because they would be thought to goe against their willes into that place where they were to lose their maidenhead?

Or haply it may be, that a wedded wife ought not to goe forth of her doores, and abandon her house, but perforce, like as she went first into it by force. For in our countrey of Bæotia, the maner is, to burne before the doore where a new married wife is to dwell, the axel tree of that chariot or coach in which she rode when she was brought to her husbands house. By which ceremonie, thus much she is given to understand, that will she nill she, there she must now tarrie, considering that it which brought her thither, is now gone quite and consumed.

*Wherefore do they at Rome, when they bring a new espoused bride home to the house of her husband, force her to say these words unto her spouse? Where you are Cajus, I will be Cajus?*

50

It is to testifie by these words, that she entreateth immediately to communicate with him in all goods, and to be a governesse and commander in the house as well as he: for it implieth as much, as if she should say; where you are lord and master, I will be lady and mistres. Now these names they used as being common, and such as came first to hand, and for no other reason else: like as the Civill lawiers use ordinarily these names, Cajus, Seius, Lucius, and Titius: the Philosophers in their schooles, Dion and Theon.

Or peradventure it is in regard of Caisa Cæcilia a beautifull and vertuous lady, who intimes past past espoused one of the sonnes of king Tarquinius: of which dame there is yet to be scene even at this day one image of brasse, within the temple of the god Santus: and there likewise in old time, her slippers, her distaffe and spindels laid up for to bee scene: the one to signifie that she kept the house well, and went not ordinarily abroad; the other to shew how she busied her selfe at home.

31

How cometh it, that they use to chaunt ordinarily at weddings, this word so much divulged, Talassio?

10

It is not of Talassia, the Greeke word, which signifieth yarne: for the basket wherein women use to put in their rolles of carded wooll, they name Talassos in Greeke, and Calathus in Latine? Certes they that lead the bride home, cause her to sit upon a peece of wooll, then bringeth she forth a distaffe and a spindle, and with wooll all to hangeth and decketh the dore of her husbands house.

Or rather, if it be true which historians report: There was sometime a certeine young gentleman, very valiant and active in feats of armes, and otherwise of excellent parts and singular wel conditioned, whose name was Talassius: and when they ravished and caried away the daughters of the Sabines who were come to Rome, for to behold the solemnitie of their festivall games and plaies: certaine meane persons, such yet as belonged to the traine & retinue of Talassius afore said, had chosen forth & were caryng away, one damosel above the rest most beautiful of visage, and for their safety and securitie as they passed along the streets, cried out aloud Talassio, Talassio, that is to say, for Talassius, for Talassius: to the end that no man should be so hardy as to approach neere unto them, nor attempt to have away the maiden from them, giving it out, that they caried her for to be the wife of Talassius; and others meeting them upon the way, joined with them in company for the honour of Talassius, and as they followed after, highly praised their good choice which they had made, praying the gods to give both him and her joy of their marriage, and contentment to their hearts desire. Now for that this marriage proved happy and blessed, they were wont ever after in their wedding songs to rechant and recount 30 this name, Talassius, like as the maner is among the Greeks to sing in such carrols, Hymenæus.

What is the reason that in the moneth of May, they use at Rome to cast over their wooden bridge into the river, certaine images of men, which they call Argæos?

It is in memoriall of the Barbarians who sometimes inhabited these parts, and did do by the Greeks, murdering them in that maner as many of them as they could take? But Hercules who was highly esteemed among them for his vertue, abolished this cruell fashion of killing of strangers, and taught them this custome to counterfet their auncient superstitions, and to sling 40 these images in stead of them: now in old time our ancestors used to name all Greeks of what countrey soever they were, Argæos: unlesse haply a man would say, that the Arcadians reputed the Argives to be their enemies, for that they were their neighbour borderers, such as fled with Evander out of Arcadia, and came to inhabit these quarters, retained still the old hatred and rancor, which time out of minde had taken root, and beene sealed in their hearts against the said Argives.

33

What is the cause that the Romans in old time never went forth out of their houses to supper, but they caried with them their young sonnes, even when they were but in their very infancy and childhood.

50

Was not this for the very same reason that Lycæus instituted and ordained, that young children should ordinarily be brought into their halles where they used to eat in publicke, called Phidria, to the end that they might be inured and acquainted betimes, not to use the pleasures of eating and drinking immoderately, as brutish and ravenous beasts are wont to doe; considering that they had their elders to oversee them, yea, and to controll their demeanour: and in this regard haply also, that their fathers themselves should in their carriage be more sober, honest, and frugall, in the presence of their children: for looke where old folke folke are shamelesse, there it can not chuse but (as Plato saith) children and youth will be most gracelesse and impudent.

<sup>34</sup>
What might the reason be, that whereas all other Romans made their offerings, ceremonies, and sacrifices for the dead, in the month of February: Decimus Brutus as Cicero saith, was wont to doe the same in the month of December: now this Brutus was he who first invaded the country of Portugall, and with an armie passed over the river of Lethe, that is to say, oblivion.

May it not be, that as the most part of men used not to performe any such services for the dead, but toward the end of the moneth, and a little before the shutting in of the evenings even so it seemeth to carie good reason, to honour the dead at the end of the yeere; and you wot well that December was the last moneth of all the yeere.

Or rather, it is because this was an honour exhibited to the deities terrestriall: and it seemeth that the proper season to reverence and worship these earthly gods, is when the fruits of the earth be fully gathered and laid up.

Or haply, for that the husband men began at this time to breake up their grounds against their needesse: it was meet and requisite to have in remembrance those gods which are under the ground.

Or haply, because this moneth is dedicate and consecrated by the Romans to Saturne; for they counted Saturne one of the gods beneath, and none of them above: and withall, considering the greatest and most solemne feast, which they call Saturnalia, is holden in this moneth, at what time as they seeme to have their most frequent meeting, and make best cheere, he thought it meet and reasonable that the dead also should enjoy some little portion thereof.

Or it may be said, that it is altogether untrue that Decimus Brutus alone sacrificed for the dead in this moneth: for certein it is that there was a certein divine service performed to Aeolus Larentia, and solemne effusions and libaments of wine and milke were powred upon her sepulchre in the moneth of December.

Why honoured the Romans this Acca Larentia so highly, considering she was no better than a strumpet or courtesan?

For you must thinke, that the histories make mention of another Acca Larentia, the nurse of Romulus, unto whom they do honour in the moneth of Aprill. As for this courtesan Larentia, she was (as men say) surnamed Fabula, and came to be so famous and renowned by such an occasion as this. A certein sexton of Hercules his temple, having little els to doe, and living at ease (as commonly such fellows doe) used for the most part to spend all the day in playing at dice and with cockall bones: and one day above the rest, it fortun'd, that meeting with none of his mates and play-fellows who were wont to beare him company at such games, and not knowing what to do nor how to passe the time away, he thought with himselfe to challenge the god whose servant he was, to play at dice with him, upon these conditions: That if himselfe won the game, Hercules should be a meane for him of some good lucke and happy fortune; but in case he lost the game, he should provide for Hercules a good supper, and withall, a pretie wench and a faire, to be his bedfellow: these conditions being agreed upon and set downe, he cast the dice, one chance for himselfe, and another for the god; but his hap was to be the loser: whereupon minding to stand unto his challenge, and to accomplish that which he had promised, he prepared a rich supper for Hercules his god, and withall, sent for this Acca Larentia, a professed courtesan and common harlot, whom he feasted also with him, and after supper bettowed her in a bed within the very temple, shut the doores fast upon, and so went his way. Now the tale goes forsooth, that in the night, Hercules companied with her, not after the manner of men, but charged her, that the next morning betimes she should go into the market-place, and looke what man the first met withall, him she should entertaine in all kindnesse, and make her friend especially. Then Larentia gat up betimes in the morning accordingly, and chanced to encounter a certein rich man and a staid bachelor, who was now past his middle age, and his name was Tarantius; with him she became so familiarly acquainted, that so long as he lived, she had the command of his whole house; and at his death, was by his last will and testament inherited

heritresse of all that he had. This Larentia likewise afterward departed this life, and left all her riches unto the citie of Rome; whereupon this honour above said was done unto her.

<sup>36</sup>
What is the cause, that they name one gate of the citie Fenestra, which is as much to say, as window; neere unto which adjoineth the bed-chamber of Fortune?

Is it for that king Servius a most fortunate prince, was thought & named to lie with Fortune, who was wont to come unto him by the window? or is this but a devised tale? But in truth, after that king Tarquinius Priscus was deceased, his wife Tanagillis being a wise ladie, and endued with a soiall mind, putting forth her head, and bending forward her bodie out of her chamber window, made a speech unto the people, perswading them to elect Servius for their king. And this is the reason that afterwards the place retained this name, Fenestra.

What is the reason, that of all those things which be dedicated and consecrated to the gods, the custome is at Rome, that onely the spoiles of enemies conquered in the warres, are neglected and suffered to run to decay in processe of time: neither is there any reverence done unto them, nor required be they at any time, when they waxe olde?

Whether is it, because they (supposing their glory to fade and passe away together with these first spoiles) seeke evermore new meanes to winne some fresh marks and monuments of their vertue, and to leavethem same behinde them.

Or rather, for that seeing time doth waste and consume these signes and tokens of the enbity, which they had with their enemies, it were an odious thing for them, and very invidious, if they should refresh and renew the remembrance thereof: for even those among the Greeks, who first erected their trophies or pillars of brasie and stone, were not commended for so doing.

What is the reason, that Quintus Metellus the high priest, and reputed besides a wise man, would polittike for bad to observe auspices, or to take presages by flight of birds, after the moneth Sex-tilis, now called August.

Is it for that, as we are wont to attend upon such observations about noone or in the beginning of the day, at the entrance also and toward the middle of the moneth: but we take heed and beware of the daies declination, as inauspicate and unmeet for such purposes; even so Metellus supposed, that the time after eight moneths was (as it were) the evening of the yeere, and the latter end of it declining now and wearing toward an end.

Or haply, because we are to make use of these birds, and to observe their flight for presage, while they are entire, perfect and nothing defective, such as they are before Summer time. But about Autumne some of them moult, grow to be sickly and weak; others are over young and too small; and some againe appeare not at all, but like passengers are gone at such a time into another country.

What is the cause, that it was not lawfull for them who were not prest soldiers by oth and enrolled, although upon some other occasions they conversed in the campe, to strike or wound an enemy? And verely Cato himselfe the elder of that name signified thus much in a letter missive which he wrote unto his sonne: wherein he straitly charged him, that if he had accomplished the full time of his service, and that his captain had given him his conge and discharge, he should immediately returne; or in case he had lesser stay still in the campe, that he should obtaine of his captaine permission and licence to hurt and kill his enemy.

Is it because there is nothing else but needesse alone, doeth warrantize the killing of a man: and he who unlawfully and without expresse commandement of a superiour (unconstrained) doth it, is a meere homicide and manslayer. And therefore Cyrus commended Chrysantus, for that being upon the verie point of killing his enemy, as having lifted up his cemeter for to give him a deadly wound, presently upon the sound of the retreat by the trumpeter, let the man go, and would not smite him, as if he had bene forbidden so to do.

Or may it not be, for that he who presenteth himselfe to fight with his enimie, in case he shrink, and make not good his ground, ought not to go away cleere withal, but to be held faulty and to suffer punishment: for he doth nothing so good service that hath either killed our wound, or an enimie, as harme and damage, who reculeth backe or flieth away: now he who is discharged from warfare, and hath leave to depart, is no more obliged and bound to militarie lawes: but he that hath demanded permission to do that service which sworne and enrolled souldiers perforce, putteth himselfe againe under the subjection of the law and his owne captaine.

How is it, that the priest of Jupiter, is not permitted to anoint himselfe abroad in the open aire?

Is it for that in old time it was not held honest and lawfull for children to do off their clothes before their fathers; nor the sonne in law in the presence of his wives father; neither used they the stouph or bath together: now is Jupiter reputed the priests or Flamines father: and that which is done in the open aire, seemeth especially to be in the verie cie and sight of Jupiter?

Or rather, like as it was thought a great sinne and exceeding irreverence, for a man to turne himselfe out of his apparrell naked, in any church, chappell, or religious and sacred place; even so they carried a great respect unto the aire and open skie, as being full of gods, demi-gods, and saints. And this is the verie cause, why we do many of our necessarie businesse within doores, enclosed and covered with the rooffe of our houses, and so removed from the eies as it were of the deitie. Moreover, some things there be that by law are commaunded and enjoined unto the priest onely; and others againe unto all men, by the priest: as for example, heere with us in Bavaria to be crowned with chaplets of flowers upon the head; to let the haire grow long; to weare a sword, and not to set foot within the limits of Phocis, pertaine all to the office and dutie of the captaine generall and chiefe ruler: but to tast of no new fruits before the Autumnall Aequinox be past; nor to cut and prune a vine but before the Aequinox of the Spring, be intimated and declared unto all by the said ruler or captaine generall: for those be the verie seasons to do both the one & the other. In like case, it should seeme in my judgement that among the Romans it properly belonged to the priest; not to mount on horseback; not to be above three nights out of the citie; not to put off his cap, wherupon he was called in the Roman language, Flamen. But there be many other offices and duties, notified and declared unto all men by the priest, among which this is one, not to be enhailed or anointed abroad in the open aire: For this manner of anointing drie without the bath, the Romans mightily suspected and were afraid of: and even at this day they are of opinion, that there was no such cause in the world that brought the Greeks under the yoke of servitude and bondage, and made them so tender and effeminate, as their halles and publike places where their young men wrestled & exercised their bodies naked: as being the meanes that brought into their cities, much losse of time, engendred idlenesse, bred lazie slouth, and ministred occasion & opportunity of lewdnesse and vilany; as namely, to make love unto faire boies, and to spoile and marre the bodies of young men with sleeping, with walking at a certaine measure, with stirring according to motions, keeping artificiall compasse, and with observing rules of exquisite diet. Through which fashions, they see not, how (ere they be aware) they be fallen from exercises of armes, and have cleane forgotten all militarie discipline: loving rather to be held and esteemed good wrestlers, fine dauncers, concealed pleasers, and faire minions, than hardie footmen, or valiant men of armes. And verely it is an hard matter to avoid and decline these inconveniences, for them that use to discover their bodies naked before all the world in the broad aire: but those who anoint themselves closely within doores, and looke to their bodies at home are neither faultie nor offensive.

What is the reason that the auncient coine and mony in old time, carried the flame of one side of Ianus with two faces: and on the other side, the prow or the poope of a boat engraved therein?

Was it not as many men do say, for to honour the memorie of Saturne, who passed into Italy by water in such a vessel? But a man may say thus much as well of many rivers: for Janus, Evander, and Aeneas, came thither likewise by sea; and therefore a man may put adventure adventure gesse with better reason; that whereas some things serve as goodly ornaments for cities, others as necessarie implements: among those which are decent and seemely ornaments, the principall is good government and discipline, and among such as be necessarie is reckoned, plentie and abundance of victuals: now for that Janus instituted good government, in ordering holmesse lawes, and reducing their manner of life to civillie, which before was rude and brutish, and for that the river being navigable, furnished them with store of all necessary commodities, whereby some were brought thither by sea, others from the land; the coine carried for the marke of a law-giver, the head with two faces, like as we have already said, because of that change of life which he brought in; and of the river, a ferrie boate or barge: and yet there was another kinde of money current among them, which had the figure portraied upon it, of a bee, of a sheepe, and of a swine; for that their riches they raised especially from such cattle, and all their wealth and substance consisted in them. And heereupon it cometh, that many of their auncient names, were Ovilij, Bubulci and Porcij, that is to say, Sheepe-reeves, and Neat-herds, and Swineherds according as Fenestella doth report.

What is the cause that they make the temple of Saturne, the chamber of the coine, for to keepe therein the publike treasure of gold and silver: as also their arches, for the custodie of all their writings, rolles, contracts and evidences whatsoever.

Is it by occasion of that opinion so commonly received, and the speech so universally current in every mans mouth, that during the raigne of Saturne, there was no avarice nor injustice in the world; but loialtie, truth, faith, and righteousnesse carried the whole sway among men.

Or for that he was the god who found out fruits, brought in agriculture, and taught husbandry first; for the hooke or sickle in his hand signifieth so much, and not as Animallius wrote, following therein and beleeving Hesiodus:

Rough Saturne with his hairy skinne, against all Law and right,

*Of Aemons sonne, fir Ouranus, or Coelus sometime hight,
Those privy members which him gat, with hooke a-flant off-cut.
And then anon in fathers place of reigne, himselfe did put.*

Now the abundance of the fruits which the earth yeeldeth, and the vent or disposition of them, is the very mother that bringeth forth plentie of monie: and therefore it is that this same god they make the author and maintainer of their felicitie: in testimony whereof, those assemblies which are holden every ninth day in the common place of the city, called Nundine, that is to say, 40 Faires or markets, they esteeme consecrated to Saturne: for the store & foison of fruits is that which openeth the trade & comerce of buying and selling. Or, because these reasons seeme to be very antique; what and if we say that the first man who made (of Saturns temple at Rome) the treasure or chamber of the citie, was Valerius Poplicola, after that the kings were driven out of Rome, and it seemeth to stand to good reason that he made choise thereof, because he thought it a safe and secure place, eminent and conspicuous in all mens eies, and by consequence hard to be surprisid and forced.

43

What is the cause that those who come as embassadours to Rome, from any parts whatsoever, go first into the temple of Saturne, and there before the Questors or Treasurers of the citie, enter their names in their registers.

Is it for that Saturne himselfe was a stranger in Italy, and therefore all strangers are welcome unto him?

Or may not this question be solved by the reading of histories? for in old time these Questors or publike Treasurers, were wont to send unto embassadours certaine presents, which were called Lautia; and if it fortuned that such embassadours were sicke, they tooke the charge of them for their cure; and if they chanced to die, they entered them likewise at the cities charges.

D d d

ges. But now in respect of the great resort of embassadors from out of all countries, they have cut off this expence: howbeit the auncient custome yet remaineth, namely, to present themselves to the said officers of the treasure, and to be registred in their booke.

44

Why it is not lawfull for Jupiters priest to sweare?

IS it because an oth ministred unto free borne men, is as it were the racke and torture tenderd unto them? for certeine it is, that the soule as well as the bodie of the priest, ought to continue free, and not be forced by any torture whatsoever.

Or, for that it is not meet to distrust or discredit him in small matters, who is beleevd in great and divine things?

Or rather because every oth endeth with the detestation and malediction of perjurie: and considering that all maledictions be odious and abominable; therefore it is not thought good that any other priests whatsoever, should curse or pronounce any malediction: and in this respect was the priestesse of Minerva in Athenes highly commended, for that she would never curse Alcibiades, notwithstanding the people commanded her so to doe: For I am (quoth she) ordinaed a priestesse to pray for men, and not to curse them.

Or last of all, was it because the perill of perjurie would reach in common to the whole common wealth, if a wicked, godlesse and forsworne person, should have the charge and superintendance of the priaters, vowes, and sacrifices made in the behalfe of the citie.

What is the reason that upon the festivall day in the honour of Venus, which solemnitie they call Veneralia, they use to powre forth a great quantitie of wine out of the temple of Venus.

IS it as some say upon this occasion, that Mezentius sometime captaine generall of the Tuscans, sent certeine embassadors unto Aeneas, with commission to offer peace unto him, upon this condition, that he might receive all the wine of that yeeres vintage. But when Aeneas refused so to doe, Mezentius (for to encourage his souldiers the Tuskans to fight manfully) promised to bestow wine upon them when he had woon the field: but Aeneas understanding of this promise of his, consecrated and dedicated all the said wine unto the gods: and in trueth, when he had obtained the victorie, all the wine of that yeere, when it was gotten and gathered together, he powred forth before the temple of Venus.

Or, what if one should say, that this doth symbolize thus much: That men ought to be sober upon festivall daies, and not to celebrate such solemnities with drunkenesse; as if the gods take more pleasure to see them shed wine upon the ground, than to powre overmuch thereof downe their throats?

What is the cause that in ancient times they kept the temple of the goddesse Hora, open alwaies.

WHether was it (as Antistius Labeo hath left in writing) for that, seeing Hortus in the Latine tongue signifieth to incite and exhort, they thought that the goddesse called Horta, which stirreth and provoketh men unto the enterprise and execution of good exploits, ought to be evermore in action, not to make delaies, nor to be shut up and locked within dores, ne yet to sit still and do nothing?

Or rather, because as they name her now a daies Hora, with the former syllable long, who is a certeine industrious, vigilant and busie goddesse, carefull in many things: therefore being as she is, so circumspect and watchfull, they thought she should be never idle, nor rechelesse of mens affaires.

Or els, this name Hora (as many others besides) is a meere Greeke word, and signifieth a deitie or divine power, that hath an eye to overlooke, to view and controll all things; and therefore since she never sleepeth, nor laieth her eyes together, but is alwaies broad awake, therefore her church or chapel was alwaies standing open.

But if it be as Labeo saith, that this word Hora is rightly derived of the Greeke verbe horreo or incito, which signifieth to incite or provoke; consider better, whether this word Orator also, that is to say, one who stirreth up, exhorteth, encourageth, and advieth the people, as a prompt

prompt and ready counsellor, be not derived likewise in the same sort, and not of horreo or incito, that is to say, praier and supplication, as some would have it.

47

Wherefore founded Romulus the temple of Vulcane without the citie of Rome?

IS it for the jealousie (which as fables do report) Vulcane had of Mars, because of his wife Penelope: and so Romulus being reputed the sonne of Mars, would not vouchsafe him to inhabit and dwell in the same citie with him? or is this a meere foolerie and senselesse conceit?

But this temple was built at the first, to be a chamber and parlour of privie counsell for him and Tatius who reigned with him; to the end that meeting and sitting there in consultation together with the Senatours, in a place remote from all troubles and hinderances, they might deliberate as touching the affaires of State with ease and quietnesse.

Or rather, because Rome from the very first foundation was subject to fire by casualtie, hee thought good to honour this god of fire in some sort, but yet to place him without the walles of the citie.

What is the reason, that upon their festivall day called Consualia, they adorned with garlands of flowers of well their asses as horses, and gave them rest and repose for the time?

IS it for that this solemnitie was holden in the honour of Neptune surnamed Equosrus, that is to say, the horseman? and the ass hath his part of this joyfull feast, for the horses sake?

Or, because that after navigation and transporting of commodities by sea was now found out and shewed to the world, there grew by that meanes (in some sort) better rest and more ease to poore labouring beasts of draught and carriage.

49

How cometh it to passe, that those who stood for any office and magistracie, were mooved by an old custome (as Cato hath written) to present themselves unto the people in a single robe or loose gowne, without any coat at all under it?

WAs it for feare lest they should carrie under their robes any money in their bosomes, for to corrupt, bribe, and buy (as it were) the voices and suffrages of the people?

Or was it because they deemed men worthy to beare publicke office and to governe, not by their birth and parentage, by their wealth and riches, ne yet by their shew and outward reputation, but by their wounds and scarres to be seene upon their bodies. To the end therefore, that such scarres might be better exposed to their sight whom they met or talked withall, they went in this trauer downe to the place of election, without inward coats in their plaine gownes.

Or haply, because they would seeme by this nuditie and nakednesse of theirs, in humilitie to debase themselves, the sooner thereby to curry favor, and win the good grace of the commons, even as well as by taking them by the right hand, by suppliant craving, and by humble submission on their very knees.

What is the cause that the Flamen or priest of Jupiter, when his wife was once dead, used to give up his Priesthood or Sacerdotall dignitie, according as Aeneas hath recorded in his historie.

WAs it for that he who once had wedded a wife, and afterwards buried her, was more unfortunate, than he who never had any? for the house of him who hath married a wife, is entire and perfect, but his house who once had one, and now hath none, is not onely unpertect, but also maimed and lame?

Or might it not bee that the priests wife was consecrated also to divine service together with her husband; for many rites and ceremonies there were, which he alone could not performe, if his wife were not present: and to espouse a new wife immediately upon the decease of the other, were not peradventure possible, nor otherwise would well stand with decent and civill honesty: wherupon neither in times past was it lawfull for him, nor at this day as it should seeme, is he permitted to put away his wife: and yet in our age Domitian at the request of one, gave licence so to doe: at this dissolution and breach of wedlocke, other priests were present and assistant,

assistant, where there passed among them many strange, hideous, horrible, and monstrous ceremonies.

But haply a man would lesse wonder at this, if ever he knew and understood before, that when one of the Censors died, the other of necessity must likewise quit & resigne up his office. Howbeit, when Lucius Drusus was departed this life, his companion in office Aemilius Scaurus, would not give over and renounce his place, untill such time as certaine Tribunes of the people, for his contumacie commanded, that he should be had away to prison.

51

What was the reason that the idols Lares, which otherwise properly be called Præstitæ, had the images of a dogge standing hard by them, and the Lares themselves were portrayed clad in dogges skinnies?

It is because this word Præstitæ signifieth as much as keepers, that is to say, Presidents, or standing before as keepers: and verily such Presidents ought to be good house-keepers, and terrible unto all strangers, like as a dogge is; but gentle and loving to those of the house.

Or rather, that which some of the Romans write is true, like as Chrysippus also the philosopher is of opinion; namely, that there be certaine evil spirits which goe about walking up and downe in the world; and these be the butchers and tormentors that the gods imploy to punish unjust and wicked men: and even so these Lares are held to be malignant spirits, & no better than devils, spying into mens lives, and prying into their families; which is the cause that they now be arraigned in such skinnies, and a dogge they have sitting hard by them, whereby thus much in effect is given to understand, that quicke sented they are; and of great power both to hunt out, and also to chastise lewd persons.

What is the cause that the Romans sacrifice a dogge unto the goddesse called Genita-Mana, and withall make one prayer unto her, that none borne in the house might ever come so good?

It is for that this Genita-Mana is counted a Dæmon or goddesse that hath the procuration and charge both of the generation and also of the birth of things corruptible: for surely the word implieth as much, as a certaine fluxion and generation, or rather a generation fluent or fluxible: and like as the Greeks sacrificed unto Proserpina, a dog, so do the Romans unto that Genita, for those who are borne in the house. Socrates also saith, that the Argives sacrificed a dogge unto Ilirha, for the more easie and safe deliverance of child-birth. Furthermore, as touching that Praier, that nothing borne within the house might ever proove good, it is not haply meant of any persons, man or woman, but of dogges rather which were whelped there; which ought to be, not kinde and gentle, but curst and terrible.

Or peradventure, for that they * that die (after an elegant manner of speech) be named Good or quiet: under these words they covertly pray, that none borne in the house might die. And this need not to seeme a strange kinde of speech; for Aristotle writeth, that in a certaine treatise of peace betweene the Arcadians & Lacedæmonians, this article was comprised in the capitulations: That they should make none* of the Tegaraes, Good, for the aid they sent, or favour that they bare unto the Lacedæmonians; by which was meant, that they should put none of them to death.

What is the reason, that in a solemne procession exhibited at the Capitoline plains, they proclame (even at this day) by the voice of an herald, port-sale of the Sardians? and before all this solemneise and pompe, there is by way of mockerie and to make a laughing stocke an old man led in a shew, with a jewell or brooch pendans about his necke, such as noble mens children are wont to wear, and which they call Bulla?

It is for that the Veientians, who in times past being a puissant State in Tuscanie made warre a long time with Romulus: whose citie being the last that he woonne by force, he made sale of many prisoners and captives, together with their king, mocking him for his stupiditye and grosse follie. Now for that the Tuscans in ancient time were descended from the Lydians, and the capitall citie of Lydia is Sardis, therefore they proclaimed the sale of the Veientian prisoners under the name of the Sardians; and even to this day in scorn and mockerie, they retaine still the same custome.

Whence

Whence came it, that they call the shambles or butcherie at Rome where flesh is to be sold, Macellum?

It is for that this word Macellum, by corruption of language is derived of Mageies, that in the Greeke tongue signifieth a Cooke? like as many other words by usage and custome are come to be received; for the letter C. hath great affinity with G. in the Romane tongue: and long it was ere they had the use of G. which letter Spurium Carbilus first invented. Moreover, they that muffle and stammer in their speech, pronounce ordinarily L. in stead of R.

Or this question may be resolved better by the knowledge of the Romane historie: for we reade therein, that there was sometime a violent person and a notorious thief at Rome, named Macellus, who after he had committed many outrages and robberies, was with much ado in the end taken and punished: and of his goods which were forfeit to the State, there was built a publicke shambles or market place to sell flesh-meats in, which of his name was called Macellum.

Why upon the Ides of Januarie, the minstrels at Rome who played upon the hautboies, were permitted to goe up and downe the city disguised in womens apparel?

As Rose this fashion upon that occasion which is reported? namely, that king Numa had granted unto them many immunities and honorable privileges in his time, for the great devotion that hee had in the service of the gods; and for that afterwards, the Tribunes militarie who governed the citie in Consular authority, tooke the same from them, they went their way discontented, and departed quite from the citie of Rome: but soone after, the people had a misse of them, and besides, the priests made it a matter of conscience, for that in all the sacrifices thorowout the citie, there was no sound of flute or hautboies. Now when they would not returne againe (being sent for) but made their abode in the citie Tibur; there was a certaine afranchised bondslave who secretly undertooke unto the magistrates, to finde some means for to fetch them home. So he caused a sumptuous feast to be made, as if he meant to celebrate some solemne sacrifice, and invited to it the pipers and plaiers of the hautboies aforesaid: and at this feast he tooke order there should be divers women also; and all night long there was nothing but piping, playing, singing and dancing: but all of a sudden this matter of the feast caused a rumor to be raised, that his lord and master was come to take him in the manner; whereupon making semblant that he was much troubled and affrighted, he perswaded the minstrels to mount with all speed into close coaches, covered all over with skinnies, and so to be carried to Tibur. But this was a deceitfull practise of his; for he caused the coaches to be turned about another way, and unawares to them; who partly for the darkeness of the night, and in part because they were drowsie and the wine in their heads, tooke no heed of the way, he brought all to Rome betimes in the morning by the breake of day, disguised as they were, many of them in light coloured gownes like women, which (for that they had over-watched and over-drunke themselves) they had put on, and knew not thereof. Then being (by the magistrates) overcome with faire words, and reconciled againe to the citie, they held ever after this custome every yeere upon such a day: To go up and downe the citie thus foolishly disguised.

What is the reason, that it is commonly received, that certain matrons of the city at the first founded and built the temple of Carmenta, and to this day honour it highly with great reverence?

For it is said, that upon a time the Senat had forbidden the dames and wives of the city to ride in coaches: whereupon they tooke such a stomacke and were so despitteous, that to be revenged of their husbands, they conspired altogether not to conceive or be with child by them, nor to bring them any more babes: and in this minde they persisted still, untill their husbands began to bethinke them selves better of the matter, and let them have their will to ride in their coaches againe as before time: and then they began to breed and beare children a fresh: and those who soonest conceived and bare most and with greatest ease, founded then the temple of Carmenta. And as I suppose this Carmenta was the mother of Evander, who came with him into Italy; whose right name indeed was Themis, or as some say Necessitudo: now for that

the

she rendred propheticall answeres and oracles in verse, the Latins furnamed her Carmenta: for verses in their tongue they call Carmina. Others are of opinion, that Carmenta was one of the Destinies, which is the cause that such matrons and mothers sacrifice unto her. And the Etymologic of this name Carmenta, is as much as Carente mente, that is to say, beside her right wits or bestraught, by reason that her senses were so ravished and transported: so that her verses gave her not the name Carmenta, but contrariwise; her verses were called Carmina of her, because when she was thus ravished and caried beside herselfe, she chanted certaine oracles and prophecies in verse.

57

What is the cause that the women who sacrifice unto the goddesse Rumina, doe poyne and cast store 10 of milke upon their sacrifice, but no wine at all do they bring thither for to be drunke?

IS it, for that the Latins in their tongue call a papp, Ruma? And well it may so be, for that the wilde figge tree neere unto which the the wolfe gave sucke with her teats unto Romulus, was in that respect called Ficus Ruminalis. Like as therefore we name in our Greeke language those milch nourises that suckle yong infants at their breasts, Thelona, being a word derived of ἡ ἑλε, which signifieth a papp; even so this goddesse Rumina, which is as much to say, as Nutf, and one that taketh the care and charge of nourishing and rearing up of infants, admitteth not in her sacrifices any wine; for that it is hurtfull to the nouriture of litle babes and sucklings.

What is the reason that of the Romane Senators, some are called simply, Patres; others with an addition, Patres conscripti?

IS it for that they first, who were instituted and ordeined by Romulus, were named Patres or Patritii, that is to say, Gentlemen or Nobly borne, such as we in Greece, teame Eupatrides?

Or rather they were so called, because they could avouch and shew their fathers; but such as were adjoined afterwards by way of supply, and enroled out of the Commoners houses, were Patres conscripti, thereupon?

Wherefore was there one altar common to Hercules and the Muses?

MAY it not be, for that Hercules taught Evander the letters, according as Julia writeth? Certes, in those daies it was accounted an honourable office for men to teach their kinsfolke and friends to spell letters, and to read. For a long time after it, and but of late daies it was, that they began to teach for hire and for money: and the first that ever was known to keepe a publicke schoole for reading, was one named Spurius Carbilus, the freed servant of that Carbilus who first put away his wife.

What is the reason, that there being two altars dedicated unto Hercules, women are not partakers of the greater, nor is it one whit of that which is offered or sacrificed thereupon?

IS it, because as the report goes Carmenta came not soone enough to be assistant unto the sacrifice: no more did the family of the Pinary, whereupon they tooke that name? for in regard that they came tardie, admitted they were not to the feast with others who made good cheere; and therefore got the name Pinary, as if one would say, pined or famished?

Or rather it may allude unto the tale that goeth of the shire empoisoned with the blood of Nessus the Centaure, which ladie Deianira gave unto Hercules.

How cometh it to passe, that it is expressly forbidden at Rome, either to name or to demand 50 ought as touching the Tutelar god, who hath in particular recommendation and patronage, the safetie and preservation of the citie of Rome: nor so much as to enquire whether the said deity be male or female? And verely this prohibition proceedeth from a superstitious feare that they have; for that they say that Valerius Soranus died an ill death, because he presumed to utter and publish so much.

IS it in regard of a certaine reason that some latin historians do alledge; namely, that there be certaine evocations and enchantings of the gods by spels and charmes, through the power whereof whereof they are of opinion, that they might be able to call forth and draw away the Tutelar gods of their enemies, and to cause them to come and dwell with them: and therefore the Romans be afraid lest they may do as much for them? For, like as in times past the Tyrians, as we find upon record, when their citie was besieged, enchained the images of their gods to their shrines, for feare they would abandon their citie and be gone; and as others demanded pledges and sureties that they should come againe to their place, whensoever they sent them to any bath to be washed, or let them go to any expiation to be clenfed; even so the Romans thought, that to be altogether unknown and not once named, was the best meanes, and surest way to keepe with their Tutelar god.

10 Or rather, as Homer verie well wrote:

*The earth to men all,
is common great and small:*

That thereby men should worship all the gods, and honour the earth; seeing she is common to them all: even so the ancient Romans have concealed and suppressed the god or angell which hath the particular gard of their citie, to the end that their citizens should adore, not him alone but all others likewise.

*What is the cause that among those priests whom they name Faeciales, signifying as much as in greeke 62
ἐπιστάται, that is to say, Officers going between to make treatie of peace or ἐμμεδιστοί, that is to say, Agents for truce and leagues, he whom they call Pater Patratus is esteemed the chiefe? Now Pater Patratus is he, whose father is yet living who hath children of his owne: and in truth this chiefe Faecial or Herault hath still at this day a certain prerogative, or speciall credit above the rest. For the emperours themselves, and generall captains, if they have any persons about them who in regard of the prime of youth, or of their beausfull bodies had need of a faithfull, diligent, and trustie guard, commit them ordinarily into the hands of such as these, for safe custodie.*

IS it not, for that these Patres Parrici, for reverent feare of their fathers of one side, and for modest shames to scandalize or offend their children on the other side, are enforced to be wife 30 and discrete?

Or may it not be, in regard of that cause which their verie denomination doth minister and declare: for this word PATRATUS signifieth as much as compleat, entire and accomplished, as if he were one more perfect and absolute every way than the rest, as being so happie, as to have his owne father living, and be a father also himselfe.

Or is it not, for that the man who hath the superintendence of treaties of peace, and of othes, ought to see as Homer saith, ἀνὰ κροῖον ἀνὰ κροῖον, that is to say, before and behind. And in all reason such an one is he like to be, who hath a child for whom, and a father with whom he may consult.

What is the reason, that the officer at Rome called Rex factorum, that is to say, the king of sacrifices, is debarred both from exercising any magistracie, and also to make a speech unto the people in publicke place?

IS it for that in old time, the kings themselves in person performed the most part of sacred rites, and those that were greater, yea and together with the priests offered sacrifices; but by reason that they grew insolent, proud, and arrogant, so as they became intollerable, most of the Greeke nations, deprived them of this authoritie, and left unto them the preheminence onely to offer publicke sacrifice unto the gods: but the Romans having cleane chafed and expelled their 50 kings, established in their stead another under officer whom they called King, unto whom they granted the oversight and charge of sacrifices onely, but permitted him not to exercise or execute any office of State, nor to intermeddle in publick affaires; to the end it should be known to the whole world, that they would not suffer any person to raigne at Rome, but onely over the ceremonies of sacrifices, nor endure the verie name of Roialtie, but in respect of the gods. And to this purpose upon the verie common place neere unto Comitium; they use to have a solemn sacrifice for the good estate of the citie; which so soone as ever this king hath performed, he taketh his legs and runnes out of the place, as fast as ever he can.

Why

Why suffer not they the table to be taken cleane away, and voided quite, but will have some what alwaies remaining upon it?

Give they not heereby covertly to understand, that wee ought of that which is present to reserve evermore something for the time to come, and on this day to remember the morrow.

Or thought they it not a point of civill honesty and elegance, to repress and keepe downe their appetite when they have before them enough still to content and satisfie it to the full; for lesse will they desire that which they have not, when they accustom themselves to abstaine from that which they have.

Or is not this a custome of courtesie and humanitie to their domestick servants, who are not so well pleased to take their victuals simply, as to partake the same, supposing that by this meane in some sort they doe participate with their masters at the table.

Or rather is it not, because we ought to suffer no sacred thing to be emptic; and the boord you wot well is held sacred.

65

What is thereason that the Bridegrome cometh the first time to lie with his new wedded bride, not with any light but in the darke?

Is it because he is yet abashed, as taking her to be a stranger and not his owne, before he hath companied carnally with her?

Or for that he would then acquaint himselfe, to come even unto his owne espoused wife with shamefacednesse and modestie?

Or rather, like as Solon in his Statutes ordained, that the new married wife should eat of a quince before she enter into the bride bed-chamber, to the end that this first encounter and embracing, should not be odious or unpleasant to her husband; even so the Romane lawgiver would hide in the obscuritie of darkenesse, the deformities and imperfections in the person of the bride, if there were any.

Or haply this was instituted to shew how sinfull and damnable all unlawfull companie of man and woman together is, seeing that which is lawfull and allowed, is not without some blemish and note of shame.

Why is one of the races where horses use to runne, called the Cirque or Flaminius.

Is it for that in old time an ancient Romane named Flaminius gave unto the citie, a certaine piece of ground, they employed the rent and revenues thereof in runnings of horses, and chariots: and for that there was a surplussage remaining of the said lands, they bestowed the same in paving that high way or causey, called Via Flaminia, that is to say, Flaminia street?

67

Why are the Sergeants or officers who carie the knitches of rods before the magistrates of Rome, called Licitors.

Is it because these were they who bound malefactors, and who followed after Romulus, as his guard, with cords and leather thongs about them in their bosomes? And verily the common people of Rome when they would say to binde or tie fast, use the word Aligare, and such as speake more pure and proper Latin, Ligare.

Or is it, for that now the letter C is interjected within this word, which before time was Litor, as one would say licitor, that is to say, officers of publike charge; for no man there is in a manner, ignorant, that even at this day in many cities of Greece, the common-wealth or publike state is written in their lawes by the name of Litor.

Wherefore doe the Luperci at Rome sacrifice a Dogge? Now these Luperci are certaine persons who upon a festivall day called Lupercalia, runne through the citie all naked, save that they have aprons only before their privy parts, carrying leather whippes in their hands, wherewith they flappe and scourge whomsoever they meet in the streets.

Is all this ceremoniall action of theirs a purification of the citie? whereupon they call the moneth wherein this is done Februarium, yea, and the very day it selfe Febraten, like as the maner

maner of squitching with a leather scourge Februre, which verbe signifieth as much as to purge or purifie?

And verily the Greeks, in maner all, were wont in times past, and so they continue even at this day, in all their expiations, to kill a dogge for sacrifice. unto Hecate also they bring forth among other expiatorie oblations, certaine little dogges or whelpes: such also as have neede of cleansing and purifying, they wipe and scour all over with whelpes skinnies, which maner of purification they teame Perisclafismos.

Or rather is it for that Lupus signifieth a wolfe, & Lupercalia, or Lycæa is the feast of wolves: now a dogge naturally, being an enemy to wolves, therefore at such feasts they sacrificed a dogge.

Or peradventure, because dogges barked and bay at these Luperci, troubling and disquieting them as they runne up and downe the city in maner aforesaid.

Or else last of all, for that this feast and sacrifice is solemnized in the honor of god Pan, who as you wot well is pleased well enough with a dogge, in regard of his flock of goates.

69

What is the cause that in ancient time, at the feast called Septimontium, they observed precisely not to use any coaches drawn with steeds, nor more than those doe at this day, who are observant of old institutions and doe not despise them. Now this Septimontium is a festivall solemnity, celebrated in memoriall of a seventh mountaine, that was adjoined and taken into the purprise of Rome citie, which by this meane came to have seven hilles enclosed within the precinct thereof?

Whether was it as some Romans doe imagine, for that the city was not as yet conjunct and composed of all her parts? Or if this may seeme an impertinent conjecture, and nothing to the purpose: may it not be in this respect, that they thought they had atchieved a great piece of worke, when they had thus amplified and enlarged the compasse of the citie, thinking that now it needed not to proceed any further in greatnesse and capacite: in consideration whereof, they reposd themselves, and caused likewise their labouring beasts of draught and cariage to rest, whose helpe they had used in finishing of the said enclosure, willing that they also should enjoy in common with them, the benefit of that solemne feast.

Or else we may suppose by this, how desirous they were that their citizens should solemnize and honour with their personall presence all feasts of the citie, but especially that which was ordained and instituted for the peopling and augmenting thereof: for which cause they were not permitted upon the day of the dedication, and festival memorial of it, to put any horses in geeres or harnesses for to draw; for that they were not at such a time to ride forth of the citie.

Why call they those who are apprehended or taken in theft, pilferie or such like servile trespasses, Furciferos, as one would say, Fork bearers.

Is not this also an evident argument of the great diligence and careful regard that was in their ancients? For when the maister of the family had surprised one of his servants or slaves, committing a lewd and wicked prance, he commanded him to take up and carrie upon his necke between his shoulders a forked piece of wood, such as they use to put under the spire of a chariot or waine, and so to go withall in the open view of the world throughout the streets, yea and the parish where he dwelt, to the end that every man from thence forth should take heed of him. This piece of wood we in Greeke call εὐρυπύλον, and the Romanes in the Latin tongue Furca, that is to say, a forked prop or supporter: and therefore he that is forced to carie such an one, is by reproch termed Furcifer.

Wherefore use the Romans to tie a wisp of hay unto the hornes of kine, and other beestes that are wont to bark and be cast with their heads, thus by the meane thereof folke might take heed of them, and looke better to themselves when they come in their way?

Is it not for that beestes, horses, asses, yea, and men become fierce, insolent, and dangerous, if they be highly kept and pampered to the full? according as Sophocles said:

Like

*Like as the colt or jade doth winke and kick,
In case he find his provender so prick:
Even so do'st thou: for lo, thy paunch is full Thy cheeks be puff, like to some greedy gull.*

And thereupon the Romans gave out, that Marcius Crassus caried hey on his horne: for howsoever they would seeme to let flie and carpe at others, who dealt in the affaires of State, and government, yet beware they would how they commerced with him as being a dangerous man, and one who caried a revenging mind to as many as medled with him. Howbeit it was said afterwards againe on the other side, that Caesar had plucked the hey from Crassus his horne: for he was the first man that opposed himselte, and made head against him in the management of the 10 State; and in one word set not a straw by him.

What was the cause that they thought those priests who observed bird-flights, such as in old time they called Aruspices, and now a daies Augures, ought to have their lanterns and lamps always open, and not to put any lioor cover over them?

May it not be, that like as the old Pythagorean Philosophers by small matters signified and implied things of great consequence, as namely, when they forbad their disciples to sit upon the measure Charnix; and to stirre fire, or rake the hearth with a sword; even so the ancient Romans used many ænigmes, that is to say, outward signes and figures betokening some hidden and secret mysteries; especially with their priests in holy and sacred things, like as this is of the lampe or lantern, which symbolizeth in some sort the bodie that containeth our soule. For the soule within resembleth the light, and it behooveth that the intelligent and reasonable part thereof should be alwaies open, evermore intentive and seeing, and at no time enclosed and shut up, nor blown upon by wind. For looke when the winds be aloft, fowles in their flight keepe no certaintie, neither can they yeeld assured prefaces, by reason of their variable and wandering instabilitie: and therefore by this ceremoniall custome they teach those who do divine and foretell by the flight of birds, not to go forth for to take their auspices and observations when the wind is up, but when the aire is still, and so calme, that a man may carie a lantern 30 open and uncovered.

Why were the Southsayers or Augures forbidden to go abroad, for to observe the flight of birds, in case they had any sore or ulcer upon their bodies?

Was not this also a significant token to put them in minde, that they ought not to deale in the divine service of the gods, nor meddle with holy and sacred things if there were any secret matter that gnawed their minds, or so long as any private ulcer or passion seiled in their hearts: but to be void of sadness and griefe, to be found and sincere, and not distracted by any trouble whatsoever?

Or, because it standeth to good reason; that if it be not lawfull nor allowable for them to offer unto the gods for an oast or sacrifice any beast that is scabbed, or hath a sore upon it, how to take preface by the flight of such birds as are maungie, they ought more strictly and precisely to looke into their owne persons in this behalfe, and not to presume for to observe celestiall prognostications and signes from the gods, unless they be themselves pure and holy, undefiled, and not defective in their owne selves: for surely an ulcer seemeth to be in manner of a mutilation and pollution of the bodie.

Why did king Servius Tullius found and build a temple of little Fortune which they called in Latine Brevis fortuna, that is to say, of Short fortune?

Was it not thinke you in respect of his owne selfe, who being at the first of a small and base condition, as being borne of a captive woman, by the favour of Fortune grew to so great an estate that he was king of Rome?

Or for that this change in him sheweth rather the might and greatnesse, than the debilitie and smallnesse of Fortune. We are to say, that this king Servius deified Fortune; & attributed unto her more divine power than any other, as having entituled and imposed her name almost upon upon every action: for not onely he erected temples unto Fortune, by the name of Puissant, of Diverting till lucke, of Sweet, Favourable to the first borne and masculine; but also there is one temple besides, of private or proper Fortune; another of Fortune returned; a third of confident Fortune and hoping well; and a fourth of Fortune the virginie. And what should a man reckon up other furnames of hers, seeing there is a temple dedicated (forsooth) to glewing Fortune, whom they called Vifcana; as if we were given thereby to understand, that we are caught by her alasse off, and even tied (as it were) with bird-lime to businesse and affaires.

But consider this moreover, that he having known by experience what great power she hath in humane things, how little soever she seeme to be, and how often a small matter in hapning 10 or not hapning hath given occasion to some, either to misse of great exploits, or to atcheive as great enterprises, whether in this respect, he built not a temple to little Fortune, teaching men thereby to be alwaies studious, carefull and diligent, and not to despise any occurrences how small soever they be.

What is the cause that they never put fourth the light of a lampe, but suffered it to goe out of the owne accord?

Was it not (thinke you) upon a certaine reverent devotion that they bare unto that fire, as being either cousen germaine, or brother unto that inextinguible and immortal fire.

Or rather, was it not for some other secret advertiment, to teach us not to violate or kill any thing whatsoever that hath life, if it hurt not us first; as if fire were a living creature: for need it hath of nourishment and moveth of it selfe: and if a man doe squench it, surely it uttereth a kinde of voice and sericke, as if a man killed it.

Or certainly this fashion and custome received so usually, sheweth us that we ought not to marre or spoile, either fire or water or any other thing necessarie, after we our selves have done with it, and have had sufficient use thereof, but to suffer it to serve other mens turnes who have need, after that we our selves have no imploiment for it.

How cometh it to passe that those who are defended of the most noble and ancient houses of Rome, caried little moones upon their shoes.

Is this (as Castor saith) a signe of the habitation which is reported to be within the bodie of the moone?

Or for that after death, our spirits and ghosts shall have the moone under them?

Or rather, because this was a marke or badge proper unto those who were reputed most ancient, as were the Arcadians descended from Evander, who upon this occasion were called Proseleni, as one would say, borne before the moone?

Or, because this custome as many others, admonisheth those who are lifted up too high, and 40 take so great pride in themselves, of the incertitude and instabilitie of this life, and of humane affaires, even by the example of the moone,

*Who at the first doth new and young appeere,
Where as before she made no shew at all;
And so her light increaseth faire and cleere,
Untill her face be round and full wit hall:
But then anon she doth begin to fall,
And backward wane from all this beantie gay,
Untill againe she vanish cleane away.*

Or was not this an holisome lesson and instruction of obedience, to teach and advise men to 50 obey their superiors, & not to thinke much for to be under others: but like as the moone is willing to give care (as it were) and apply her selfe to her better, content to be ranged in a second place, and as Parmenides saith,

Having aneie and due regard Attunes the bright Sun beames towards;

even so they ought to rest in a second degree, to follow after, and be under the conduct and direction of another, who sitteth in the first place, and of his power, authority and honor, in some measure to enjoy a part.

Why

77

Why think they the yeeres dedicated to Jupiter, and the moneths to Juno?

May it not be for that of Gods invisable and who are no otherwise seene but by the eies of our understanding: those that reigne as princes be Jupiter and Juno; but of the visible, the Sun and Moone? Now the Sun is he who causeth the yeere, and the Moone maketh the moneth. Neither are we to thinke, that these be onely and simply the figures and images of them: but beleewe we must, that the materiall Sun which we behold, is Jupiter, and this materiall Moone, Juno. And the reason why they call her Juno (which word is as much to say as yong or new) is in regarde of the course of the Moone: and otherwhiles they surname her also Juno-Lucina, that is to say; light or shining: being of opinion that she helpeth women in travel of child-birth, like as the Moone doth, according to these verses:

By starres that turne full round in Azur skie:

By Moone who helps child-birth right speedily.

For it seemeth that women at the full of the moone be most easily delivered of childbirth.

78

What is the cause that in observing bird flight, that which is presented on the * left hand is reputed lucky and prosperous?

* sinistrum,
* sinistrum.

Is not this altogether untrue, and are not many men in an error by ignorance of the equivocation of the word sinistrum, & their manner of Dialect; for that which we in Greeke call sinistrum, that is to say, on the aike or left hand, they say in Latin, sinistrum; and that which signifieth to permit, or let be, they expresse by the verbe Sinere, and when they will a man to let a thing alone, they say unto him, Sine; whereupon it may seeme that this word sinistrum is derived. That prefaging bird then, which permitteeth and suffereth an action to be done, being as it were sinistrum; the vulgar sort suppose (though not aright) to be sinistrum, that is to say, on the left hand, and so they rearme it.

Or may it not be rather as Dionysius saith, for that when Aeneas the sonne of Aeneas wanne a field against Mezentius as the two armies stood arranged one affronting the other in battell ray, it thundred on his left hand; and because thereupon he obtained the victory, they deemed even then, that this thunder was a token prefaging good, and for that cause observed it, ever after so to fall out. Others thinke that this prefage and foretoken of good lucke hapned unto Aeneas: and verily at the battell of Lentines, the Thebanes began to breake the ranks of their enemies, and to discomfit them with the left wing of their battell, and thereby in the end achieved a brave victorie; whereupon ever after in all their conflicts, they gave preference and the honour of leading and giving the first charge, to the left wing.

Or rather, is it not as Juba writeth, because that when we looke toward the sunne rising, the North side is on our left hand, and some will say, that the North is the right side and upper part of the whole world.

But consider I pray you, whether the left hand being the weaker of the twaine, the prefages coming on that side, doe not fortifie and support the defect of puilliance which it hath, and so make it as it were even and equal to the other?

Or rather considering that earthly and mortall things they supposing to be opposite unto those that be heavenly and immortal, did not imagine consequently, that whatsoever was on the left in regard of us, the gods sent from their right side.

Wherefore was it lawfull at Rome, when a noble personage who sometime had entred triumphant into the city, was dead, and his corps burnt (as the manner was) in a funerall fire, to take up the reliques of his bones, to carrye the same into the city, and there to strew them, according as Pytho the Lycarcan hath left in writing.

Was not this to honour the memorie of the dead? for the like honourable priviledge they had graunted unto other valiant warriors and brave capitaines; namely, that not onely themselves, but also their posteritie descending lineally from them, might be entred in their common market place of the city, as for example unto Valerius and Fabritius: and it is said, that for to continue this prerogative in force, when any of their posteritie afterwards were departed this life, and their bodies brought into the market place accordingly, the manner was, to put a burning torch under them, and doe no more but presently to take it away againe; by which ceremonie, they retained still the due honour without envie, and confirmed it onely to be lawfull if they would take the benefit thereof.

What is the cause that when they scaffold at the common charges, any generall captain who made his entrie into the citie with triumph, they never admitted the Consuls to the feast; but that which more is, sent unto them before-hand messengers of purpose requesting them not to come unto the supper?

Was it for that they thought it meet and convenient to yeeld unto the triumpher, both the highest place to sit in, and the most costly cup to drinke out of, as also the honour to be attended upon with a traine home to his house after supper? which prerogatives no other might enjoy but the Consuls onely, if they had beene present in the place.

Why is it that the Tribune of the commons onely, weareth no embroidered purple robe, considering that all other magistrates besides doe wear the same.

Is it not, for that they (to speake properly) are no magistrates? for in truth they have no officers neither sit they in the chaire of estate called sedes curulis, to determine causes judicially, or give audience unto the people; nor enter into the administration of their office at the beginning of the yeere, as all other magistrates doe: neither are they put downe and deposed after the election of a Dictator: but whereas the full power and authoritie of all other magistrates of State, he transferreth from them upon himselfe: the Tribunes onely of the people continue still, and surcease not to execute their function, as having another place & degree by themselves in the common-weale: and like as some orators and lawyers doe hold, that exception in law is no action, considering it doth cleane contrary to action; for that action intendeth, commenseth, and beginneth a proccesse or lute; but exception or inhibition, dissolveth, undoeth, and abolieth the same: semblably, they thinke also, that the Tribune is an empeachment, inhibition, and restraint of a magistracie, rather than a magistracie itselfe: for all the authority and power of the Tribune, lay in opposing himselfe, and crossing the jurisdiction of other magistrates, and in diminishing or repressing their excessive and licentious power.

Or haply all these reasons and such like, are but words, and devised imaginations to mainteine discourse: but to say a trueth, this Tribuneship having taken originally the first beginning from the common people, is great and mighty in regard that it is popular; and that the Tribunes themselves are not proud nor highly conceited of themselves above others, but equall in apparell, in port, fare, and manner of life, to any other citizens of the common sort: for the dignity of pompe and outward shew, apperteineth to a Consul or a Praetour: as for the Tribune of the people, he ought to be humble and lowly, and as M. Curius was wont to say; ready to put his hand under every mans foot; not to carie a loftie, grave, and stately countenance, nor to bee hard of access, nor strange to be spoken with, or dealt withall by the multitude; but howsoever he behave himselfe to others, he ought to the simple and common people, above the rest, for to be affable, gentle, and tractable: and heereupon the manner is, that the dore of his house should never be kept shut, but stand open both day and night, as a safe harbour, sure haven, and place of refuge, for all those who are distressed and in need: and vertie the more submisile that he is in outward appearance, the more groweth hee and increaseth in puilliance; for they repute him as a strong hold for common recourse and retreat, unto all commoners, no lesse than an altar or privileged sanctuary. Moreover, as touching the honour that he holdeth by his place, they count him holy, sacred, and inviolable, in so much as if he doe but goe forth of his house abroad into the citie, and walke in the street, the manner was of all, to cleanse and sanctifie the body, as if it were stained and polluted.

What is the reason that before the Praetors, generall Capitaines and head Magistrates, there be carried bundels of rodde, together with hatchets or axes fastened unto them?

Is it to signifie, that the anger of the magistrate ought not to be prompt to execution, nor looke and at libertie?
